what was before hidden in God's purpose. life—of the Spirit, acting first on the soul here, about to act on the body also at the resurrection. immortality—Greek, "incorruptibility" of the new life, not merely of the risen body [ALFORD]. (Romans 8. 11.) through—by means of the Gospel, which brings to light the life and immortality purposed by God from eternity, but manifested now first to man by Christ, who in His own resurrection has given the pledge of His people's final triumph over death through Him. Before the Gospel revelation from God, man, by the light of nature, under the most favourable circumstances, had but a glimmering idea of the possibility of a future being of the soul, but not the faintest idea of the resurrection of the body (Acts 17. 18, 32). If Christ were not "the life," the dead could never live; if He were not the resurrection, they could never rise; had He not the keys of hell and death (Revelation 1. 18), we could never break through the bars of death or gates of hell. [BISHOP PEARSON.] 11. Whereunto—For the publication of which Gospel. I am appointed—Greek, "I was appointed." preacher—Greek, "herald," teacher of the Gentiles—(1 Timothy 2. 7.) He brings forward his own example in this verse and v. 12, as a pattern for Timothy, as a public "preacher," an "apostle," or missionary from place to place, and a "teacher" in private instructing His flock with patient perseverance. 12. For the which cause—For the Gospel cause of which I was appointed a preacher (v. 10, 11). I also suffer—besides my active work as a missionary. ELLICOTT translates, "I suffer even these things;" the sufferings attendant on my being a prisoner (v. 8, 15). I am not ashamed—neither be thou (v. 8). for—Confidence as to the future drives away shame. [BENGE.] I know—though the world knows Him not (John 10. 14; 17. 25). whom—I know what a faithful, promise-keeping God He is (ch. 2. 13). It is not, I know how I have believed, but, I know whom I have believed; a feeble faith may clasp a strong Saviour. believed—rather, "trusted;" carrying out the metaphor of a depositor depositing his pledge with one whom He trusts. I am persuaded—(Romans 8. 38.) He is able—in spite of so many foes around me. that which I have committed unto him—Greek, "my deposit;" the body, soul, and spirit, which I have deposited in God's safe keeping (1 Thessalonians 5. 23; 1 Peter 4. 19). So Christ Himself in dying (Luke 23. 46). "God deposits with us His word; we deposit with God our spirit." [GROTIUS.] There is one deposit [His revelation] committed by God to us, which we ought to keep (v. 13, 14) and transmit to others (ch. 2. 2); there is another committed by God to us, which we should commit to His keeping, viz., ourselves and our heavenly portion. that day—the day of His appearing (v. 18; ch. 4. 8). 13. Hold fast the form—rather as Greek, "Have (i. e., keep) a pattern of sound (Greek, healthy) words which thou hast heard from me, in faith and love." "Keep" suits the reference to a deposit in the context. The secondary position of the verb in the Greek forbids our taking it so strongly as English Version, "Hold fast." The Greek for "form" is translated "pattern" in 1 Timothy 1. 16, the only other passage where it occurs. Have such a pattern drawn from my sound words, in opposition to the unsound doctrines so current at Ephesus, videly impressed (WAHL translates it "delineation;" the verb implies to make a lively and lasting impress) on thy mind. In faith and love—the element IN which my sound words had place, and in which thou art to have the vivid impression of them as thy inwardly delineated pattern, moulding conformably thy outward profession. So nearly BENGE explains, 1 Timothy 3. 9. 14. Translate as Greek, "That goodly deposit keep through the Holy Ghost," viz., "the sound words which I have committed to thee" (v. 13; ch. 2. 2). In us—In all believers, not merely in you and me. The ludwelling Spirit enables us to keep from the robbers of the soul the deposit of His word committed to us by God. 15. all they which are in Asia—Proconsular Asia; "All who are there now, when they were in Rome (not "be" or are, but) turned from me" then; were "ashamed of my chain," in contrast to ONESIPHORUS; did not stand with me but forsook me (ch. 4. 16).

It is possible that the occasion of their turning from him was at his apprehension in Nicopolis, whither they had escorted him on his way to Rome, but from which they turned back to Asia. A hint to Timothy, now in Asia, not to be like them, but to imitate rather ONESIPHORUS, and to come to him (ch. 4. 21). Phygelus and Hermogenes—specified perhaps, as being persons from whom such pusillanimous conduct could least be expected; or, as being well known to Timothy, and spoken of before in conversations between him and Paul, when the latter was in Asia Minor. 16. The Lord give mercy—even as ONESIPHORUS had abounded in works of mercy. the house of Onesiphorus—He himself was then absent from Ephesus, which accounts for the form of expression (ch. 4. 19). His household would hardly retain his name after the master was dead, as BENGE supposes him to have been. Nowhere has Paul prayers for the dead, which is fatal to the theory, favoured by ALFORD also, that he was dead. God blesses not only the righteous man himself, but all his household. my chain—Paul in the second, as in his first imprisonment, was bound by a chain to the soldier who guarded him. 17. found me—in the crowded metropolis. So in turn "may he find mercy of the Lord in that day" when the whole universe shall be assembled. 18. grant unto him—as well as "unto his house" (v. 16). the Lord—who rewards a kindness done to His disciples as if done to Himself (Matthew 25. 45). of—from the Lord; "the Lord" is emphatically put instead of "from Himself," for solemnity and emphasis (2 Thessalonians 3. 5). in how many things—"how many acts of ministry he rendered." unto me—Omitted in the oldest MSS., so that the "ministered" may include services rendered to others as well as to Paul. very well—rather as Greek, "Thou knowest better" (than I can tell thee, seeing that thou art more of a regular resident at Ephesus).

CHAPTER II.

Ver. 1-26. EXHORTATIONS; TO FAITHFULNESS AS A GOOD SOLDIER OF CHRIST; ERRORS TO BE SHUNNED; THE LORD'S SURE FOUNDATION; THE RIGHT SPIRIT FOR A SERVANT OF CHRIST. 1. Thou therefore—following my example (ch. 1. 8, 12), and that of ONESIPHORUS (ch. 1. 16-18), and shunning that of those who forsook me (ch. 1. 15). my son—Children ought to imitate their father. be strong—*lit., "be invested with power." Have power, and show thyself to have it; implying an abiding state of power. in the grace—the element IN which the believer's strength has place. Cf. ch. 1. 7, "God hath given us the spirit of power." 2. among—Greek, "through," i. e., with the attestation (lit., intervention) of many witnesses, viz., the presbyters and others present at his ordination or consecration (1 Timothy 4. 14; 6. 12). commit—in trust, as a deposit (ch. 1. 14). faithful—The quality most needed by those having a trust committed to them. who—Greek, "(persons) such as shall be competent to teach (them to) others also." Thus the way is prepared for inculcating the duty of faithful endurance (v. 3-13). Thou shouldst consider as a motive to endurance, that thou hast not only to keep the deposit for thyself, but to transmit it unimpaired to others, who in their turn shall fulfil the same office. This is so far from supporting oral tradition now, that it rather teaches how precarious a mode of preserving revealed truth it was, depending, as it did, on the trustworthiness of each individual in the chain of succession; and how thankful we ought to be that God Himself has given the written Word, which is exempt from such risk. 3. Thou therefore endure hardness—The oldest MSS. have no "Thou therefore," and read, "Endure hardship with" (me). "Take thy share in suffering." [CONYBEARE and HOWSON.] 4. "No one whilst serving as a soldier." the affairs, &c.—"the businesses of life" [ALFORD]; mercantile, or other than military. him who hath chosen him—the general who at the first enlisted him as a soldier. Paul himself worked at tent-making (Acts 18. 3). Therefore what is prohibited here is, not all other save religious occupation, but the becoming entangled, or over-engrossed therewith. 5. And—Moreover. strive for masteries—"strive in the games"

[ALFORD]; viz., the great national games of Greece. yet is he not crowned, except—even though he gain the victory. strive lawfully—observing all the conditions of both the contest (keeping within the bounds of the course and strip of his clothes) and the preparation for it, viz., as to self-denying diet, anointing, exercise, self-restraint, chastity, decorum, &c. (1 Corinthians 9. 24-27). 6. must be first partaker—The right of first partaking of the fruits belongs to him who is labouring; do not thou, therefore, relax thy labours, as thou wouldst be foremost in partaking of the reward. CONYBEARE explains "first," before the idler. 7. Consider the force of the illustrations I have given from the soldier, the contender in the games, and the husbandmen, as applying to thyself in thy ministry. and the Lord give thee, &c.—The oldest MSS. read, "for the Lord will give thee understanding." Thou canst understand my meaning so as personally to apply it to thyself; for the Lord will give thee understanding when thou seekest it from Him "in all things." Not intellectual perception, but personal appropriation of the truths metaphorically expressed, was what he needed to be given him by the Lord. 8. Rather as Greek, "Remember Jesus Christ, raised from the dead." Remember Christ risen, so as to follow Him. As He was raised after death, so if thou wouldst share His risen "life," thou must now share His "death" (v. 11). The Greek perfect passive participle, implies a permanent character acquired by Jesus as the risen Saviour, and our permanent interest in Him as such. Christ's resurrection is put prominently forward as being the truth now assailed (v. 18), and the one best calculated to stimulate Timothy to steadfastness in sharing Paul's sufferings for the Gospel's sake (Note, v. 3). my Gospel—that which I always taught. of the seed of David—The one and only genealogy (as contrasted with the "endless genealogies," (1 Timothy 1. 4) worth thinking of, for it proves Jesus to be the Messiah. The absence of the article in the Greek, and this formula, "of the seed of David" (cf. Romans 1. 3), imply that the words were probably part of a recognized short oral creed. In His death He assured us of His humanity; by His resurrection, of His divinity. That He was not crucified for His own sin, appears from His resurrection; that He was crucified, shows that He bore sin, on Him, though not in Him. 9. Wherein—In proclaiming which Gospel. suffer trouble—lit., "evil." I am a sufferer of evil as though I were a doer of evil. bonds—(Ch. 1. 16.) word . . . not bound—Though my person is bound, my tongue and my pen are not (ch. 4. 17; Acts 28. 31). Or he alludes not merely to his own proclamation of the Gospel, though in chains, but to the freedom of its circulation by others, even though his power of circulating it is now prescribed (Philippians 1. 18). He also hints to Timothy, that he being free ought to be the more earnest in the service of it. 10. Therefore—Because of the anxiety I feel that the Gospel should be extended; that anxiety being implied in v. 9. endure—not merely "I passively suffer," but "I actively and perseveringly endure," and "am ready to endure patiently all things," the elect—for the sake of the Church; all the members of Christ's spiritual body (Colossians 1. 24). they . . . also—as well as myself: both God's elect not yet converted and those already so. salvation . . . glory—not only salvation from wrath, but glory in reigning with Him eternally (v. 12). Glory is the full expansion of salvation (Acts 2. 47; Romans 8. 21-24, 30; Hebrews 9. 28). So grace and glory, Psalm 84. 12. 11. Greek, "Faithful is the saying." For—For the fact is so that, "if we be dead with Him (the Greek aorist tense implies a state once for all entered into in past times at the moment of regeneration, Romans 6. 3, 4, 8; Colossians 2. 12), we shall also live with Him." The symmetrical form of "the saying," v. 11-13, and the rhythmical balance of the parallel clauses, makes it likely, they formed part of a Church hymn (Note, 1 Timothy 3. 16), or accepted formula, perhaps first uttered by some of the Christian "prophets" in the public assembly (1 Corinthians 14. 26). The phrase "faithful is the saying," which seems to have been the usual formula (cf. 1 Timothy 1. 15; 3. 1; 4. 9; Titus 3. 8) in such cases, favours this. 12. suffer—rather, as the Greek is the same as in v. 10, "If we endure (with Him)," &c. (Romans 8. 17). reign with him—The peculiar privilege of the elect Church now suffering with Christ, then to reign with Him (Note, 1 Corinthians 6. 2). Reigning is something more than mere salvation (Romans 5. 17; Revelation 3. 21; 5. 10; 20. 4, 5). deny with the mouth. As "believe" with the heart follows, v. 12. Cf. the opposite, "confess with thy mouth" and "believe in thine heart" (Romans 10. 9, 10). he also will deny us—(Matthew 10. 33.) 13. believe not—"If we are unbelievers (lit., unfaithful), He remains faithful" (Deuteronomy 7. 9, 10). The oldest MSS. read, "For He cannot (it is an impossibility that He should) deny Himself." He cannot be unfaithful to His word that He will deny those who deny Him, though we be not faithful to our profession of faith in Him (Romans 3. 3). Three things are impossible to God, to die, to lie, and to be deceived [AUGUSTINE, Symbolism ad Catechumenos, 1. 1] (Hebrews 6. 18). This impossibility is not one of infirmity, but of infinite power and majesty. Also, indirectly, comfort is suggested to believers, that He is faithful to His promises to them; at the same time that apostates are shaken out of their self-deceiving fancy, that because they change, Christ similarly may change. A warning to Timothy to be steadfast in the faith. 14. them—those over whom thou dost preside (Titus 3. 1). charging—Greek, "testifying continually;" "adjoining them." before the Lord—(1 Timothy 5. 21.) that they strive not about words—rather, "strive with words;" "not to have a (mere) war of words" (v. 23, 24; 1 Timothy 6. 4) where the most vital matters are at stake (v. 17, 18; Acts 18. 15). The oldest MSS. put a stop at "charging them before the Lord" (which clause is thus connected with "put them in remembrance") and read the imperative, "Strive not thou in words," &c. to no profit—not qualifying "words;" but Greek neuter, in apposition with "strive in words," "a thing tending to no profit," lit., "profitable for nothing;" the opposite of "meet for the master's use" (v. 21). to the subverting—sure to subvert (overturn) the hearers: the opposite of "edifying" (building up) (2 Corinthians 13. 10). 15. Study—Greek, "Be earnest," or "diligent," to show—Greek, "present," as in Romans 12. 1. thyself—as distinguished from those whom Timothy was to charge (v. 14). approved—tested by trial: opposed to "reprobate" (Titus 1. 16). workman—Alluding to Matthew 20. 1, &c. not to be ashamed—by his work not being "approved" (Philippians 1. 20). Contrast "deceitful workers" (2 Corinthians 11. 13). rightly dividing—"rightly handling" [Vulgate]; "rightly administering" [ALFORD]; lit., cutting "straight" or "right;" the metaphor being from a father or a steward (1 Corinthians 4. 1) cutting and distributing bread among his children [VITRINGA and CALVIN] (Luke 12. 42). LXX., Proverbs 3. 6 and 11. 5, use it of "making one's way:" so BENGEL here takes Paul to mean that Timothy may make ready a straight way for "the word of truth," and may himself walk straight forward according to this line, turning neither to the right nor to the left, "teaching no other doctrine" (1 Timothy 1. 3). The same image of a way appears in the Greek for "increase" (Note, v. 16). The opposite to "rightly handling," or "dispensing," is, 2 Corinthians 2. 17, "corrupt the word of God." truth—Greek, "the truth" (cf. v. 18). 16. stand—lit., "stand above," separate from, and superior to. vain—opposed to "the truth" (v. 15). babblings—with loud voice: opposed to the temperate "word" (Titus 3. 9). increase—Greek, "advance;" lit., "strike forward;" an image from pioneers cutting away all obstacles before an advancing army. They pretend progress; the only kind of progress they make is to a greater pitch of impiety. more ungodliness—Greek, "a greater degree of impiety." 17. will eat—lit., "will have pasture." The consuming progress of mortification is the image. They pretend to give rich spiritual pasture to their disciples: the only pasture is that of a spiritual cancer feeding on their vitals. canker—a cancer or gangrene. Hymeneus—(Note, 1 Timothy 1. 20.) After his excommunication he seems to have been re-admitted into the Church and again to have troubled it. 18. erred—Greek, "missed the aim" (Note, 1 Timothy 6. 21). is past already—has already taken place. The begninnings of the subsequent Gnostic heresy already existed. They "wrested" (2 Peter 3. 16) Paul's own words (Romans 6. 4; Ephesians 2. 6; Colossians 2. 12) "to their own destruction," as though the resurrection was merely the spiritual raising of souls from the death of sin. Cf. 1 Corinthians 15. 12, where he shows all our hopes of future glory rest on the literal reality of the resurrection. To believe it past (as the Seleucians or Hermians did, according to AUGUSTINE, Ep. 119. 55, ad Januarium, sec. 4.), is to deny it in its true sense. overthrow—trying to subvert "the foundation" on which alone faith can rest secure (v. 19; cf. Titus 1. 11). 19. Nevertheless—Notwithstanding the subversion of their faith, "the firm foundation of God standeth" fast (so the Greek ought to be translated). The "foundation" here is "the Church" [ALFORD], "the ground" or basement support "of the truth" (1 Timothy 3. 15), Christ Himself being the ultimate "foundation" (1 Corinthians 3. 11). In the steadfast standing of the Church there is involved the steadfast certainty of the doctrine in question (v. 18). Thus the "house" (v. 20) answers to the "foundation;" it is made up of the elect whom "the Lord knoweth" (acknowledgeth, recognizes, Psalm 1. 6; Matthew 7. 23; John 10. 14; 1 Corinthians 8. 3) as "His," and who persevere to the end, though others "err concerning the faith" (Matthew 24. 24; John 10. 23; Romans 10. 33, 39; 1 John 2. 19). BENGEI takes "the foundation" to be the immoveable faithfulness of God (to His promises to His elect [CALVIN]). This contrasts well with the erring from the faith on the part of the reprobate, v. 18. Though they deny the faith, God abates not His faithfulness (cf. v. 13). having—seeing that it has. [ELLICOTT.] seal—inscription: indicating ownership and destination; inscriptions were often engraven on a "foundation" stone (Revelation 21. 14). [ALFORD.] This will agree with the view that "the foundation" is the Church (Ephesians 2. 20). If it be taken God's immoveable faithfulness, the "seal" will be regarded as attached to His covenant promise, with the inscription or legend, on one side of its round surface, "The Lord knoweth (it is 'knew' in LXX., Numbers 16. 5, to which Paul here alludes, altering it for his purpose by the Spirit) them that are His;" on the obverse side, "Let every one that nameth (as His Lord, Psalm 20. 7, or preacheth in His name, Jeremiah 20. 9) Christ," &c. depart—Greek, "stand aloof," from iniquity—(Isaiah 52. 11.) In both clauses there may be an allusion to Numbers 16. 5, 26, LXX. God's part and man's part are marked out. God chooseth and knoweth His elect; our part is to believe, and by the Spirit depart from all iniquity, an unequivocal proof of our being the Lord's (cf. Deuteronomy 20. 29; Luke 13. 23-27). St. Lucian when asked by his persecutors, "Of what country art thou?" replied, "I am a Christian." "What is your occupation?" "I am a Christian." "Of what family?" "I am a Christian." [CHRYSOSTOM, Orations, 75.] He cannot be honoured with the name Christian, who dishonours by iniquity, Christ, the Author of the name. Blandina's refreshment amidst her tortures was to say, "I am a Christian, and with us Christians no evil is done." [EUSEBIUS, Ecclesiastical History, 5. 1.] Apostasy from the faith is sure soon to be followed by indulgence in iniquity. It was so with the false teachers (ch. 3. 2-8, 13). 20. In a great house—i. e., the visible professing Christian Church (1 Timothy 3. 15). Paul is speaking, not of those without, but of the [visible] family of God. [CALVIN.] So the parable of the sweep net (Matthew 13. 47-49) gathering together of every kind, good and bad; as the good and bad cannot be distinguished whilst under the waves, but only when brought to shore, so believers and unbelievers continue in the same Church, until the judgment makes the everlasting distinction. "The ark of Noah is a type of the Church; as in the former there were together the leopard and the kid, the wolf and the lamb; so in the latter, the righteous and sinners, vessels of gold and silver, with vessels of wood and earth" [JEROME, contra Juciferianos, 302] (cf. Matthew 20. 16). vessels of gold . . . silver—precious and able to endure fire. of wood and earth—worthless, fragile, and soon burnt (1 Corinthians 3. 12-15; 15. 47). some . . . some—the former . . . the latter. to dishonour—(Proverbs 16. 4; Romans 9. 17-23). 21. If a man . . . purge himself from these—The Greek expresses "If one (ex. gr., thou, Timothy) purify himself (so as to separate) from among these" (vessels unto dishonour). sanctified—Set apart as wholly consecrated to the Lord, and meet—Some oldest MSS. omit "and." the master—viz., of "the house;" the Lord. Paul himself was such a vessel; once one amongst those of earth, but afterwards he became by grace one of gold. prepared unto every good work—(Ch. 3. 17; Titus 3. 1.) Contrast Titus 1. 16. 23. also—Greek, "But;" in contrast to "every good work," v. 21. flee—There are many lusts from which our greatest safety is in flight (Genesis 39. 12). Avoid occasions of sin. From the abstemious character of Timothy (1 Timothy 5. 23) it is likely that not animal indulgences, but the impetuosity, rash self-confidence, hastiness, strife, and vain-glory of young men (1 John 2. 14-16), are what he is here warned against; though the Spirit probably intended the warning to include both in its application to the Church in general. youthful—Timothy was a youth (1 Timothy 4. 12). righteousness—The opposite of "iniquity," i. e., unrighteousness (v. 19; cf. 1 Timothy 6. 11). peace, with—rather put no comma, "peace with them that call on the Lord out of a pure heart" (1 Timothy 1. 5; Ephesians 6. 5; Colossians 3. 22). We are to love all men, but it is not possible to be at peace with all men, for this needs community of purpose and opinion; they alone who call on the Lord sincerely [as contrasted with the false teachers who had only the form of godliness, ch. 3. 5, 8; Titus 1. 15, 16] have this community [THEODORET] (Romans 12. 18). 23. (Titus 3. 9.) unlearned—Greek, "undisciplined;" not tending to promulgate the discipline of faith and morals (Proverbs 5. 23). "Uninstructive;" in contrast with "instructing" (v. 25), and "wise unto salvation" (ch. 3. 15). avoid—"decline." 24. not strive—The servant of the Lord" must imitate his master in not striving contentiously, though uncompromising in earnestly contending for the faith (Jude 3; Matthew 12. 19). gentle unto all men—"patient" (Greek, "patient in bearing wrongs") in respect to adversaries. He is to be gentle so that he may occasion no evils; patient so that he may endure evils. apt to teach—Implying not only solid teaching and ease in teaching, but patience and assiduity in it. [BENGEI.] 25. instructing—Greek, "disciplining," instructing with correction, which those who deal in "uninstructive" or "undisciplined questions" need (Notes, v. 23; 1 Timothy 1. 20). those that oppose themselves—Greek, "oppositely affected;" those of a different opinion. if . . . peradventure—Greek, "if at any time." repentance—which they need as antecedent to the full knowledge (so the Greek for "acknowledgment") of the truth (1 Timothy 2. 4), their minds being corrupted (ch. 3. 8), and their lives immoral. The cause of the spiritual ignorance which prompts such "questions" is moral, having its seat in the will, not in the intellect (John 7. 17). Therefore repentance is their first need. That, not man, but God alone can "give" (Acts 5. 31). 26. recover themselves—Greek, "awake up to soberness," viz., from the spiritual intoxication whereby they have fallen into the snare of the devil. the snare—(Ephesians 6. 11, "the wiles of the devil;" 1 Timothy 3. 7; 6. 9.) taken captive by him at his will—so as to follow the will of "THAT" (the Greek emphatically marks Satan thus foe. However, different Greek pronouns stand for "him" and "his;" and the Greek for "taken captive" means not "captivated for destruction," but "for being saved alive," as in Luke 5. 10, "Thou shalt catch men to save them unto life;" also there is no article before the Greek participle, which the English Version "who are taken captive," would require. Therefore, translate, "That they may awake, &c., taken as saved (and willing) captives by him (the servant of the Lord, v. 24), so as to follow the will of HIM (the Lord, v. 24, or "God," v. 25). There are here two evils, the "snare" and sleep, from which they are delivered: and two goods to which they are translated, awaking and deliverance. Instead of Satan's thrall comes the free and willing captivity of obedience to Christ (2 Corinthians 10. 5). It is God who goes before, giving repentance (v. 25); then the work of His servant following is sure to be crowned with success, leading the convert henceforth to "live to the will of God" (Acts 22, 14; 1 Peter 4, 2).

CHAPTER III.

Ver. 1-17. COMING EVIL DAYS; SIGNS OF EVIL ALREADY: CONTRAST IN THE DOCTRINE AND LIFE OF PAUL, WHICH TIMOTHY SHOULD FOLLOW IN ACCORDANCE WITH HIS EARLY TRAINING IN SCRIPTURE. 1. also—Greek, "but," last days—preceding Christ's second coming (2 Peter 3, 3; Jude 18).—"The latter times," 1 Timothy 4, 1, refer to a period not so remote as "the last days," viz., the long days of Pagan and Greek anti-Christianity. perilous—lit., "difficult times," in which it is difficult to know what is to be done: "grievous times." shall come—Greek, "shall be imminent;" "shall come unexpectedly." [BENGEL.] 2. men—in the professing Church. Cf. the catalogue, Romans 1, 29, &c., where much the same sins are attributed to heathen men, it shall be a relapse into virtual heathendom, with all its beast-like propensities, whence the symbol of it is "a beast" (Revelation 13, 1, 11, 12, &c.; 17, 3, 8, 11). covetous—translate, "money-loving," a distinct Greek word from that for "covetous" (Note, Colossians 3, 5). The eognate Greek substantive (1 Timothy 6, 10) is so translated, "the love of money is a (Greek, not "the") root of all evil." boasters—empty boasters [ALFORD]; boasting of having what they have not. proud—overboasting: lit., showing themselves above their fellows. blasphemous—rather, "evil-speakers," revilers. disobedient to parents—The character of the times is even to be gathered especially from the manners of the young. [BENGEL.] unthankful—The obligation to gratitude is next to that of obedience to parents. unholy—irreligious [ALFORD]; inobedient of the offices of piety. 3. truce-breakers—rather as the Greek is translated Romans 1, 31, "implacable." false accusers—slanders (1 Timothy 3, 11; Titus 2, 3). incontinent, fierce—at once both soft and hard; incontinently indulging themselves, and inhuman to others. despisers, &c.—"no lovers of good" [ALFORD]; the opposite of "a lover of good" (Titus 1, 8). 4. heady—precipitate in action and in passion. high-minded—lit., "puffed up" with pride, as with smoke blinding them. lovers of pleasure . . . God—Love of pleasure destroys the love and sense of God. 5. form—outward semblance. godliness—piety. denying—rather as Greek, "having denied," i. e., renounced. the power—the living, regenerating, sanctifying influence of it. turn away—implying that some of such characters, forerunners of the last days, were already in the Church. 6. of this sort—Greek, "of these," such as were described (v. 5). creep into—stealthily. laden with sins—(Isaiah 1, 4)—applying to the "silly women" whose consciences are burdened with sins, and so are a ready prey to the false teachers who promise ease of conscience if they will follow them. A bad conscience leads easily to shipwreck of faith (1 Timothy 1, 19). divers lusts—not only animal lusts, but passion for change in doctrine and manner of teaching; the running after fashionable men and fashionable tenets, drawing them in the most opposite directions. [ALFORD.] 7. Ever learning—some new point, for mere curiosity, to the disparagement of what they seemed to know before. the knowledge—Greek, "the perfect knowledge;" the only safeguard against further novelties. Gnosticism laid hold especially of the female sex [IRENÆUS, 1, 13, 3.]; so Roman Jesuitism. 8. Now—Greek, "But;" it is no wonder there should be now such opponents to the truth, for their prototypes existed in ancient times. [ALFORD.] Jannes . . . Jambres—Traditional names of the Egyptian magicians who resisted Moses (Exodus 7, 11, 22), derived from "the unwritten teaching of the Jews." [THEODORET.] In a point so immaterial as the names, where Scripture had not recorded them, Paul takes the names which general opinion had assigned the magicians. EUSEBIUS, Preparatio Evangelica, quotes from NUMENIUS, "Jannes and Jambres were sacred scribes (a lower order of priests in Egypt) skilled in magic." HILLER interprets Jannes from the Abyssinian language a trickster, and Jambres a juggler (Acts 13, 8). resist—"withstand,"

as before. They did so by trying to rival Moses' miracles. So the false teachers shall exhibit lying wonders in the last days (Matthew 21, 21; 2 Thessalonians 2, 9; Revelation 13, 14, 15). reprobate—incapable of testing the truth (Romans 1, 28). [BENGEL.] ALFORD takes passively, "not abiding the test;" rejected on being tested (Jeremiah 6, 30). 9. they shall proceed no further—though for a time (ch. 2, 16) "they shall advance or proceed" (English Version, "increase") unto more ungodliness," yet there is a final limit beyond which they shall not be able to "proceed further" (Job 38, 11; Revelation 11, 7, 11). They themselves shall "wax worse and worse" (v. 13), but they shall at last be forever prevented from seducing others. "Often malice proceeds deeper down, when it cannot extend itself." [BENGEL.] their folly—lit., "dementation;" wise though they think themselves. shall be manifest—Greek, "shall be brought forth from concealment into open day" [BENGEL.] (1 Corinthians 4, 5). as theirs . . . was—as that of those magicians was, when not only could they no longer try to rival Moses in sending boils, but the boils fell upon themselves; so as to the lice (Exodus 8, 18; 9, 11). 10. fully known—lit., "fully followed up" and traced, viz., with a view to following me as thy pattern, so far as I follow Christ; the same Greek as Luke 1, 3, "having had perfect understanding of all things." His pious mother Lois, and grandmother Eunice, would recommend him to study fully Paul's Christian course as a pattern. He had not been yet the companion of Paul at the time of the apostle's persecutions in Antioch, Iconium, and Lystra (Acts 13, 50; 14, 5, 19), but is first mentioned as such Acts 16, 1-3. However, he was "a disciple" already, when introduced to us in Acts 16, 1-3; and as Paul calls him "my own son in the faith," he must have been converted by the apostle previously; perhaps in the visit to those parts three years before. Hence arose Timothy's knowledge of Paul's persecutions, which were the common talk of the churches in those regions about the time of his conversion. The incidental allusion to them here forms an undesigned coincidence between the history and the Epistle, indicating genuineness. [PALEY'S Horæ Paulinæ.] A forger of Epistles from the Acts would never allude to Timothy's knowledge of persecutions, when that knowledge is not expressly mentioned in the history, but is only arrived at by indirect inference; also the omission of Derbe here, in the Epistle, is in minute accordance with the fact that in Derbe no persecution is mentioned in the history, though Derbe and Lystra are commonly mentioned together. The reason why he mentions his persecutions before Timothy became his companion, and not those subsequent, was because Timothy was familiar with the latter as an eye-witness, and Paul needed not to remind him of them, but the former Timothy had trailed up by seeking the information from others, especially as the date and scene of them was the date and scene of his own conversion. doctrine—"teaching." manner of life—"conduct," "behaviour." purpose—The Greek is elsewhere usually used of God's "purpose." But here, as in Acts 11, 23, of Paul's determined "purpose of heart in cleaving unto the Lord." My set aim, or resolution, in my apostolic function, and in every action is, not my selfish gain, but the glory of God in Christ. long-suffering—towards my adversaries, and the false teachers; towards brethren in bearing their infirmities; towards the unconverted, and the lapsed when penitent (ch. 4, 2; 2 Corinthians 6, 6; Galatians 5, 22; Ephesians 4, 2; Colossians 3, 12). charity—Love to all men. patience—"endurance;" patient continuance in well-doing amidst adversities (v. 11; Romans 2, 7). 11. afflictions—"sufferings," which—Greek, "such as." in Antioch—of Pisidia (Acts 13, 14, 50, 51). Iconium—(Acts 14, 1-5). Lystra—(Acts 14, 6, 19). what—How grievous. out of . . . all . . . Lord delivered me—(Ch. 4, 17; Psalm 34, 17; 2 Corinthians 1, 10). An encouragement to Timothy not to fear persecutions. 12. Yea, and—An additional consideration for Timothy: if he wishes to live godly in Christ, he must make up his mind to encounter persecution. that will—Greek, "all whose will is to live," &c. So far should persecution be from being a stumbling-block to

COIN OF ANTIOCH IN PISIDIA.

Timothy, he should consider it a mark of the pious. So the same Greek is used of the same thing, Luke 14. 23, 33, "intending (Greek, wishing) to build a tower . . . counteth the cost." live godly in Christ—(Galatians 2. 20; Philippians 1. 21.) There is no godliness (Greek, "piously") or piety out of Christ. The world easily puts up with the mask of a religion which depends on itself, but the piety which derives its vigour directly from Christ is as odious to modern Christians as it was to the ancient Jews. [BEN-GEL.] shall suffer persecution—and will not decline it (Galatians 5. 11). BISHOP PEARSON proves the Divine origination of Christianity from its success being inexplicable on the supposition of its being of human origin. The nature of its doctrine was no way likely to command success: (1) it condemned all other religions, some established for ages; (2) it enjoins precepts ungrateful to flesh and blood, the mortifying of the flesh, the love of enemies, and the bearing of the cross; (3) it enforces these seemingly unreasonable precepts by promises seemingly incredible; not good things such as afford complacency to our senses, but such as cannot be obtained till after this life, and presuppose what then seemed impossible, the resurrection; (4) it predicts to its followers what would seem sure to keep most of the world from embracing it, persecutions. 13. Reason why persecutions must be expected, and these becoming worse and worse as the end approaches. The breach between light and darkness, so far from being healed, shall be widened. [ALFORD.] evil men—in contrast to the "godly" (v. 12), seducers—lit., "conjurers." Magical arts prevailed at Ephesus (Acts 19. 19), and had been renounced by many Ephesians on embracing Christianity: but now when Paul was writing to Ephesus, symptoms of a return to conjuring tricks appeared: an undesigned coincidence. [BURTON.] Probably sorcery will characterize the final apostasy (Revelation 13. 15; 18. 23; 22. 15). wax worse—lit., "advance in the direction of worse" (Note, v. 9). Not contradictory to that verse: there the diffusion of the evil was spoken of; here its intensity. [ALFORD.] deceiving, and being deceived—He who has once begun to deceive others, is the less easily able to recover himself from error, and the more easily embraces in turn the errors of others. [BEN-GEL.] 14. But . . . thou—Whatever they may do. Resuming the thread begun at v. 10. learned—from me and thy mother and grandmother (ch. 1. 5; 2. 2). assured of—from Scripture (v. 15). of whom—plural, not singular, in the oldest MSS., "from what teachers." Not only from me, but from Lois and Eunice. 15. from a child—lit., "from an infant." The tender age of the first dawn of reason is that wherein the most lasting impressions of faith may be made. holy Scriptures—The Old Testament taught by his Jewish mother. An undesigned coincidence with ch. 1. 5; Acts 16. 1-3. able—in themselves: though through men's own fault they often do not in fact make men savingly alive. wise unto salvation—i. e., wise unto the attainment of salvation. Contrast "folly" (v. 9). Wise also in extending it to others. through faith—as the instrument of this wisdom. Each knows Divine things only as far as his own experience in himself extends. He who has not faith, has not wisdom of salvation. which is in—i. e., rests on Christ Jesus. 16. All Scripture—Greek, "Every Scripture," i. e., Scripture in its every part. However, English Version is sustained, though the Greek article be wanting, by the technical use of the term "Scripture" being so notorious as not to need the article (cf. Greek, Ephesians 3. 15; 2. 21). The Greek is never used of writings in general, but only of the sacred Scriptures. The position of the two Greek adjectives closely united by "and," forbids our taking the one as an epithet, the other as predicated and translated as ALFORD and ELLICOTT, "Every Scripture given by inspiration of God is also profitable." Vulgate in the best MSS., favours English Version. Clearly the adjectives are so closely connected, that as surely as one is a predicate, the other must be so too. ALFORD admits his translation to be harsh, though legitimate. It is better with English Version to take it in a construction legitimate, and at the same time not harsh. The Greek, "God-inspired," is found nowhere else. Most of the New Testament books were written when Paul wrote this his latest Epistle: so he includes in the clause "All Scripture is God-inspired," not only the Old Testament, in which alone Timothy was taught when a child (v. 15), but the New Testament books according as they were recognized in the churches which had men gifted with "discerning of spirits," and so able to distinguish really inspired utterances, persons, and so their writings from spurious. St. Paul means, "All Scripture is God-inspired and therefore useful:" because we see no utility in any words or portion of it, it does not follow it is not God-inspired. It is useful, because God-inspired, not God-inspired, because useful. One reason for the article not being before the Greek, "Scripture," may be that, if it had, it might be supposed that it limited the sense to the hiera grammata, "Holy Scriptures" (v. 15) of the Old Testament, whereas here the assertion is more general: "all Scripture" (cf. Greek, 2 Peter 1. 20). The translation, "all Scripture that is God-inspired is also useful," would imply that there is some Scripture which is not God-inspired. But this would exclude the appropriated sense of the word "Scripture;" and who would need to be told that "all Divine Scripture is useful" ("profitable")? Hebrews 4. 13 would, in ALFORD's view, have to be rendered, "All naked things are also open to the eyes of Him," &c.: so also 1 Timothy 4. 4, which would be absurd. [TREGELLES on Daniel.] KNAPP well defines inspiration, "An extraordinary Divine agency upon teachers whilst giving instruction, whether oral or written, by which they were taught how and what they should speak or write" (cf. 2 Samuel 23. 1; Acts 4. 25; 2 Peter 1. 21). The inspiration gives the Divine sanction to all the words of Scripture, though those words be the utterances of the individual writer, and only in special cases revealed directly by God (1 Corinthians 2. 13). Inspiration is here predicated of the writings, "all Scripture," not of the persons. The question is not how God has done it; it is as to the word, not the men who wrote it. What we must believe is that He has done it, and that all the sacred writings are everywhere inspired, though not all alike matter of special revelation: and that even the very words are stamped with Divine sanction, as Jesus used them (ex. gr., in the temptation, and John 10. 34, 35), for deciding all questions of doctrine and practice. There are degrees of revelation in Scripture, but not of inspiration. The sacred writers did not even always know the full significance of their own God-inspired words (1 Peter 1. 10, 11, 12). Verbal inspiration does not mean mechanical dictation, but "all Scripture is (so) inspired by God," that every thing in it, its narratives, prophecies, citations, the whole—ideas, phrases, and words—are such as He saw fit to be there. The present condition of the text is no ground for concluding against the original text being inspired, but is a reason why we should use all critical diligence to restore the original inspired text. Again, inspiration may be accompanied by revelation or not, but it is as much needed for writing known doctrines or facts authoritatively, as for communicating new truths. [TREGELLES.] The omission here of the substantive verb is, I think, designed to mark that, not only the Scripture then existing, but what was still to be written till the canon should be completed, is included as God-inspired. The Old Testament law was the schoolmaster to bring us to Christ; so it is appropriately said to be "able to make wise unto salvation through faith in Jesus Christ:" the term wisdom being appropriated to a knowledge of the relations between the Old and New Testaments, and opposed to the pretended wisdom of the false teachers (1 Timothy 1. 7, 8). doctrine—Greek, "teaching," i. e., teaching the ignorant dogmatic truths which they cannot otherwise know. He so uses the Old Testament, Romans 1. 17. reproof—"refutation," convicting the erring of their error. Including polemical divinity. As an example of this use of the Old Testament, cf. Galatians 3. 6, 13, 16. "Doctrine and reproof" comprehend the speculative parts of divinity. Next follow the practical: Scripture is profitable for (1.) correction (Greek, "setting one right;" cf. an example, 1 Corinthians 10. 1-10) and instruction (Greek, "disciplining," as a father does his child, Note, ch. 2. 25; Ephesians 6. 4; Hebrews 12. 5, 11, or "training" by instruction, warning, example, kindnesses, promises, and chastisements; of an example, 1 Corinthians 5. 13). Thus the whole science of theology is complete in Scripture. Since Paul is speaking of Scripture in general and in the notion of it, the only general reason why, in order to perfecting the godly (v. 17), it should extend to every department of revealed truth, must be that it was intended to be the complete and sufficient rule in all things touching perfection. See Article VI., Common Prayer Book. In—Greek, "instruction which is in righteousness," as contrasted with the "instruction" in worldly rudiments (Colossians 2. 20, 22). 17. man of God—(Note, 1 Timothy 6. 11.) perfect, thoroughly furnished—Gr., "thoroughly perfected," and so "perfect." The man of God is perfectly accoutred out of Scripture for his work, whether he be a minister (cf. ch. 4. 2 with ch. 3. 16) or a spiritual layman. No oral tradition is needed to be added.

CHAPTER IV.

Ver. 1-22. SOLEMN CHARGE TO TIMOTHY TO DO HIS DUTY ZEALOUSLY, FOR TIMES OF APOSTASY ARE AT HAND, AND THE APOSTLE IS NEAR HIS TRIUMPHANT END. REQUESTS HIM TO COME AND BRING MARK WITH HIM TO ROME, AS LUKE ALONE IS WITH HIM, THE OTHERS HAVING GONE: ALSO HIS CLOAK AND PARCHMENT: WARNS HIM AGAINST ALEXANDER: TELLS WHAT BEFELL HIM AT HIS FIRST DEFENCE: GREETINGS: BENEDICTION. 1. charge—Greek, "adjure." therefore—Omitted in the oldest MSS. the Lord Jesus Christ—The oldest MSS. read simply, "Christ Jesus." shall judge—His commission from God is mentioned, Acts 10. 42; his resolution to do so, 1 Peter 4. 5; the execution of his commission, here. at his appearing—The oldest MSS. read, "and" for "at;" then translate, "(I charge thee before God, &c.) and by His appearing." and his kingdom—to be set at His appearing, when we hope to reign with him. His kingdom is real now, but not visible. It shall then be both real and VISIBLE (Luke 22. 18, 30; Revelation 1. 7; 11. 15; 19. 6). Now he reigns in the midst of His enemies expecting till they shall be overthrown (Psalm 110. 2; Hebrews 10. 13). Then He shall reign with His adversaries prostrate. 2. Preach—Lit., "proclaim as a herald." The term for the discourses in the synagogue was Darasechoth; the corresponding Greek term (implying dialectical style, dialogue, and discussion, Acts 17. 2, 18; 18. 4, 19) is applied in Acts to discourses in the Christian Church. JUSTIN MARTYR, Apology 2, describes the order of public worship, "On Sunday all meet, and the writings of the apostles and prophets are read; then the president delivers a discourse; after this all stand up and pray; then there is offered bread and wine and water; the president likewise prays and gives thanks, and the people solemnly assent, saying, Amen." The bishops and presbyters had the right and duty to preach, but they sometimes called on deacons, and even laymen, to preach. EUSEBIUS, Ecclesiastical History, 6. 19; in this the Church imitated the synagogue (Luke 4. 17-22; Acts 13. 15, 16). be instant—i. e., urgent, earnest, in the whole work of the ministry. in season, out of season—i. e., at all seasons; whether they regard your speaking as seasonable or unseasonable. "Just as the fountains, though none may draw from them, still flow on; and the rivers, though none drink of them, still run; so must we do all on our part in speaking, though none give heed to us." [CHRYSOSTOM, Homily, 30., vol. 5., p. 221.] I think with CHRYSOSTOM, there is included also the idea of times whether seasonable or unseasonable to Timothy himself; not merely when convenient, but when inconvenient to thee, night as well as day (Acts 20. 31), in danger as well as in safety, in prison and when doomed to death as well as when at large, not only in church, but everywhere and on all occasions, whenever and wherever the Lord's work requires it. reprove—"convict," "confute." with—Greek, "IN (the element in which the exhortation ought to have place) all long-suffering (ch. 2. 24, 25; 3. 10) and teaching;" cf. ch. 2. 24, "apt to teach." The Greek for "doctrine" here is di-

dache, but in ch. 3. 16 didascalía. "Didascalía" is what one receives; didache is what is communicated. [TITTMANN.] 3. they—professing Christians. sound doctrine—Greek, "the sound (Note, 1 Timothy 1. 10) doctrine" (didascalías) or "teaching," viz., of the Gospel. Presently follows the concrete, "teachers," after their own lusts—instead of regarding the will of God they dislike being interrupted in their lusts by true teachers. heap—one on another; an indiscriminate mass of false teachers. Variety delights itching ears. "He who despises sound teaching, leaves sound teachers; they seek instructors like themselves." [BENJEL.] It is the corruption of the people in the first instance, that creates priestcraft (Exodus 32. 1), to themselves—such as will suit their depraved tastes; "populus vult decipi, et decipiatur," the people wish to be deceived, so let them be deceived. "Like priest, like people" (1 Kings 12. 31; Hosea 4. 9). itching—liking to hear teachers who give them mere pleasure (Acts 17. 19-21), and do not offend by truths grating to their ears. They, as it were, tickle with pleasure the levity of the multitude [CICERO], who come as to a theatre to hear what will delight their ears, not to learn [SENECA, Ep. 10. 8] what will do them good. "Itch in the ears is as bad as in any other part of the body, and perhaps worse." [SOUTH.] 4. The ear brooks not what is opposed to the man's lusts. turned—Greek, "turned aside" (1 Timothy 1. 6). It is a righteous retribution, that when men turn away from the truth, they should be turned to fables (Jeremiah 2. 19). fables—(1 Timothy 1. 4). 5. I am no longer here to withstand these things; be thou a worthy successor of me, no longer depending on me for counsel, but thine own master, and swimming without the corks [CALVIN]; follow my steps, inherit their result, and the honour of their end. [ALFORD.] watch thou—lit., "with the wakefulness of one sober." in all things—on all occasions and under all circumstances (Titus 2. 7). endure affliction—suffer hardships. [ALFORD.] evangelist—A missionary bishop, preacher, and teacher. make full proof of—fulfil in all its requirements, leaving nothing undone (Acts 12. 25; Romans 15. 19; Colossians 4. 17). 6. Greek, "For I am already being offered;" lit., as a libation; appropriate to the shedding of his blood. Every sacrifice began with an initiatory libation on the victim's head (Note, cf. Philipians 2. 17). A motive to stimulate Timothy to faithfulness—the departure and final blessedness of Paul; it is the end that crowns the work. [BENJEL.] As the time of his departure was indicated to Peter, so to Paul (2 Peter 1. 14). my departure—lit., "loosing anchor" (Note, Philipians 1. 23). Dissolution. 7. "I have striven the good strife;" the Greek is not restricted to a fight, but includes any competitive contest, ex. gr., that of the race-course (1 Timothy 6. 12 [ALFORD]; 1 Corinthians 9. 24, &c.; Hebrews 12. 1, 2). kept the faith—the Christian faith committed to me as a believer and an apostle (cf. ch. 1. 14; Revelation 2. 10; 3. 10). 8. a crown—rather as Greek, "the crown." The "henceforth" marks the decisive moment; he looks to his state in a threefold aspect, (1.) The past, I have fought; (2.) the immediately present, there is laid up for me; (3.) the future, the Lord will give in that day. [BENJEL.] crown—A crown, or garland, used to be bestowed at the Greek national games on the successful competitor in wrestling, running, &c. (cf. 1 Peter 5. 4; Revelation 2. 10). of righteousness—the reward is in recognition of righteousness wrought in Paul by God's Spirit; the crown is prepared for the righteous; but it is a crown which consists in righteousness. Righteousness will be its own reward (Revelation 22. 11). Cf. Exodus 39. 30. A man is justified gratuitously by the merits of Christ through faith; and when he is so justified God accepts his works and honours them with a reward which is not their due, but is given of grace. "So great is God's goodness to men that He wills that their works should be merits, though they are merely His own gifts." [Ep., POPE CELESTINE I., 12.] give—Greek, "shall award" in righteousness equal as a "Judge" (Acts 17. 31; 2 Corinthians 5. 10; 2 Thessalonians 1. 6, 7). in that day—not until His appearing (ch. 1. 12). The partakers of the first resurrection may receive a crown also at the last day, and obtain in that general assembly of all men, a new award of praise. The favourable sentence passed on the "brethren" of the Judge, who sit with Him on His throne, is in Matthew 25. 46, taken for granted as already awarded, when that affecting those who benefited them is being passed. [BENGEI.] The former, the elect Church who reign with Christ in the millennium, are fewer than the latter. The righteous heavenly Judge stands in contrast to the unrighteous earthly judges who condemned Paul. me—individual appropriation. Greek, "Not only to me," them that love—Greek, "have loved, and do love;" habitual love and desire for Christ's appearing, which presupposes faith (cf. Hebrews 9. 23). Cf. the sad contrast, v. 10, "having loved this present world." 9. (v. 21; ch. 1. 4, 8.) Timothy is asked to come to be a comfort to Paul, and also to be strengthened by Paul, for carrying on the Gospel work after Paul's decease. 10. Demas—once a "fellow-labourer" of Paul, along with Mark and Luke (Colossians 4. 14; Philemon 24). His motive for forsaking Paul seems to have been love of worldly ease, safety, and comforts at home, and disinclination to brave danger with Paul" (Matthew 13. 20, 21, 22). CHRYSOSTOM implies that Thessalonica was his home. Galatia—One oldest MS. supports the reading "Gaul." But most oldest MSS., &c., "Galatia." Titus—He must have therefore left Crete after "setting in order" the affairs of the churches there (Titus 1. 5). Dalmatia—part of the Roman province of Illyricum on the coast of the Adriatic. Paul had written to him (Titus 3. 12) to come to him in the winter to Nicopolis (in Epirus), intending in the spring to preach the Gospel in the adjoining province of Dalmatia. Titus seems to have gone thither to carry out the apostle's intention, the execution of which was interrupted by his arrest. Whether he went of his own accord, as is likely, or being sent by Paul, which the expression "is departed" hardly accords with, cannot be positively decided. Paul here speaks only of his personal attendants having forsaken him; he had still friends among the Roman Christians who visited him (ch. 4. 21), though they had been afraid to stand by him at his trial (v. 16). 11. Take—Greek, "take up" on thy journey (Acts 20. 13, 14). John Mark was probably in, or near, Colosse, as in the Epistle to the Colossians (Colossians 4. 10), written two years before this, he is mentioned as about to visit them. Timothy was now absent from Ephesus, and somewhere in the interior of Asia Minor; hence he would be sure to fall in with Mark on his journey. he is profitable to me for the ministry—Mark had been under a cloud for having forsaken Paul at a critical moment in his missionary tour with Barnabas (Acts 15. 37-40; 13. 5, 13). Timothy had subsequently occupied the same post in relation to Paul as Mark once held. Hence Paul, appropriately here, wipes out the past censure by high praise of Mark, and guards against Timothy's making self-complacent comparisons between himself and Mark, as though he were superior to the latter (cf. Philemon 24). Demas apostatizes. Mark returns to the right way, and is no longer unprofitable, but is profitable for the Gospel ministry (Philemon 11). 12. And—Greek, "But." Thou art to come to me, but Tychicus I have sent to Ephesus to supply thy place (if thou so wilt) in presiding over the Church there in thy absence (cf. Titus 3. 12). It is possible Tychicus was the bearer of this Epistle, though the omission of "to thee" is rather against this view. 13. cloak . . . I left—Probably obliged to leave it in a hurried departure from Troas. Carpus—a faithful friend to have been entrusted with so precious deposits. The mention of his "cloak," so far from being unworthy of inspiration, is one of those graphic touches which sheds a flood of light on the last scene of Paul's life, on the confines of two worlds; in this wanting a cloak to cover him from the winter cold, in that covered with the righteousness of saints, "clothed upon with his house from heaven." [GAUSSEN.] So the inner vesture and outer garment of Jesus, Paul's master, are suggestive of most instructive thought (John 19). books—he was anxious respecting these that he might transmit them to the faithful, so that they might have the teaching of his writings when he should be gone. especially the parchments—containing perhaps some of his inspired Epistles themselves. 14. Alexander the coppersmith—or "smith" in general.

Perhaps the same as the Alexander, 1 Timothy 1. 20 (note there) at Ephesus. Excommunicated then he subsequently was restored, and now vented his personal malice because of his excommunication in accusing Paul before the Roman judges, whether of incendiarism or of introducing a new religion. See my Introduction. He may have been the Alexander put forward by the Jews in the tumult at Ephesus (Acts 19. 33, 34). reward—The oldest MSS. read, "shall reward," or "requite him." Personal revenge certainly did not influence the apostle (v. 16, end). 15. our words—the arguments of us Christians for our common faith. Believers have a common cause. 16. At my first answer—i. e., "defence" in court, at my first public examination. Timothy knew nothing of this, it is plain, till Paul now informs him. But during his former imprisonment at Rome, Timothy was with him (Philippians 1. 1, 7). This must have been, therefore, a second imprisonment. He must have been set free before the persecution in A. D. 64, when the Christians were accused of causing the conflagration in Rome; for, had he been a prisoner then, he certainly would not have been spared. The tradition [EUSEBIUS, 2. 25] that he was finally beheaded, accords with his not having been put to death in the persecution, A. D. 64, when burning to death was the mode by which the Christians were executed, but subsequently to it. His "first" trial in his second imprisonment seems to have been on the charge of complicity in the conflagration; his absence from Rome may have been the ground of his acquittal on that charge; his final condemnation was probably on the charge of introducing a new and unlawful religion into Rome. stood with me—Greek, "came forward with me" [ALFORD] as a friend and advocate. may [it] not be laid to their charge—The position of "their," in the Greek, is emphatic. "May it not be laid to THEIR charge," for they were intimidated; their drawing back from me was not from bad disposition so much as from fear; it is sure to be laid to the charge of those who intimidated them. Still Paul, like Stephen, would doubtless have offered the same prayer for his persecutors themselves (Acts 7. 60). 17. the Lord—the more because men deserted me. stood with me—stronger than "came forward with me" (Greek, v. 16). strengthened—Greek, "put strength in me." by me—"through me;" through my means. One single occasion is often of the greatest moment. the preaching—"the Gospel proclamation." might be fully known—might be fully made (note, v. 5). that all the Gentiles—present at my trial, "might hear" the Gospel proclaimed then. Rome was the capital of the Gentile world, so that a proclamation of the truth to the Romans was likely to go forth to the rest of the Gentile world. I was delivered out of the mouth of the lion—viz., Satan, the roaring, devouring lion (Luke 22. 31; 1 Peter 5. 8). I was prevented falling into his snare (ch. 2. 26; Psalm 22. 21; 2 Peter 2. 9); v. 18 agrees with this interpretation, "The Lord shall deliver me from every evil work," viz., both from evil and the Evil One, as the Greek of the Lord's Prayer expresses it. It was not deliverance from Nero (who was called the lion) which he rejoiced in, for he did not fear death (v. 6-8), but deliverance from the temptation, through fear, to deny His Lord; so ALFORD. 18. And the Lord shall—Hope draws its conclusions from the past to the future. [BENGEI.] will preserve me—lit., "will save" (Psalm 22. 21) "will bring me safe to." Jesus is the Lord and the Deliverer (Philippians 3. 20; 1 Thessalonians 1. 10: He saves from evil; He gives good things. heavenly kingdom—Greek, "His kingdom which is a heavenly one." to whom, &c.—Greek, "to whom be the glory unto the ages of ages." The very hope produces a doxology; how much greater will be the doxology which the actual enjoyment shall produce! [BENGEI.] 19. Prisca and Aquila—(Acts 18. 2, 3; Romans 16. 3, 4; 1 Corinthians 16. 19, written from Ephesus, where therefore Aquila and Priscilla must then have been.) household of Onesiphorus—If he were dead at the time the "household" would not have been called "the household of Onesiphorus." He was probably absent (note, ch. 1. 16). 20. In order to deplete his desertion, he informs Timothy that Erastus, one of his usual companions (Acts 19. 22, possibly the same Erastus as in Romans

16, 23, though how he could leave his official duties for missionary journeys is not clear), stayed behind at Corinth, his native place, or usual residence, of which city he was "chamberlain," or city steward and treasurer (Romans 16, 23); and Trophimus he left behind at Miletus sick. (See on his former history, Acts 20, 4; 21, 29.) This verse is irreconcilable with the imprisonment from which he writes being the first: for he did not pass by Corinth or Miletus on his way to Rome when about to be imprisoned for the first time. As Miletus was near Ephesus, there is a presumption that Timothy was not at Ephesus when Paul wrote, or he would not need to inform Timothy of Trophimus lying sick in his immediate neighbourhood. However, Trophimus may not have been still at Miletus at the time when Paul wrote, though he had left him there on his way to Rome. Prisca and Aquila were most likely to be at Ephesus (v. 19), and he desires Timothy to salute them: so also Onesiphorus' household (ch. 1, 18). Paul had not the power of healing at will (Acts 19, 12), but as the Lord allowed him. 21. before winter—when a voyage, according to ancient usages of navigation, would be out of the question: also, Paul would need his "cloak" against the winter (v. 13). Pudens . . . Claudia—afterwards husband and wife (according to MARTIAL IV., 13; XI., 54), he a Roman knight, she a Briton, surnamed Rufina. TACITUS, Agricola, 14, mentions that territories in south-east Britain were given to a British king, Cogidunus, in reward for his fidelity to Rome, A. D. 52, whilst Claudius was emperor. In 1772 a marble was dug up at Chichester, mentioning Cogidunus with the surname Claudius, added from his patron, the emperor's name; and Pudens in connection with Cogidunus, doubtless his father-in-law. His daughter would be Claudia, who seems to have been sent to Rome for education, as a pledge of the father's fidelity. Here she was under the protection of Pomponia, wife of Aulus Plautius, conqueror of Britain. Pomponia was accused of foreign superstitions, A. D. 57 [TACITUS, Annals, 3, 32], probably Christianity. She probably was the instrument of converting Claudia, who took the name Rufina from her, that being a cognomen of the Pomponian gens (cf. Romans 16, 13, Rufus, a Christian). Pudens in Martial and in the Chichester inscription, appears as a pagan; but perhaps he or his friends concealed his Christianity through fear. Tradition represents Timothy, a son of Pudens, as taking part in converting the Britons. Litus—put third; therefore not at this time yet, as he was afterwards, bishop. His name being here inserted between Pudens and Claudia, implies the two were not yet married. "Eubulus" is identified by some with Aristobulus, who, with his converts, is said to have been among the first Evangelists of Britain. Paul himself, says CLEMENT, "visited the farthest west [perhaps Britain, certainly Spain], and was martyred under the rulers at Rome," who were Nero's vicegerents in his absence from the city. 22. Grace be with you—Plural in oldest MSS., "with you," i. e., thee and the members of the Ephesian and neighbouring churches.

THE EPISTLE OF PAUL TO

TITUS.

INTRODUCTION.

GENUINENESS.—CLEMENT OF ROME quotes it (Epistola ad Corinthios, c. 2); IRENEUS (3, 3, sec. 4) refers to it as Paul's; THEOPHILUS, ad Autolytus, 3., sec. 14, quotes it as Scripture. Cf. CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA, Stromata, 1, 239; TERTULLIAN, Præscriptione Hæreticorum, 6.

TIME AND PLACE OF WRITING.—This Epistle seems to have been written from Corinth [BIRKS], subsequently to his first imprisonment, when Paul was on his way to Nicopolis (ch. 3, 12) in Epirus, where he purposed passing the winter, shortly before his martyrdom, A. D. 67. BIRKS thinks, from the similarity of the Epistle to Titus and First Timothy, that both were written from the same place, Corinth, and at dates not widely apart; First Timothy shortly after coming to Corinth, before he had planned a journey to Epirus, the Epistle to Titus afterwards. The journey to Crete and Ephesus for the bearers of his letters would be easy from Corinth, and he could himself thence easily pass into Epirus. He had shortly before visited Crete, wherein a Church existed (though without due organization), the first foundation of which he may have partly laid at his former visit (Acts 27, 7, &c.), when on his way to his first imprisonment at Rome. That he returned to the East after his first imprisonment appears most probable from Philipplans 2, 24; Philemon 22. However, there may have been seeds of Christianity sown in Crete, even before his first visit, by the Cretans who heard Peter's preaching on Pentecost (Acts 2, 11).

OCCASION OF WRITING.—Corrupt elements soon showed themselves in the Cretan Church, similar to those noticed in the Epistles to Timothy as existing in the Ephesian Church, Judaism, false pretensions to science, and practical ungodliness. Paul, on his late visit, had left Titus in Crete to establish Church government, and ordain presbyters (deacons are not mentioned). Titus had been several times employed by Paul on a mission to the Corinthian Churches, and had probably thence visited Crete, which was within easy reach of Corinth. Hence the suitability of his selection by the apostle for the superintendence of the Cretan Church. Paul now follows up with instructions by letter those he had already given to Titus in person on the qualifications of elders, and the graces becoming the old, the young, and females, and warns him against the unprofitable speculations so rife in Crete. The national character of the Cretans was low in the extreme, as EPIMENIDES, quoted in ch. 1, 12, paints it. LIVY, 44, 45, stigmatizes their avarice; POLYBULUS, 6, 46, 9, their ferocity and fraud; and 6, 47, 5, their mendacity, so much so, that "to Cretanize" is another name for to lie: they were included in the proverbial three infamous initials K or C, "Cappadocia, Crete, Cilicia."

NOTICES OF TITUS.—It is strange that he is never mentioned by this name in Acts, and there seems none of those mentioned in that book who exactly answers to him. He was a Greek, and therefore a Gentile (Galatians 2, 1, 3), and converted by Paul (ch. 1, 4). He accompanied the apostle on the deputation sent from the Church of Antioch to Jerusalem, to consult the apostles respecting the circumcision of Gentile converts (Acts 15, 2); and, agreeably to the decree of the council there, was not circumcised. He was in company with Paul at Ephesus, whence he was sent to Corinth to commence the collection for the Jerusalem saints, and to ascertain the effect of the First Epistle on the Corinthians (2 Corinthians 7, 6-9; 8, 6; 12, 18), and there showed an unmercenary spirit. He next proceeded to Macedonia, where he joined Paul, who had been already eagerly expecting him at Troas (2 Corinthians 2, 12, 13, "Titus my brother;" 7, 6). He was then employed by the apostle in preparing the collection for the poor saints in Judea, and became the bearer of the Second Epistle to the Corinthians (2 Corinthians 8, 16, 17, 23). Paul in it calls him "my partner and fellow-helper concerning you." His being located in Crete (Titus 1. 5) was subsequent to Paul's first imprisonment, and shortly before the second, about 67 A. D., ten years subsequent to the last notice of him in Second Corinthians, 57 A. D. He probably met Paul, as the apostle desired, at Nicopolis; for his subsequent journey into Dalmatia, thence (or else from Rome, whither he may have accompanied Paul) would be more likely, than from the distant Crete (2 Timothy 4. 10, written subsequently to the Epistle to Titus). In the unsettled state of things then, Titus' episcopal commission in Crete was to be but temporary, Paul requiring the presence of Titus with himself, whenever Artemas or Tycheus should arrive in Crete and set him free from his duties there.

Tradition represents him to have died peaceably in Crete, as archbishop of Gortyna, at an advanced age.

CHAPTER I.

Ver. 1-16. ADDRESS: FOR WHAT END TITUS WAS LEFT IN CRETE. QUALIFICATIONS FOR ELDERS: GAINSAYERS IN CRETE NEEDING REPROOF. 1. servant of God—not found elsewhere in the same connection. In Romans 1. 1 it is "servant of Jesus Christ" (Galatians 1. 10; Philippians 1. 1; cf. Acts 16. 17; Revelation 1. 1; 15. 3). In Romans 1. 1, there follows, "called to be an apostle," which corresponds to the general designation of the office first, "servant of God," here, followed by the special description, "apostle of Jesus Christ." The full expression of his apostolic office answers, in both Epistles, to the design, and is a comprehensive index to the contents. The peculiar form here would never have proceeded from a forger, according to the faith—rather, "for," "with a view to subserve the faith;" this is the object of my apostleship (cf. v. 4, 9; Romans 1. 5), the elect—for whose sake we ought to endure all things (2 Timothy 2. 10). This election has its ground, not in anything belonging to those thus distinguished, but in the purpose and will of God from everlasting (2 Timothy 1. 9; Romans 8. 30-33; cf. Luke 13. 7; Ephesians 1. 4; Colossians 3. 12). Acts 13. 48 shows that all faith on the part of the elect, rests on the Divine foreordination; they do not become elect by their faith, but receive faith, and so become believers, because they are elect. and the acknowledging of the truth—"and (for promoting) the full knowledge of the truth," i. e., the Christian truth (Ephesians 1. 13). after godliness—i. e., which belongs to piety: opposed to the knowledge which has not for its object the truth, but error, doctrinal and practical (v. 11, 16; 1 Timothy 6. 3); or even which has for its object mere earthly truth, not growth in the Divine life. "Godliness," or "piety," is a term peculiar to the pastoral Epistles: a fact explained by the apostle having in them to combat doctrine tending to "ungodliness" (2 Timothy 2. 16; cf. ch. 2. 11, 12). 2. In hope of eternal life—Connected with the whole preceding sentence. That whereon rests my aim as an apostle to promote the elects' faith and full knowledge of the truth, is, "the hope of eternal life" (ch. 2. 13; 3. 7; Acts 23. 6; 24. 15; 28. 20). that cannot lie—(Romans 3. 4; 11. 29; Hebrews 6. 18.) promised before the world began—A contracted expression for "purposed before the world began (lit., before the ages of time), and promised actually in time," the promise springing from the eternal purpose; as in 2 Timothy 1. 9, the gift of grace was the result of the eternal purpose "before the world began." 3. In due times—Greek, "in its own seasons," the seasons appropriate to it, and fixed by God for it (Acts 1. 7). manifested—implying that the "promise," v. 2, had lain hidden in His eternal purpose heretofore (cf. Colossians 1. 26; 2 Timothy 1. 9, 10). his word—equivalent to "eternal life" (v. 2; John 5. 24; 6. 63; 17. 3, 17), through preaching—Greek, "in preaching," or rather as ALFORD (Note, cf. 2 Timothy 4. 17), "in the (Gospel) proclamation (the thing preached the Gospel) with which I was entrusted," according to—in pursuance of (cf. 1 Timothy 1. 1). of God our Saviour—rather as Greek, "of our Saviour God," God is Redeemer of our Saviour (cf. Jude 25; Luke 1. 47). Also Psalm 24. 5; Isaiah 12. 2; 45. 15, 21, LXX. Applied to Jesus, v. 4; ch. 2. 13; 3. 6; 2 Timothy 1. 10. 4. Titus, mine own son—Greek, "my genuine child" (1 Timothy 1. 2), i. e., converted by my instrumentality (1 Corinthians 4. 17; Philemon 10). after the common faith—A genuine son in respect to (in virtue of) the faith common to all the people of God, comprising in a common brotherhood Gentiles as well as Jews, therefore embracing Titus a Gentile (2 Peter 1. 1; Jude 3). Grace, mercy, and peace—"Mercy" is omitted in some of the oldest MSS. But one of the best and oldest MSS. supports it (Notes, cf. 1 Timothy 1. 2; 2 Timothy 1. 2). There are many similarities of phrase in the Pastoral Epistles. the Lord Jesus Christ—The oldest MSS. read only "Christ Jesus." our Saviour—found thus added to "Christ" only in Paul's Pastoral Epistles, and 2 Peter 1. 1, 11; 2. 20; 3. 18. 5. I left thee—"I left thee behind" [ALFORD] when I left the island: not implying permanence of commission (cf. 1 Timothy 1. 3). in Crete—now Candia. set in order—rather as Greek, "that thou mightest follow up (the work begun by me) setting right the things that are wanting," which I was unable to complete by reason of the shortness of my stay in Crete. Christianity, doubtless, had long existed in Crete: there were some Cretans among those who heard Peter's preaching on Pentecost (Acts 2. 11). The number of Jews in Crete was large (v. 10), and it is likely that those scattered in the persecution of Stephen (Acts 11. 19) preached to them, as they did to the Jews of Cyprus, &c. Paul also was there on his voyage to Rome (Acts 27. 7-12). By all these instrumentalities the Gospel was sure to reach Crete. But until Paul's later visit, after his first imprisonment at Rome, the Cretan Christians were without Church organization. This Paul began, and had commissioned (before leaving Crete) Titus to go on with, and now reminds him of that commission. ordain—rather, "appoint," "constitute," in every city—"from city to city," as I . . . appointed thee—i. e., as I directed thee; prescribing as well the act of constituting elders, as also the manner of doing so, which latter includes the qualifications required in a presbyter presently stated. Those called "elders" here are called "bishops," v. 7. Elder is the term of dignity in relation to the college of presbyters; bishop points to the duties of his office in relation to the flock. From the unsound state of the Cretan Christians described here, we see the danger of the want of Church government. The appointment of presbyters was designed to check idle talk and speculation, by setting forth the "faithful word." 6. (Notes, cf. 1 Timothy 3. 2-4.) The thing dwelt on here as the requisite in a bishop, is a good reputation among those over whom he is to be set. The immorality of the Cretan professors rendered this a necessary requisite in one who was to be a reprover; and their unsoundness in doctrine also made needful great steadfastness in the faith (v. 9, 13). having faithful children—i. e., believing children. He who could not bring his children to faith, how shall he bring others? [BENGEL.] ALFORD explains, "established in the faith," not accused—Not merely not riotous, but "not (even) accused of riot" ("profligacy" [ALFORD]; "Dissolute life" [WAHL]). unruly—insubordinate; opposed to "in subjection" (1 Timothy 3. 4). 7. For . . . must—The emphasis is on must. The reason why I said "blameless," is the very idea of a "bishop" (an overseer of the flock; he here substitutes for "presbyter" the term which expresses his duties) involves the necessity for such blamelessness, if he is to have influence over the flock. steward of God—The greater the master is, the greater the virtues required in His servant [BENGEL] (1 Timothy 3. 15); the Church is God's house, over which the minister is set as a steward (Hebrews 3. 2-6; 1 Peter 4. 10, 17). Note, ministers are not merely Church officers, but God's stewards; Church government is of Divine appointment. not self-willed—lit., "self-pleasing;" unaccommodating to others; harsh, the opposite of "a lover of hospitality" (v. 6); so Nabal (1

Samuel 25.); self-loving and imperious; such a spirit would incapacitate him for leading a willing flock, instead of driving. nor given to wine—(Notes, 1 Timothy 3. 3, 8.) not given to filthy lucre—not making the Gospel a means of gain (1 Timothy 3. 3, 8). In opposition to those "teaching for filthy lucre's sake" (v. 11; 1 Timothy 6. 5; 1 Peter 5. 2). 8. lover of hospitality—needed especially in those days (Romans 12. 13; 1 Timothy 3. 2; Hebrews 13. 2; 1 Peter 4. 9; 3 John 5). Christians travelling from one place to another were received and forwarded on their journey by their brethren. lover of good men—Greek, "a lover of (all that is) good," men or things (Philippians 4. 8, 9). sober—towards one's self; "discreet;" self-restrained" [ALFORD.] (Note, 1 Timothy 2. 9.) just—towards men. holy—towards God (Note, 1 Thessalonians 2. 10). temperate—"One having his passions, tongue, hand, and eyes, at command" [CHRYSOSTOM]; "continent." 9. Holding fast—Holding firmly to (cf. Matthew 6. 21; Luke 16. 13). the faithful—true and trustworthy (1 Timothy 1. 15). word as he has been taught—lit., "the word (which is) according to the teaching" which he has received (cf. 1 Timothy 4. 6, end; 2 Timothy 3. 14). by—translate as Greek, "to exhort in doctrine (instruction) which is sound;" sound doctrine or instruction is the element in which his exhorting is to have place. On "sound" (peculiar to the Pastoral Epistles), see 1 Timothy 1. 10; 6. 3. convince—rather, "reprove" [ALFORD] (v. 13). 10. unruly—"insubordinate." and—Omitted in the oldest MSS. "There are many unruly persons, vain talkers, and deceivers;" "unruly" being predicated of both vain talkers and deceivers. vain talkers—opposed to "holding fast the faithful word" (v. 9). "Vain jangling" (1 Timothy 1. 6); "foolish questions, unprofitable and vain" (ch. 3. 9). The source of the evil was corrupted Judaism (v. 14). Many Jews were then living in Crete, according to JOSEPHUS; so the Jewish leaven remained in some of them after conversion. deceivers—lit., "deceivers of the minds of others" (Greek, Galatians 6. 3). 11. mouths . . . stopped—lit., "muzzled," "bridled" as an unruly beast (cf. Psalm 32. 9). who—Greek, "(seeing that they are) such men as;" or "inasmuch as they," [ELLICOTT.] subvert . . . houses—"overthrowing" their "faith" (2 Timothy 2. 18). "They are the devil's levers by which he subverts the houses of God" [THEOPHYLACT]. for filthy lucre—(1 Timothy 3. 3, 8; 6. 5.) 12. One—Epimenides of Phæstus, or Gnosius, in Crete, about 600 B. C. He was sent for to purify Athens from its pollution occasioned by Cylon. He was regarded as a diviner and prophet. The words here are taken probably from his treatise "concerning oracles." Paul also quotes from two other heathen writers, ARATUS (Acts 17. 28) and MENANDER (1 Corinthians 15. 33), but he does not honour them so far as even to mention their names. of themselves . . . their own—which enhances his authority as a witness. "To Cretanize" was proverbial for to lie; as "to Corinthianize" was for to be dissolute. always liars—not merely at times, as every natural man is. Contrast v. 2, "God that cannot lie." They love "fables" (v. 14); even the heathen poets laughed at their lying assertion that they had in their country the sepulchre of Jupiter. evil beasts—rude, savage, cunning, greedy. Crete was a country without wild beasts. Epimenides' sarcasm was that its human inhabitants supplied the place of wild beasts. slow bellies—indolent through pampering their bellies. They themselves are called "bellies," for that is the member for which they live (Romans 16. 18; Philippians 3. 19). 13. This witness—"This testimony (though coming from a Cretan) is true." sharply—Gentleness would not reclaim so perverse offenders. that they—that those seduced by the false teachers may be brought back to soundness in the faith. Their malady is strifes about words and questions (ch. 3. 9; 1 Timothy 6. 4). 14. Jewish fables—(Notes, 1 Timothy 1. 4; 4. 7; 2 Timothy 4. 4.) These formed the transition stage to subsequent Gnosticism; as yet the error was but profitless, and not tending to godliness, rather than openly opposed to the faith. commandments of men—as to ascetic abstinence (v. 15; Mark 7. 7-9; Colossians 2. 16, 20-23; 1 Timothy 4. 3). that turn from the truth—whose characteristic is that they turn away from the truth (2 Timothy 4. 4). 15. all things—external, "are pure" in themselves; the distinction of pure and impure is not in the things, but in the disposition of him who uses them; in opposition to "the commandments of men" (v. 14), which forbade certain things as if impure intrinsically. "To the pure" inwardly, i. e., those purified in heart by faith (Acts 15. 9; Romans 14. 20; 1 Timothy 4. 3), all outward things are pure; all are open to their use. Sin alone touches and defiles the soul (Matthew 23. 26; Luke 11. 41). nothing pure—either within or without (Romans 14. 23). mind—their mental sense and intelligence. conscience—their moral consciousness of the conformity or discrepancy between their motives and acts on the one hand, and God's law on the other. A conscience and a mind defiled are represented as the source of the errors opposed in the Pastoral Epistles (1 Timothy 1. 19; 3. 9; 6. 5). 16. They profess—i. e., make a profession acknowledging God. He does not deny their theoretical knowledge of God, but that they practically know Him. deny him—The opposite of the previous "profess" or "confess" Him (1 Timothy 5. 8; 2 Timothy 2. 12; 3. 5). abominable—themselves, though laying so much stress on the contracting of abomination from outward things (cf. Leviticus 11. 10-13; Romans 2. 22). disobedient—to God (ch. 3. 3; Ephesians 2. 2; 5. 6). reprobate—rejected as worthless when tested (Notes, Romans 1. 28; 1 Corinthians 9. 27; 2 Timothy 3. 8).

CHAPTER II.

Ver. 1-15. DIRECTIONS TO TITUS: HOW TO EXHORT VARIOUS CLASSES OF BELIEVERS: THE GRACE OF GOD IN CHRIST OUR GRAND INCENTIVE TO LIVE GODLY. 1. But . . . thou—in contrast to the reprobate seducers stigmatized ch. 1, 11, 15, 16. "He deals more in exhortations, because those intent on useless questions needed chiefly to be recalled to the study of a holy, moral life; for nothing so effectually allays men's wandering curiosity, as the being brought to recognize those duties in which they ought to exercise themselves." [CALVIN.] speak—without restraint: contrast ch. 1. 11, "mouths . . . stopped." doctrine—"instruction" or "teaching." 2. sober—translated "vigilant," as sober men alone can be, 1 Timothy 3. 2. But "sober" here answers to "not given to wine," v. 3; ch. 1. 7. grave—"dignified;" behaving with reverent propriety. temperate—"self-restrained;" "discreet" [ALFORD] (ch. 1. 8; 1 Timothy 2. 9). faith . . . charity [love] . . . patience—combined in 1 Timothy 6. 11. "Faith, hope, charity" (1 Corinthians 13. 13). "Patience," Greek, "enduring perseverance," is the attendant on, and is supported by, "hope" (1 Corinthians 13. 7; 1 Thessalonians 1. 3). It is the grace which especially becomes old men, being the fruit of ripened experience derived from trials overcome (Romans 5. 3). 3. behaviour—"deportment. as becometh holiness"—"as becometh women consecrated to God" [WAILL]; being by our Christian calling priestesses unto God (Ephesians 5. 3; 1 Timothy 2. 10). "Observant of sacred decorum." [BENGEL.] not false accusers—not slanderers: a besetting sin of some elderly women. given to much wine—the besetting sin of the Cretans (ch. 1. 12). Lit., "enslaved to much wine." Addiction to wine is slavery (Romans 6. 16; 2 Peter 2. 19). teachers—in private: not in public (1 Corinthians 14. 34; 1 Timothy 2. 11, 12); influencing for good the younger women by precept and example. 4. to be sober—Greek, "self-restrained," "discreet;" the same Greek as in v. 2, "temperate." But see Note; cf. Note, 2 Timothy 1. 7. ALFORD therefore translates, "That they school [admonish in their duty] the young women to be lovers of their husbands," &c. (the foundation of all domestic happiness). It was judicious that Titus, a young man, should admonish the young women, not directly, but through the elder women. 5. keepers at home—as "guardians of the house," as the Greek expresses. The oldest MSS. read, "Workers at home;" active in household duties (Proverbs 7. 11; 1 Timothy 5. 13). good—kind, beneficent (Matthew 20. 15; Romans 5. 7; 1 Peter 2. 18). Not churlish and niggardly, whilst thrifty as housewives. obedient—rather

"submissive," as the Greek is translated, see Notes, Ephesians 5. 21, 22, 24. their own—marking the duty of subjection which they owe them, as being their own husbands (Ephesians 5. 22; Colossians 3. 18). blasphemed—"evil spoken of." That no reproach may be cast on the Gospel, through the inconsistencies of its professors (v. 8, 10; Romans 2. 24; 1 Timothy 5. 14; 6. 1). "Unless we are virtuous, blasphemy will come through us to the faith." [THEOPHYLACT.] 6. Young—Greek, "The younger men," sober-minded—self-restrained. [ALFORD.] "Nothing is so hard at this age as to overcome pleasures and follies." [CHRYSOSTOM.] 7. In—With respect to all things. thyself a pattern—though but a young man thyself. All teaching is useless, unless the teacher's example confirm his word. in doctrine—in thy ministerial teaching (showing) uncorruptness, i. e., untainted purity of motive on thy part (cf. 2 Corinthians 11. 3), so as to be "a pattern" to all. As "gravity," &c., refers to Titus himself, so "uncorruptness;" though, doubtless, uncorruptness of the doctrine will be sure to follow as a consequence of the Christian minister being of simple, uncorrupt integrity himself. gravity—dignified seriousness in setting forth the truth. sincerity—Omitted in the oldest MSS. 8. speech—discourse in public and private ministrations. he that is of the contrary part—the adversary (ch. 1. 9; 2 Timothy 2. 25), whether he be heathen or Jew. may be ashamed—put to confusion by the power of truth and innocence (cf. v. 5, 10; 1 Timothy 5. 14; 6. 1). no evil thing—in our acts, or demeanour. of you—So one of the oldest MSS. Other very old MSS. read, "of us," Christians. 9. servants—"slaves," to please them well—"to give satisfaction." [ALFORD.] To be pleaisant in everything; to have that zealous desire to gain the master's good-will which will anticipate the master's wish and do even more than is required. The reason for the frequent recurrence of injunctions to slaves to subjection (Ephesians 6. 5, &c.; Colossians 3. 22; 1 Timothy 6. 1, &c.; 1 Peter 2. 18) was, that in no rank was there more danger of the doctrine of the spiritual equality and freedom of Christians being misunderstood, than in that of slaves. It was natural for the slave who had become a Christian, to forget his place and put himself on a social level with his master. Hence the charge for each to abide in the sphere in which he was when converted (1 Corinthians 7. 20-24). not answering again—in contradiction to the master: so the Greek, "not contradicting." [WAHL.] 10. Not purloining—Greek, "Not appropriating" what does not belong to one. It means "keeping back" dishonestly or deceitfully (Acts 5. 2, 3). showing—manifesting in acts. all—all possible. good—really good; not so in mere appearance (Ephesians 6. 5, 6; Colossians 3. 22-24). "The heathen do not judge of the Christian's doctrines from the doctrine, but from his actions and life." [CHRYSOSTOM.] Men will write, fight, and even die for their religion; but how few live for it! Translate, "That they may adorn the doctrine of our Saviour God," i. e., God the Father, the originating author of salvation (cf. Note, 1 Timothy 1. 1). God deigns to have His Gospel-doctrine adorned even by slaves, who are regarded by the world as no better than beasts of burden. "Though the service be rendered to an earthly master, the honour redounds to God, as the servant's good-will flows from the fear of God." [THEOPHYLACT.] Even slaves, low as is their status, should not think the influence of their example a matter of no consequence to religion: how much more those in a high position. His love in being "Our Saviour" is the strongest ground for our adorning His doctrine by our lives. This is the force of "For" in v. 11. 11. the grace of God—God's gratuitous favour in the scheme of redemption. hath appeared—Greek, "hath been made to appear," or "shine forth" (Isaiah 9. 2; Luke 1. 79), "hath been manifested" (ch. 3. 4), after having been long hidden in the loving counsels of God (Colossians 1. 26; 2 Timothy 1. 9, 10). The image is illustrated Acts 27. 20. The grace of God hath now been embodied in Jesus, "the brightness of the Father's glory," manifested as the "Sun of righteousness," "the Word made flesh." The Gospel dispensation is hence termed "the day" (1 Thessalonians 5. 5, 8; there is a double "appearing," that of "grace" here, that of "glory," v. 13; cf. Romans 13. 12). Connect it not as English Version, but, "The grace . . . that bringeth salvation to all men hath appeared," or "been manifested" (1 Timothy 2. 4; 4. 10). Hence God is called "Our Saviour" (v. 10). The very name Jesus means the same. to all—of whom he enumerated the different classes (v. 2-9): even to servants; to us Gentiles, once aliens from God. Hence arises our obligation to all men (ch. 3. 2). 12. Teaching—Greek, "disciplining us." Grace exercises discipline, and is imparted in connection with disciplining chastisements (1 Corinthians 11. 32; Hebrews 12. 6, 7). The education which the Christian receives from "the grace" of God is a discipline often trying to flesh and blood: just as children need disciplining. The discipline which it exercises teaches us to deny ungodliness and worldly lusts, and to live soberly, righteously, and godly, in this present world (Greek, age, or course of things) where such self-discipline is needed, seeing that its spirit is opposed to God (ch. 1. 12, 16; 1 Corinthians 1. 20; 3. 18, 19): in the coming world we may gratify every desire without heed of self-discipline, because all desires there will be conformable to the will of God. that—Greek, "in order that;" the end of the "disciplining" is "in order that . . . we may live soberly," &c. This point is lost by the translation, "teaching us." denying . . . lusts—(Luke 9. 23.) The Greek aorist expresses "denying once for all." We deny them when we withhold our consent from them, when we refuse the delight which they suggest, and the act to which they solicit us, nay, tear them up by the roots out of our soul and mind [ST. BERNARD, Serm. 11]. worldly lusts—The Greek article expresses, "the lusts of the world," "all worldly lusts" [ALFORD] (Galatians 5. 16; Ephesians 2. 3; 1 John 2. 15-17; 5. 19). The world (cosmos) will not come to an end when this present age (axon) or course of things shall end. live soberly, righteously, and godly—the positive side of the Christian character; as "denying . . . lusts" was the negative. "Soberly," i. e., with self-restraint, in relation to one's self; "righteously" or justly, in relation to our neighbour; "godly" or piously, in relation to God (not merely amiably and justly, but something higher, godly, with love and reverence toward God). These three comprise our "disciplining" in faith and love, from which he passes to hope (v. 13). 13. (Philippians 3. 20, 21.) looking for—with constant expectation (so the Greek) and with joy (Romans 8. 19). This will prove the antidote to worldly lusts, and the stimulus to "live in this present world" conformably to this expectation. The Greek is translated "waiting for" in Luke 2. 25. that—Greek, "the." blessed—bringing blessedness (Romans 4. 7, 8). hope—i. e., object of hope (Romans 8. 24; Galatians 5. 5; Colossians 1. 5). the glorious appearing—There is but one Greek article to both "hope" and "appearing," which marks their close connection (the hope being about to be realized only at the appearing of Christ). Translate, "The blessed hope and manifestation (cf. Note, v. 11) of the glory." The Greek for "manifestation" is translated "brightness," 2 Thessalonians 2. 8. As His "coming" (Greek, parousia) expresses the fact; so "brightness, appearing," or "manifestation" (epiphancia) expresses His personal visibility when He shall come. the great God and our Saviour Jesus—There is but one Greek article to "God" and "Saviour," which shows that both are predicated of one and the same Being. "Of Him who is at once the great God and our Saviour." Also (2) "appearing" (epiphancia) is never by Paul predicated of God the Father (John 1. 18; 1 Timothy 6. 16), or even of "His glory" (as ALFORD explains 1): it is invariably applied to CHRIST'S coming, to which (at His first advent, cf. 2 Timothy 1. 10) the kindred verb "appeared" (ephepancee), v. 11, refers (1 Timothy 6. 14; 2 Timothy 4. 1, 8). Also (3), in the context (v. 14) there is no reference to the Father, but to Christ alone; and here there is no occasion for reference to the Father in the exigencies of the context. Also (4), the expression "great God," as applied to Christ, is in accordance with the context, which refers to the glory of His appearing; just as "the true God" is predicated of Christ, 1 John 5. 20. The phrase occurs nowhere else in the New Testament, but often in the Old Testament. Deuteronomy 7. 21; 10. 17, predicated of Jehovah, who, as their manifested Lord, led the Israelites through the wilderness, doubtless the Second Person in the Trinity. Believers now look for the manifestation of His glory, inasmuch as they shall share in it. Even the Socinian explanation, making "the great God" to be the Father, "our Saviour," the Son, places God and Christ on an equal relation to "the glory" of the future appearing: a fact incompatible with the notion that Christ is not Divine, indeed it would be blasphemy so to couple any mere created being with God. 14. gave himself—"The forcible 'Himself, His whole self, the greatest gift ever given; must not be overlooked." for us—Greek, "in our behalf." redeem us—deliver us from bondage by paying the price of His precious blood. An appropriate image in addressing bond servants (v. 9, 10). from all iniquity—the essence of sin, viz., "transgression of the law;" in bondage to which we were till then. The aim of His redemption was to redeem us, not merely from the penalty, but from the being of all iniquity. Thus he reverts to the "teaching" in righteousness, or disciplining effect of the grace of God that bringeth salvation (v. 11, 12). peculiar—peculiarly His own, as Israel was of old. zealous—in doing and promoting "good works." 15. with all authority—translate, "authoritativeness" (cf. "sharply," ch. 1. 13). Let no man despise thee—Speak with such vigour as to command respect (1 Timothy 4. 12). Warn them with such authority that no one may think himself above (so the Greek tit.) the need of admonition. [TITMANN, Synonyms of New Testament.]

CHAPTER III.

Ver. 1-15. WHAT TITUS IS TO TEACH CONCERNING CHRISTIANS' BEHAVIOUR TOWARDS THE WORLD: HOW HE IS TO TREAT HERETICS: WHEN AND WHERE HE IS TO MEET PAUL. SALUTATION. CONCLUSION. 1. Put them in mind—as they are in danger of forgetting their duty, though knowing it. The opposition of Christianity to heathenism, and the natural disposition to rebellion of the Jews under the Roman empire (of whom many lived in Crete), might lead many to forget practically what was a recognized Christian principle in theory, submission to the powers that be. Diodorus Siculus mentions the tendency of the Cretans to riotous insubordination. principalities . . . powers—Greek, "magistracies . . . authorities." to be subject—willingly (so the Greek). to obey—the commands of "magistrates" not necessarily implying spontaneous obedience. Willing obedience is implied in "ready to every good work." Cf. Romans 13. 3, as showing that obedience to the magistracy would tend to good works, since the magistrate's aim generally is to favour the good and punish the bad. Contrast "disobedient" (v. 3). 2. To speak evil of no man—especially, not of "dignities" and magistrates. no brawlers—"not quarrelsome," not attacking others. gentle—towards those who attack us. Yielding, considerate, not urging one's rights to the uttermost, but forbearing and kindly (Note, Philippians 4. 5). Very different from the innate greediness and spirit of aggression towards others which characterized the Cretans. showing—in acts, all—possible. meekness—(Note, 2 Corinthians 10. 1)—the opposite of passionate severity. unto all men—The duty of Christian conduct towards all men is the proper consequence of the universality of God's grace to all men, so often set forth in the pastoral Epistles. 3. For—our own past sins should lead us to be lenient towards those of others. "Despise none, for such wast thou also," as the penitent thief said to his fellow-thief, "Dost thou not fear God . . . seeing that thou art in the same condemnation." we—Christians. were—Contrast v. 4, "But when," &c., i. e., now: a favourite contrast in Paul's writing, that between our past state by nature, and our present state of deliverance from it by grace. As God treated us, we ought to treat our neighbour. sometimes—once, foolish—Wanting right reason in our course of living. Irrational. The exact picture of human life without grace. Grace is the sole remedy even for foolishness. disobedient—to God.

deceived—led astray. The same Greek, "out of the way," Hebrews 5. 2. servings—Greek, "in bondage to," "servings as slaves." divers—the cloyed appetite craves constant variety. pleasures—of the flesh. malice—malignity. hateful . . . hating—Correlatives. Provoking the hatred of others by their detestable character and conduct, and in turn hating them. 4. To show how little reason the Cretan Christians had to be proud of themselves, and despise others not Christians (Notes, v. 2, 3). It is to the "kindness and love of God," not to their own merits, that they owe salvation. kindness—Greek, "goodness," "benignity," which manifests His grace. love . . . toward man—teaching us to have such "love (benevolence) toward man" (Greek, philanthropy), "showing all meekness unto all men" (v. 2), even as God had "toward man" (ch. 2. 11); opposed to the "hateful and hating" characteristics of unrenewed men, whose wretchedness moved God's benevolent kindness. of God our Saviour—Greek, "of our Saviour God," viz., the Father (ch. 1. 3), who "saved us" (v. 5) "through Jesus Christ our Saviour" (v. 6). appeared—Greek, "was made to appear;" was manifested. 5. Not by—Greek, "Out of;" "not as a result springing from works," &c. of righteousness—Greek, "in righteousness," i. e., wrought in a state of righteousness; as "deeds . . . wrought in God." There was an utter absence in us of the element ("righteousness") in which alone righteous works could be done, and so necessarily an absence of the works. "We neither did works of righteousness, nor were saved in consequence of them; but His goodness did the whole." [THEOPHYLACT.] we—emphatically opposed to "His." mercy—the prompting cause of our salvation individually: "In pursuance of His mercy." His kindness and love to man were manifested in redemption once for all wrought by Him for mankind generally; His mercy is the prompting cause for our individual realization of it. Faith is pre-supposed as the instrument of our being "saved;" our being so, then, is spoken of as an accomplished fact. Faith is not mentioned, but only God's part, as Paul's object here is not to describe man's new state, but the saving agency of God in bringing about that state, independent of all merit on the man's part (Note, v. 4). by—Greek, "through;" by means of. the washing—rather, "the laver," i. e., the baptismal font, or lavatory. of regeneration—designed to be the visible instrument of regeneration. "The apostles are wont to draw an argument from the sacraments to prove the thing therein signified, because it ought to be a recognized principle among the godly, that God does not mark us with empty signs, but by His power inwardly makes good what he demonstrates by the outward sign. Wherefore baptism is congruously and truly called the laver of regeneration. We must connect the sign and thing signified, so as not to make the sign empty and ineffectual; and yet not, for the sake of honouring the sign, to detract from the Holy Spirit what is peculiarly His" [CALVIN] (1 Peter 3. 21). Adult candidates for baptism are presupposed to have had repentance and faith (for Paul often assumes in faith and charity that those addressed are what they profess to be, though in fact some of them were not so, 1 Corinthians 6. 11), in which case baptism would be the visible "laver of regeneration" to them, "faith being thereby confirmed, and grace increased, by virtue of prayer to God" (Church of England, Article 27). Infants are charitably presumed to have received a grace in connection with their Christian descent, in answer to the believing prayers of their parents or guardians presenting them for baptism, which grace is visibly sealed and increased by baptism, "the laver of regeneration." They are presumed to be then regenerated, until years of developed consciousness prove whether they have been actually so or not. "Born of (from) water and (no 'of' in Greek) the Spirit." The Word is the remote and anterior instrument of the new birth; Baptism, the proximate instrument. The Word, the instrument to the individual; Baptism, in relation to the Society of Christians. The laver of cleansing stood outside the door of the tabernacle, wherein the priest had to wash before entering the Holy Place; so we must wash in the laver of regeneration before we can enter the Church, whose members are "a royal priesthood." "Baptism by the Spirit" (whereof water-baptism is the designed accompanying seal) makes the difference between Christian baptism and that of John. As Paul presupposes the outward Church is the visible community of the redeemed, so he speaks of baptism on the supposition that it answers to its idea; that all that is inward belonging to its completeness accompanied the outward. Hence he here asserts of outward baptism whatever is involved in the believing appropriation of the Divine facts which it symbolizes, whatever is realized when baptism fully corresponds to its original design. So Galatians 3. 27; language holding good only of those in whom the inward living communion and outward baptism coalesce. "Saved us" applies fully to those truly regenerate alone; in a general sense it may include many who, though put within reach of salvation, shall not finally be saved. "Regeneration" occurs only once more in New Testament, Matthew 19. 28, i. e., the new birth of the heaven and earth at Christ's second coming to renew all material things, the human body included, when the creature, now travelling in labour-throes to the birth, shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the children of God. Regeneration, which now begins in the believer's soul, shall then be extended to his body, and thence to all creation. and renewing—not "the laver" ('washing') of renewing," but "and by the renewing," &c., following "saved us." To make "renewing of the Holy Ghost" follow "the laver," would destroy the balance of the clauses of the sentence, and would make baptism the seal, not only of regeneration, but also of the subsequent process of progressive sanctification ("renewing of the Holy Ghost"). Regeneration is a thing once for all done; renewing is a process daily proceeding. As "the washing," or "laver," is connected with "regeneration," so the "renewing of the Holy Ghost" is connected with "shed on us abundantly" (v. 6). 6. Which—The Holy Ghost. he shed—Greek, "poured out;" not only on the Church in general at Pentecost, but also "on us" individually. This pouring out of the Spirit comprehends the grace received before, in, and subsequently to, baptism. abundantly—Greek, "richly" (Colossians 3. 16). through Jesus Christ—the channel and Mediator of the gift of the Holy Ghost. our Saviour—immediately; as the Father is mediately "our Saviour." The Father is the author of our salvation, and saves us by Jesus Christ. 7. That, &c.—the purpose which He aimed at in having "saved us" (v. 5), viz., "That being (having been) justified (accounted righteous through faith at our 'regeneration,' and made righteous by the daily 'renewing of the Holy Ghost') by His grace (as opposed to works, v. 5) we should be made heirs." his grace—Greek, "the grace of the former," i. e., God (v. 4; Romans 5. 15). heirs—(Galatians 3. 29.) according to the hope of eternal life—ch. 1. 2, and also the position of the Greek words, confirm English Version, i. e., agreeably to the hope of eternal life; the eternal inheritance fully satisfying the hope. BENGE, ELICOTT, &c., explain it, "heirs of eternal life, in the way of hope," i. e., not yet in actual possession. Such a blessed hope, which once was not possessed, will lead a Christian to practice holiness and meekness toward others, the lesson especially needed by the Cretans. 8. Greek, "faithful is the saying." A formula peculiar to the Pastoral Epistles. Here "the saying" is the statement (v. 4-7) as to the gratuitousness of God's gift of salvation. Answering to the "Amen." these things, &c. Greek, "Concerning these things (the truths dwelt on, v. 4-7; not as English Version, what follow), I will that thou affirm (insist) strongly and persistently, in order that they who have believed God (the Greek for 'believed in God' is different, John 14. 1. 'They who have learnt to credit God' in what He saith) may be careful ('solemnly sedulous,' diligence is necessary) to maintain (lit., 'to set before themselves so as to sustain') good works." No longer applying their care to "unprofitable" and unpractical speculations (v. 9). these things—These results of doctrine ("good works") are "good and profitable unto men," whereas no such practical results flow from "foolish questions." So GROTIUS and WIESINGER. But ALFORD, to avoid the tautology, "these (good works) are good unto men," explains, "these truths" (v. 4-7). 9. foolish—Greek, "insipid;" producing no moral fruit. "Vain talkers." genealogies—akin to the "fables" (see Note, 1 Timothy 1. 4). Not so much direct heresy as yet is here referred to, as profitless discussions about genealogies of eons, &c., which ultimately led to Gnosticism. Synagogue discourses were termed daraschoth, i. e., discussions. Cf. "disputer of this world (Greek, dispensation)," strivings about the law—about the authority of the "commandments of men," which they sought to confirm by the law (ch. 1. 14; Note, 1 Timothy 1. 7), and about the mystical meaning of the various parts of the law in connection with the "genealogies," avoid—stand aloof from. Same Greek, as in Note, 2 Timothy 2. 16. 10. heretic—Greek heresy, originally meant a division resulting from individual self-will; the individual doing and teaching what he chose independently of the teaching and practice of the Church. In course of time it came to mean definitely "heresy" in the modern sense; and in the later Epistles it has almost assumed this meaning. The heretics of Crete, when Titus was there, were in doctrine followers of their own self-willed "questions" reprobated in v. 9, and immoral in practice. reject—decline, avoid; not formal excommunication, but, "have nothing more to do with him," either in admonition or intercourse. 11. is . . . subverted—"is become perverse." condemned of himself—He cannot say, no one told him better; continuing the same after frequent admonition he is self-condemned. "He sinneth" wilfully against knowledge. 12. When I shall send [have sent] Artemas or Tychicus—to supply thy place in Crete. Artemas is said to have been subsequently bishop of Lystra. Tychicus was sent twice by Paul from Rome to Lesser Asia in his first imprisonment (which shows how well qualified he was to become Titus' successor in Crete); Ephesians 6. 21; and in his second, 2 Timothy 4. 12. Tradition makes him subsequently bishop of Chalcedon, in Bithynia. Nicopolis—"The city of victory," called so from the battle of Actium, in Epirus. This Epistle was probably written from Corinth in the autumn. Paul purposed a journey through Etolia and Acarnania, into Epirus, and there "to winter." See my Introduction to the pastoral Epistles. 13. Bring . . . on their journey—Enable them to proceed forward by supplying necessities for their journey. Zenas—the contracted form of Zenodorus. lawyer—A Jewish "scribe," who, when converted, still retained the title from his former occupation. A civil lawyer. Apollos—with Zenas, probably the bearers of this Epistle. In 1 Corinthians 16. 12, Apollos is mentioned as purposing to visit Corinth; his now being at Corinth (on the theory of Paul being at Corinth when he wrote) accords with this purpose. Crete would be on his way either to Palestine or his native place, Alexandria. Paul and Apollos thus appear in beautiful harmony in that very city where their names had been formerly the watchword of unchristian party work. It was to avoid this party rivalry that Apollos formerly was unwilling to visit Corinth, though Paul desired him. HIPPOLYTUS mentions Zenas as one of the Seventy, and afterwards bishop of Diopolis. 14. And . . . also—Greek, "But . . . also." Not only thou, but let others also of "our" fellow-believers (or "whom we have gained over at Crete") with thee, for necessary uses—to supply the necessary wants of Christian missionaries and brethren, according as they stand in need in their journeys for the Lord's cause. Cf. ch. 1. 8, "a lover of hospitality." 15. Greet—"Salute them that love us in the faith." All at Crete had not this love rooted in faith, the true bond of fellowship. A salutation peculiar to this Epistle, such as no forger would have used. Grace—Greek. "The grace," viz., of God. with you all—not that the Epistle is addressed to all the Cretan Christians, but Titus would naturally impart it to his flock.

THE EPISTLE OF PAUL TO PHILEMON.

INTRODUCTION.

THE testimonies to its authenticity are—ORIGEN, Homily 19, on Jerem., vol. 1., p. 185, Ed. Hucl., cites it as the letter of Paul to Philemon concerning ONESIMUS; TERTULLIAN, against Marcion, 5. 21, "The brevity of this Epistle is the sole cause of its escaping the falsifying hands of Marcion;" EUSEBIUS, Ecclesiastical History, 3. 25, mentions it among "the universally acknowledged Epistles of the canon;" JEROME, Prooemium in Philemonem, vol. iv., p. 412, argues for it against those who objected to its canonicity on the ground of its subject being beneath an apostle to write about. IGNATIUS, Eph. 2., and Magnes. 12., seems to allude to Philemon 20. Cf. Epistle to POLYCARP (ch. 1. and 6). Its brevity is the cause of its not being often quoted by the Fathers. PALEY, Horæ Paulinæ, has shown striking proofs of its authenticity in the undesigned coincidences between it and the Epistle to the Colossians.

PLACE AND TIME OF WRITING.—This Epistle is closely linked with the Epistle to the Colossians. Both were carried by the same bearer, ONESIMUS (with whom, however, Tychicus is joined in this Epistle to the Colossians), Colossians 4. 9. The persons sending salutations are the same, except one, Jesus called Justus (Colossians 4. 11). In both alike Archippus is addressed (v. 2; Colossians 4. 17). Paul and Timothy stand in the headings of both. And in both Paul appears as a prisoner (v. 9; Colossians 4. 18). Hence it follows, it was written at the same time and place as the Epistle to the Colossians (which was about the same time as the Epistle to the Ephesians), viz., at Rome, during Paul's first imprisonment, A. D. 61 or 62.

OBJECT.—ONESIMUS, of Colosse ("one of you," Colossians 4. 9), slave of Philemon, had fled from his master to Rome, after having probably defrauded him (v. 18). He there was converted to Christianity by St. Paul, and being induced by him to return to his master, he was furnished with this Epistle, recommending him to Philemon's favourable reception, as being now no longer a mere servant, but also a brother in Christ. Paul ends by requesting Philemon to prepare him a lodging, as he trusted soon to be set free and visit Colosse. This Epistle is addressed also to Apphia, supposed from its domestic subject to have been Philemon's wife, and Archippus (a minister of the Colossian Church, Colossians 4. 17), for the same reason, supposed to be a near relative and inmate.

Onesimus in the Apostolical Canons (73), is said to have been emancipated by his master. The Apostolical Constitutions (7. 46) state that he was consecrated by Paul, bishop of Berea, in Macedonia, and that he was martyred at Rome. IGNATIUS, Epistola ad Ephesus, ch. 1., speaks of him as bishop of the Ephesians.

STYLE.—It has been happily termed, from its graceful and delicate urbanity, "the polite Epistle." Yet there is nothing of insincere compliment, miscalled politeness by the world. It is manly and straightforward, without misrepresentation or suppression of facts; at the same time that it is most captivatingly persuasive. ALFORD quotes Luther's eloquent description, "This Epistle showeth a right, noble, lovely example of Christian love. Here we see how St. Paul layeth himself out for the poor Onesimus, and with all his means pleadeth his cause with his master, and so setteth himself as if he were Onesimus, and had himself done wrong to Philemon. Yet all this doeth he, not with force, as if he had right thereto, but he stripped himself of his right, and thus enforceth Philemon to forego his right also. Even as Christ did for us with God the Father, thus also doth St. Paul for Onesimus with Philemon: for Christ also stripped Himself of His right, and by love and humility enforced (?) the Father to lay aside His wrath and power, and to take us to His grace for the sake of Christ, who lovingly pleadeth our cause, and with all His heart layeth Himself out for us; for we are all His Onesimi, to my thinking."

Ver. 1-25. ADDRESS. THANKSGIVING FOR PHILEMON'S LOVE AND FAITH. INTERCESSION FOR ONESIMUS. CONCLUDING REQUEST AND SALUTATIONS. This Epistle affords a specimen of the highest wisdom as to the manner in which Christians ought to manage social affairs on more exalted principles. 1. prisoner of Jesus Christ—one whom Christ's cause has made a prisoner (cf. "in the bonds of the Gospel," v. 13). He does not call himself, as in other Epistles, "Paul an apostle," as he is writing familiarly, not authoritatively. our . . . fellow-labourer—in building up the Church at Colosse, while we were at Ephesus. See my Introduction to Colossians. 2. Apphia—The Latin "Appia." Either the wife or some close relative of Philemon. She and Archippus, if they had not belonged to his family, would not have been included with Philemon in the address of a letter on a domestic matter. Archippus—a minister of the Colossian Church (Colossians 4. 17). fellow-soldier—(2 Timothy 2. 3.) Church in thy house—In the absence of a regular Church building, the houses of particular saints were used for that purpose. Observe St. Paul's tact in associating with Philemon those associated by kindred or Christian brotherhood with his house, and not going beyond it. 4. always—Joined by ALFORD with "I thank my God." 5. Hearing—The ground of his thanksgiving. It is a delicate mark of authenticity, that he says "hearing" as to churches and persons whom he had not seen or then visited. Now Colosse, Philemon's residence, he had never yet seen. Yet v. 19 here implies that Philemon was his convert. Philemon, doubtless, was converted at Ephesus, or in some other place where he met Paul. love and faith—The theological order is first faith, then love, the fruit of faith. But he purposely puts Philemon's love in the first place, as it is to an act of love that he is exhorting him. toward . . . toward—Different Greek words: towards . . . unto. Towards implies simply direction; unto, to the advantage of. 6. That, &c.—The aim of my thanksgiving and prayers for thee is, in order that thee, &c. the communication of thy faith—the imparting of it and its fruits (viz., acts of love and beneficence: as Hebrews 13. 16, "To communicate," i. e., to impart a share) to others; or, the liberality to others flowing from thy faith (so the Greek is translated, "liberal distribution," 2 Corinthians 9. 13). effectual by—Greek, "IN:" the element in which his liberality had place, i. e., may be proved by acts in, &c. acknowledging—Greek, "the thorough knowledge," i. e., the experimental or practical recognition. of every good thing which is in you—The oldest MSS. read, "which is in us," i. e., the practical recognition of every grace which is in us Christians, in so far as we realize the Christian character. In short, that thy faith may by acts be proved to be "a faith which worketh by love." in Christ Jesus—rather as Greek, "unto Christ Jesus," i. e., to the glory of Christ Jesus. Two of the oldest MSS. omit "Jesus." This verse answers to v. 5, "Thy love and faith toward all saints:" Paul never ceases to mention him in his prayers, in order that his faith may still further show its power in his relation to others, by exhibiting every grace which is in Christians to the glory of Christ. Thus he paves the way for the request in behalf of Onesimus. 7. For—A reason for the prayer, v. 4-6. we have—Greek, "we had." joy and consolation—Joined in 2 Corinthians 7. 4. servants are refreshed by thee—his house was open to them. brother—put last, to conciliate his favourable attention to the request which follows. 8. Wherefore—Because of my love to thee, I prefer to "beseech," rather than "enjoin," or authoritatively command. I might . . . enjoin—In virtue of the obligation to obedience which Philemon lay under to Paul, as having been converted through his instrumentality. in Christ—the element in which his boldness has place. 9. for love's sake—mine to thee, and [what ought to be] thine to Onesimus. Or, that Christian love of which thou showest so bright an example (v. 7). being such an one—Explain, Being such a one as thou knowest me to be, viz., Paul (the founder of so many churches, and an apostle of Christ, and thy father in the faith) the aged (a circumstance calculated to secure thy respect for anything I request), and now also a prisoner of Jesus Christ (the strongest claim I have on thy regard: if for no other reason, at least in consideration of this, through commiseration gratify me). 10. I beseech thee—Emphatically repeated from v. 9. In the Greek, the name "Onesimus" is skilfully put last; he puts first a favourable description of him before he mentions the name that had fallen into so bad repute with Philemon. "I beseech thee for my son, whom I have begotten in my bonds, Onesimus." Scripture does not sanction slavery, but at the same time does not begin a political crusade against it. It sets forth principles of love to our fellowmen which were sure (as they have done) in due time to undermine and overthrow it, without violently convulsing the then existing political fabric, by stirring up slaves against their masters. 11. Which . . . was . . . unprofitable—Belying his name Onesimus, which means profitable. Not only was he unprofitable, but positively injurious, having "wronged" his master. Paul uses a mild expression. now profitable—Without godliness a man is in no station. Profitable in spiritual, as well as in temporal things. 12. mine own bowels—as dear to me as my own heart. [ALFORD.] Cf. v. 17, "as myself." The object of my most intense affection as that of a parent for a child. 13. I—Emphatical. I for my part. Since I had such implicit trust in him as to desire to keep him with me for his services, thou mayest. I would have retained—Different Greek from the "would," v. 14, "I could have wished," "I was minded" here; but "I was not willing," &c., v. 14. in thy stead—that he might supply in your place all the services to me which you, if you were here, would render in virtue of the love you bear to me (v. 19). bonds of the Gospel—my bonds endured for the Gospel's sake (v. 9). 14. without thy mind—i. e., consent. should not be as—"should not appear as a matter of necessity, but of free will." Had Paul kept Onesimus, however willing to gratify Paul, in fact, Philemon might be, he would have no opportunity given him of showing he was so, his leave not having been asked. 15. perhaps—speaking in human fashion, yet as one believing that God's Providence probably (for we cannot dogmatically define the hidden purposes of God in providence) overruled the past evil to ultimately greater good to him. This thought would soften Philemon's indignation at Onesimus' past offence. So Joseph in Genesis 45. 5. departed—lit., "was parted from thee:" a softening term for "ran away," to mitigate Philemon's wrath. receive him—Greek, Have him for thyself in full possession (note, Philippians 4. 18). The same Greek as in Matthew 6. 2. for ever—in this life and in that to come

(cf. Exodus 21. 6). Onesimus' time of absence, however long, was but a short "hour" (so Greek) compared with the everlasting devotion henceforth binding him to his master. 16. No longer as a mere servant or slave (though still he is that), but above a servant, so that thou shalt derive from him not merely the services of a slave, but higher benefits: a servant "in the flesh," he is a brother "in the Lord." beloved, specially to me—who am his spiritual father, and who have experienced his faithful attentions. Lest Philemon should dislike Onesimus being called "brother," Paul first recognizes him as a brother, being the spiritual son of the same God. much more unto thee—to whom he stands in so much nearer and more lasting relation. 17. a partner—in the Christian fellowship of faith, hope, and love. receive him as myself—Resuming "receive him that is mine own bowels." 18. Greek, "But if (thou art not inclined to 'receive him' because) he hath wronged thee:" a milder term than "robbed thee." Onesimus seems to have confessed some such act to Paul, put that on mine account—I am ready to make good the loss to thee if required. The latter parts of v. 19, 21, imply that he did not expect Philemon would probably demand it. 19. with mine own hand—not employing an amanuensis, as in other Epistles: a special compliment to Philemon which he ought to show his appreciation of by granting Paul's request. Contrast Colossians 4. 13, which shows that the Epistle to the Colossian Church, accompanying our Epistle, had only its closing "salutation" written by Paul's own hand. albeit, &c.—lit., "that I may not say . . . not to say," &c. thou owest . . . even thine own self—not merely thy possessions. For to my instrumentality thou owest thy salvation. So the debt which "he oweth thee" being transferred upon me (I making myself responsible for it) is cancelled. 20. let me—"Me" is emphatic: "Let me have profit (so Greek 'for joy,' onaimen, referring to the name Onesimus, 'profitable') from thee, as thou shouldst have had from Onesimus:" for "thou owest thine own self to me." in the Lord—not in worldly gain, but in time increase in the graces of the Lord's Spirit. [ALFORD.] my bowels—my heart. Gratify my feelings by granting this request. in the Lord—The oldest MSS. read, "in Christ." The element or sphere in which this act of Christian love naturally ought to have place. 21. Having confidence in thy obedience—to my apostolic authority, if I were to "enjoin" it (v. 8), which I do not, preferring to beseech thee for it as a favour (v. 9). thou wilt also do more—towards Onesimus: hinting at his possible manumission by Philemon, besides being kindly received. 22. This prospect of Paul's visiting Colosse would tend to secure a kindly reception for Onesimus, as Paul would know in person how he had been treated. your . . . you—Referring to Philemon, Apphia, Archippus, and the Church in Philemon's house. The same expectation is expressed by him, Philippians 2. 23, 24, written in the same imprisonment. 23. The same persons send salutations in the accompanying Epistle, except that "Jesus Justus" is not mentioned here. Epaphras, my fellow-prisoner—he had been sent by the Colossian Church to inquire after, and minister to, Paul, and possibly was cast into prison by the Roman authorities on suspicion. However, he is not mentioned as a prisoner in Colossians 4. 12, so that "fellow-prisoner" here may mean merely one who was a faithful companion to Paul in his imprisonment, and by his society put himself in the position of a prisoner. So also "Aristarchus, my fellow-prisoner," Colossians 4. 10, may mean. Benson conjectures the meaning to be that on some former occasion these two were Paul's "fellow-prisoners," not at the time. 25. be with your spirit—(Galatians 6. 18; 2 Timothy 4. 22.)

THE EPISTLE OF PAUL THE APOSTLE TO THE H E B R E W S .
 INTRODUCTION.

CANONICITY AND AUTHORSHIP.—CLEMENT OF ROME, at the end of the first century, A. D., copiously uses it, adopting its words just as he does those of the other books of the New Testament; not indeed giving to either the term "Scripture," which he reserves for the Old Testament (the canon of the New Testament not yet having been formally established), but certainly not ranking it below the other New Testament acknowledged Epistles. As our Epistle claims authority on the part of the writer, CLEMENT'S adoption of extracts from it is virtually sanctioning its authority, and this in the apostolic age. JUSTIN MARTYR quotes it as Divinely authoritative, to establish the titles "apostle," as well as "angel," as applied to the Son of God. CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA refers it expressly to Paul, on the authority of PANTÆNUS, chief of the Catechetical school in Alexandria, in the middle of the second century, saying, that as Jesus is termed in it the "apostle" sent to the Hebrews, Paul, through humility, does not in it call himself apostle of the Hebrews, being apostle to the Gentiles. CLEMENT also says that Paul, as the Hebrews were prejudiced against him, prudently omitted to put forward his name in the beginning; also, that it was originally written in Hebrew for the Hebrews, and that Luke translated it into Greek for the Greeks, whence the style is similar to that of Acts. He, however, quotes frequently the words of the existing Greek Epistle as St. Paul's words. ORIGEN similarly quotes it as St. Paul's Epistle. However, in his Homilies, he regards the style as distinct from that of Paul, and as "more Grecian," but the thoughts as the apostle's; adding that the "ancients who have handed down the tradition of its Pauline authorship, must have had good reason for doing so, though God alone knows the certainty who was the actual writer" (i. e., probably "transcriber" of the apostle's thoughts). In the African Church, in the beginning of the third century, TERTULLIAN ascribes it to Barnabas. IRENÆUS, bishop of Lyons, is mentioned in EUSEBIUS, as quoting from this Epistle, though without expressly referring it to Paul. About the same period, CAIUS, the presbyter, in the Church of Rome, mentions only thirteen Epistles of Paul, whereas, if the Epistle to the Hebrews were included, there would be fourteen. So the canon fragment of the end of the second century, or beginning of the third, published by MURATORI, apparently omits mentioning it. And so the Latin Church did not recognize it as Paul's till a considerable time after the beginning of the third century. Thus, also, NOVATIAN OF ROME, CYPRIAN OF CARTHAGE, and VICTORINUS, also of the Latin Church. But in the fourth century, HILARY OF POITIERS (A. D. 368), LUCIFER OF CAGLIARI (A. D. 371), AMBROSE OF MILAN (A. D. 397) and other Latins, quote it as Paul's; and the fifth Council of Carthage (A. D. 419) formally reckons it among his fourteen Epistles.

As to the similarity of its style to that of St. Luke's writings, this is due to his having been so long the companion of Paul. CHRYSOSTOM, comparing Luke and Mark, says, "Each imitated his teacher: Luke imitated Paul flowing along with more than river-fulness; but Mark imitated Peter, who studied brevity of style." Besides, there is a greater predominance of Jewish feeling and familiarity with the peculiarities of the Jewish schools apparent in this Epistle than in St. Luke's writings. There is no clear evidence for attributing the authorship to him, or to Apollos, whom ALFORD upholds as the author. The grounds alleged for the latter view are its supposed Alexandrian phraseology and modes of thought. But these are such as any Palestinian Jew might have used; and Paul, from his Hebræo-Hellenistic education at Jerusalem and Tarsus, would be familiar with Philo's modes of thought, which are not, as some think, necessarily all derived from his Alexandrian, but also from his Jewish education. It would be unlikely that the Alexandrian Church should have so undoubtedly asserted the Pauline authorship, if Apollos, their own countryman, had really been the author. The eloquence of its style and rhetoric, a characteristic of Apollos' at Corinth, whereas Paul there spoke in words unadorned by man's wisdom, are doubtless designedly adapted to the minds of those whom St. Paul in this Epistle addresses. To the Greek Corinthians, who were in danger of idolizing human eloquence and wisdom, he writes in an unadorned style, in order to fix their attention more wholly on the Gospel itself. But the Hebrews were in no such danger. And his Hebræo-Grecian education would enable him to write in a style attractive to the Hebrews at Alexandria, where Greek philosophy had been blended with Judaism. The Sep-tuagint translation framed at Alexandria had formed a connecting link between the latter and the former; and it is remarkable that all the quotations from the Old Testament, excepting two (ch. 10. 30; 13. 5), are taken from the LXX. The fact that the peculiarities of the LXX. are interwoven into the argument, proves that the Greek Epistle is an original, not a translation; had the original been Hebrew, the quotations would have been from the Hebrew Old Testament. The same conclusion follows from the plays on similarly-sounding words in the Greek, and alliterations, and rhythmically-constructed periods. CALVIN observes, if the Epistle had been written in Hebrew, ch. 9. 15-17 would lose all its point, which consists in the play upon the double meaning of the Greek diathece, a "covenant," or a "testament," whereas the Hebrew berith means only "covenant."

Internal evidence favours the Pauline authorship. Thus the topic so fully handled in this Epistle, that Christianity is superior to Judaism, inasmuch as the reality exceeds the type which gives place to it, is a favourite one with St. Paul (cf. 2 Corinthians 3. 6-18; Galatians 3. 23-25; 4. 1-9, 21-31, wherein the allegorical mode of interpretation appears in its divinely sanctioned application—a mode pushed to an unwarrantable excess in the Alexandrian school). So the Divine Son appears in ch. 1. 3, &c., as in other Epistles of Paul (Philippians 2. 6; Colossians 1. 15-20), as the Image, or manifestation of the Deity. His lowering of Himself for man's sake similarly, cf. ch. 2. 9, with 2 Corinthians 8. 9; Philippians 2. 7, 8. Also His final exaltation, cf. ch. 2. 8; 10. 13; 12. 2, with 1 Corinthians 15. 25, 27. The word "Mediator" is peculiar to Paul alone, cf. ch. 8. 6, with Galatians 3. 19, 20. Christ's death is represented as the sacrifice for sin prefigured by the Jewish sacrifices, cf. Romans 3. 22-26; 1 Corinthians 5. 7, with Hebrews 7. to 10. The phrase, "God of Peace," is peculiar to St. Paul, cf. ch. 13. 20; Romans 15. 33; 1 Thessalonians 5. 23. Also, cf. ch. 2. 4, Margin, 1 Corinthians 12. 4. Justification, or "righteousness by faith," appears in ch. 11. 7; 10. 38, as in Romans 1. 17; 4. 22; 5. 1; Galatians 3. 11; Philippians 3. 9. The word of God is the "sword of the Spirit," cf. ch. 4. 12, with Ephesians 6. 17. Inexperienced Christians are children needing milk, i. e., instruction in the elements, whereas riper Christians, as full grown men, require strong meat, cf. ch. 5. 12, 13; 6. 1, with 1 Corinthians 3. 1, 2; 14. 20; Galatians 4. 9; Colossians 3. 14. Salvation is represented as a boldness of access to God by Christ, cf. ch. 10. 19, with Romans 5. 2; Ephesians 2. 18; 3. 12. Afflictions are a fight, ch. 10. 32; cf. Philippians 1. 30; Colossians 2. 1. The Christian life is a race, ch. 12. 1; cf. 1 Corinthians 9. 24; Philippians 3. 12-14. The Jewish ritual is a service, Romans 9. 4; cf. ch. 9. 1, 6. Cf. "subject to bondage," ch. 2. 15, with Galatians 5. 1. Other characteristics of Paul's style appear in this Epistle, viz., a propensity "to go off at a word" and enter on a long parenthesis suggested by that word, a fondness for play upon words of similar sound, and a disposition to repeat some favourite word. Frequent appeals to the Old Testament, and quotations linked by "and again," cf. ch. 1. 5; 2. 12, 13, with Romans 15. 9-12. Also quotations in a peculiar application, cf. ch. 2. 8, with 1 Corinthians 15. 27; Ephesians 1. 22. Also the same passage quoted in a form not agreeing with the LXX., and with the addition "saith the Lord," not found in the Hebrew, in ch. 10. 30; Romans 12. 19.

The supposed Alexandrian (which are rather Philon-like) characteristics of the Epistle are probably due to the fact that the Hebrews were generally then imbued with the Alexandrian modes of thought of Philo, &c.; and Paul, without colouring or altering Gospel truth "to the Jews, became (in style) as a Jew, that he might win the Jews" (1 Corinthians 9. 20). This will account for its being recognized as St. Paul's Epistle in the Alexandrian and Jerusalem churches unanimously, and to the Hebrews of whom probably it was addressed. Not one Greek father ascribes the Epistle to any but Paul, whereas in the Western and Latin churches, which it did not reach for some time, it was for long doubted, owing to its anonymous form, and generally less distinctively Pauline style. Their reason for not accepting it as Paul's, or indeed as canonical, for the first three centuries, was negative, insufficient evidence for it, not positive evidence against it. The positive evidence is generally for its Pauline origin. In the Latin churches, owing to their distance from the churches to whom belonged the Hebrews addressed, there was no generally received tradition on the subject. The Epistle was in fact but little known at all, whence we find it is not mentioned at all in the canon of Muratorii. When at last, in the fourth century, the Latins found that it was received as Pauline and canonical on good grounds in the Greek churches, they universally acknowledged it as such.

The personal notices all favour its Pauline authorship, viz., his intention to visit those addressed, shortly, along with Timothy, styled "our brother," ch. 13. 23; his being then in prison, ch. 13. 19; his formerly having been imprisoned in Palestine, according to English Version reading, ch. 10. 34; the salutations transmitted to them from believers of Italy, ch. 13. 24. A reason for not prefixing the name may be the rhetorical character of the Epistle which led the author to waive the usual form of epistolary address.

DESIGN.—His aim is to show the superiority of Christianity over Judaism, in that it was introduced by one far higher than the angels or Moses, through whom the Jews received the law, and in that its priesthood and sacrifices are far less perfecting as to salvation than those of Christ; that He is the substance of which the former are but the shadow, and that the type necessarily gives place to the antitype; and that now we no longer are kept at a comparative distance as under the law, but have freedom of access through the opened veil, i. e., Christ's flesh; hence he warns them of the danger of apostasy, to which Jewish converts were tempted, when they saw Christians persecuted, whilst Judaism was tolerated by the Roman authorities. He infers the obligations to a life of faith, of which, even in the less perfect Old Testament dispensation, the Jewish history contained bright examples. He concludes in the usual Pauline mode, with practical exhortations and pious prayers for them.

HIS MODE OF ADDRESS is in it hortatory rather than commanding, just as we might have expected from St. Paul addressing the Jews. He does not write to the rulers of the Jewish Christians, for in fact there was no exclusively Jewish Church; and his Epistle, though primarily addressed to the Palestinian Jews, was intended to include the Hebrews of all adjoining churches. He inculcates obedience and respect in relation to their rulers (ch. 13. 7, 17, 24); a tacit obviating of the objection that he was by writing this Epistle interfering with the prerogative of Peter the apostle of the circumcision, and James the bishop of Jerusalem. Hence arises his gentle and delicate mode of dealing with them (Hebrews 13. 22). So far from being surprised at discrepancy of style between an Epistle to Hebrews and Epistles to Gentile Christians, it is just what we should expect. The Holy Spirit guided him to choose means best suited to the nature of the ends aimed at. WORDSWORTH notices a peculiar Pauline Greek construction, Romans 12. 9. lit., "Let your love be without dissimulation, ye abhorring . . . evil, cleaving to . . . good," which is found nowhere else save Hebrews 13. 5. lit., "Let your conversation be without covetousness, ye being content with," &c. (a noun singular feminine nominative absolute, suddenly passing into a participle masculine nominative plural absolute). So in quoting Old Testament Scripture, the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews quotes it as a Jew writing to Jews would, "God spoke to our fathers," not "It is written." So ch. 13. 18, "We trust we have a good conscience" is an altogether Pauline sentiment (Acts 23. 1; 24. 16; 2 Corinthians 1. 12; 4. 2; 2 Timothy 1. 3). Though he has not prefixed his name, he has given at the close his universal token to identify him, viz., his apostolic salutation, "Grace be with you all;" this "salutation with his own hand" he declared (2 Thessalonians 3. 17, 18) to be "his token in every Epistle;" so 1 Corinthians 16. 21, 23; Colossians 4. 13. The same prayer of greeting closes every one of his Epistles, and is not found in any one of the Epistles of the other apostles written in St. Paul's lifetime; but it is found in the last book of the New Testament Revelation, and subsequently in the Epistle of Clement of Rome. This proves that, by whomsoever the body of the Epistle was committed to writing (whether a mere amanuensis writing by dictation, or a companion of Paul by the Spirit's gift of interpreting tongues, 1 Corinthians 12. 10, transfusing Paul's Spirit-taught sentiments into his own Spirit-guided diction), Paul at the close sets his seal to the whole as really his, and sanctioned by him as such. The churches of the East, and Jerusalem, their centre, to which quarter it was first sent, received it as St. Paul's from the earliest times according to Cyril, Bishop of Jerusalem (A. D. 349). JEROME, though bringing with him from Rome the prejudices of the Latins against the Epistle to the Hebrews, aggravated, doubtless, by its seeming sanction of the Novatian heresy (ch. 6. 4-6), was constrained by the force of facts to receive it as Paul's, on the almost unanimous testimony of all Greek Christians from the earliest times; and was probably the main instrument in correcting the past error of Rome in rejecting it. The testimony of the Alexandrian Church is peculiarly valuable, for it was founded by Mark, who was with Paul at Rome in his first confinement, when this Epistle seems to have been written (Colossians 4. 10), and who possibly was the bearer of this Epistle, at the same time visiting Colosse on the way to Jerusalem (where Mark's mother lived), and thence to Alexandria. Moreover, 2 Peter 3. 15, 16, written shortly before Peter's death, and like his first Epistle written by him, "the apostle of the circumcision," to the Hebrew Christians dispersed in the East, saith, "As our beloved brother Paul hath written unto you," i. e., to the Hebrews; also the words added, "As also in all his Epistles," distinguish the Epistle to the Hebrews from the rest, then he further speaks of it as on a level with "other Scriptures," thus asserting at once its Pauline authorship and Divine inspiration. An interesting illustration of the power of Christian faith and love; St. Peter, who had been openly rebuked by Paul (Galatians 2. 7-14), fully adopted what St. Paul wrote; there was no difference in the Gospel of the apostle of the circumcision and that of the apostle of the uncircumcision. It strikingly shows God's sovereignty that He chose as the instrument to confirm the Hebrews, Paul, the apostle of the Gentiles; and on the other hand, Peter to open the Gospel-door to the Gentiles (Acts 10. 1, &c.), though being the apostle of the Jews; thus perfect unity reigns amidst the diversity of agencies.

Rome, in the person of Clement of Rome, originally received this Epistle. Then followed a period in which it ceased to be received by the Roman churches. Then, in the fourth century, Rome retracted her error. A plain proof she is not unchangeable or infallible. As far as Rome is concerned, the Epistle to the Hebrews was not only lost for three centuries, but never would have been recovered at all but for the Eastern churches; it is therefore a happy thing for Christendom that Rome is not the Catholic Church.

It plainly was written before the destruction of Jerusalem, which would have been mentioned in the Epistle had that event gone before, cf. ch. 13. 10; and probably to churches in which the Jewish members were the more numerous, as those in Judea, and perhaps Alexandria. In the latter city were the greatest number of resident Jews next to Jerusalem. In Leontopolis, in Egypt, was another temple, with the arrangements of which, WIESELER thinks the notices in this Epistle more nearly corresponded than with those in Jerusalem. It was from Alexandria that the Epistle appears first to have come to the knowledge of Christendom. Moreover, "the Epistle to the Alexandrians," mentioned in the Canon of Muratorius, may possibly be this Epistle to the Hebrews. He addresses the Jews as peculiarly "the people of God" (ch. 2. 17; 4. 9; 13. 12), "the seed of Abraham," i. e., as the primary stock on which Gentile believers are grafted, to which Romans 11. 16-24 corresponds; but he urges them to come out of the carnal earthly Jerusalem and to realize their spiritual union to "the heavenly Jerusalem" (ch. 12. 18-23; 13. 13).

The use of Greek rather than Hebrew is doubtless due to the Epistle being intended, not merely for the Hebrew, but for the Hellenistic Jew converts, not only in Palestine, but elsewhere; a view confirmed by the use of the LXX, BENGEL thinks, probably (cf. 2 Peter 3. 15, 16, explained above), the Jews primarily, though not exclusively, addressed, were those who had left Jerusalem on account of the war and were settled in Asia Minor.

The notion of its having been originally in Hebrew arose probably from its Hebrew tone, method, and topics. It is reckoned among the Epistles, not at first generally acknowledged, along with James, 2 Peter, 2 and 3 John, Jude, and Revelation. A beautiful link exists between these Epistles and the universally-acknowledged Epistles. Hebrews unites the ordinances of Leviticus with their antitypical Gospel fulfilment. St. James is the link between the highest doctrines of Christianity and the universal law of moral duty—a commentary on the Sermon on the Mount—harmonizing the decalogue law of Moses, and the revelation to Job and Elias, with the Christian law of liberty. Second Peter links the teaching of Peter with that of Paul. Jude links the earliest unwritten to the latest written Revelation. The two shorter Epistles to John, like Philemon, apply Christianity to the minute details of the Christian life, showing that Christianity can sanctify all earthly relations.

CHAPTER I.

VER. 1-14. THE HIGHEST OF ALL REVELATIONS IS GIVEN US NOW IN THE SON OF GOD, WHO IS GREATER THAN THE ANGELS, AND WHO, HAVING COMPLETED REDEMPTION, SITS ENTHRONED AT GOD'S RIGHT HAND. The writer, though not inscribing his name, was well known to those addressed (ch. 13. 19). For proofs of Paul being the author, see my Introduction. In the Pauline method, the statement of subject and the division are put before the discussion; and at the close, the practical follows the doctrinal portion. The ardour of Spirit in this Epistle, as in 1 John, bursting forth at once into the subject (without prefatory inscription of name and greeting), the more effectively strikes the hearers. The date must have been whilst the temple was yet standing, before its destruction, 70 A. D.; some time before the martyrdom of Peter, who mentions this Epistle of Paul (2 Peter 3. 15, 16); at a time when many of the first hearers of the Lord were dead. 1. at sundry times—Greek, "in many portions." All was not revealed to each one prophet; but one received one portion of revelation, and another another. To Noah the quarter of the world to which Messiah should belong was revealed; to Abraham, the nation; to Jacob, the tribe; to David and Isaiah, the family; to Micah, the town of nativity; to Daniel, the exact time; to Malachi, the coming of His forerunner, and His second advent; through Jonah, His burial and resurrection; through Isaiah and Hosea, His resurrection. Each only knew in part; but when that which was perfect came in Messiah, that which was in part was done away (1 Corinthians 13. 12). in divers manners—e. g., internal suggestions, audible voices, the Urim and Thummim, dreams, and visions. "In one way He was seen by Abraham, in another by Moses, in another by Elias, and in another by Micah; Isaiah, Daniel, and Ezekiel, beheld different forms" [THEODORET] (cf. Numbers 12. 6-8). The Old Testament revelations were fragmentary in substance, and manifold in form; the very multitude of prophets shows that they prophesied only in part. In Christ, the revelation of God is full, not in shifting hues of separated colour, but Himself the pure light,

uniting in His one person the whole spectrum (v. 3). spake—the expression usual for a Jew to employ in addressing Jews. So St. Matthew, a Jew writing especially for Jews, quotes Scripture, not by the formula, "It is written," but "said," &c. in time past—From Malachi, the last of the Old Testament prophets, for four hundred years, there had arisen no prophet, in order that the Son might be the more an object of expectation. [BENGEL.] As God (the Father) is introduced as having spoken here; so God the Son, ch. 2. 3; God the Holy Ghost, ch. 3. 7. the fathers—the Jewish fathers. The Jews of former days (1 Corinthians 10. 1). by—Greek, "IN." A mortal king speaks by his ambassador, not (as the King of kings) IN his ambassador. The Son is the last and highest manifestation of God (Matthew 21. 34, 37); not merely a measure, as in the prophets, but the fulness of the Spirit of God dwelling in him bodily (John 1. 16; 3. 34; Colossians 2. 9). Thus he answers the Jewish objection drawn from their prophets. Jesus is the end of all prophecy (Revelation 19. 10), and of the law of Moses (John 1. 17; 5. 46). 2. in these last days—In the oldest MSS. the Greek is, "At the last part of these days." The Rabbins divided the whole of time into "this age," or "world," and "the age to come" (ch. 2. 5; 6. 5). The days of Messiah were the transition period, or "last part of these days" (in contrast to "in times past"), the close of the existing dispensation, and beginning of the final dispensation of which Christ's second coming shall be the crowning consummation. by His Son—Greek, "IN (His) Son" (John 14. 10). The true "Prophet" of God. "His majesty is set forth, (1.) Absolutely by the very name 'Son,' and by three glorious predicates, 'Whom He hath appointed,' 'By whom He made the worlds,' 'Who sat down on the right hand of the Majesty on high;' thus His course is described from the beginning of all things till he reached the goal (v. 2, 3). (2.) Relatively, in comparison with the angels, v. 4; the confirmation of this follows, and the very name 'Son' is proved at v. 5; the 'heirship,' v. 6-9; the 'making the worlds,' v. 10-12; the 'sitting at the right hand' of God, v. 13, 14." His being made heir follows His sonship, and preceded His making the worlds (Proverbs 8. 22, 23; Ephesians 3. 11). As the first begotten, He is heir of the universe (v. 6), which he made instrumentally, ch. 11. 3, where "by the Word of God" answers to "by whom" (the Son of God) here (John 1. 3). Christ was "appointed" (in God's eternal counsel) to creation as an office; and the universe so created was assigned to Him as a kingdom. He is "heir of all things" by right of creation, and especially by right of redemption. The promise to Abraham that he should be heir of the world, had its fulfilment, and will have it still more fully, in Christ (Romans 4. 13; Galatians 3. 16; 4. 7). worlds—the inferior and the superior worlds (Colossians 1. 16). Lit., ages with all things and persons belonging to them; the universe, including all space and ages of time, and all material and spiritual existences. The Greek implies, He not only appointed His Son heir of all things before creation, but He also (better than "also He") made by Him the worlds. 3. Who being—by pre-existent and essential being. brightness of his glory—Greek, the effulgence of His glory. "Light of (from) light." [NICENE CREED.] "Who is so senseless as to doubt concerning the eternal being of the Son? For when has one seen light without effulgence?" [ATHANASIUS against ARIUS, Orat. 2.] "The sun is never seen without effulgence, nor the Father without the Son." [THEOPHYLACT.] It is because He is the brightness, &c., and because He upholds, &c., that He sat down on the right hand, &c. It was a return to His Divine glory (John 6. 62; 17. 5; cf. Wisd. 7. 25, 26, where similar things are said of wisdom). express image—"impress." But veiled in the flesh.

"The Sun of God in glory beams Too bright for us to scan;
But we can face the light that streams
From the mild Son of man." (2 Cor. 3. 18.)

of his person—Greek, "of His substantial essence;" hypostasis. upholding all things—Greek, "the universe." Cf. Colossians 1. 15, 17, 20, which enumerates the three facts in the same order as here. by the word—Therefore the Son of God is a Person; for He has the word. [BENGEI.] His word is God's word (ch. 11. 3). of his power—"The word" is the utterance which comes from His (the Son's) power, and gives expression to it. by himself—Omitted in the oldest MSS. purged—Greek, "made purification of . . . sins," viz., in His atonement, which graciously covers the guilt of sin. "Our" is omitted in the oldest MSS. Sin was the great uncleaness in God's sight, of which He has effected the purgation by His sacrifice. [ALFORD.] Our nature, as guilt-laden, could not, without our great High Priest's blood of atonement sprinkling the heavenly mercy-seat, come into immediate contact with God. EBRARD says, "The mediation between man and God, who was present in the Most Holy Place, was revealed in three forms: (1.) In sacrifices [typical propitiations for guilt]; (2.) in the priesthood [the agents of those sacrifices]; (3.) in the Levitical laws of purity [Levitical purity being attained by sacrifice positively, by avoidance of Levitical pollution negatively, the people being thus enabled to come into the presence of God without dying, Deuteronomy 5. 26] (Leviticus 16). sat down on the right hand of the Majesty on high—fulfilling Psalm 110. 1. This sitting of the Son at God's right hand was by the act of the father (ch. 8. 1; Ephesians 1. 20); it is never used of His pre-existing state coequal with the Father, but always of His exalted state as Son of man after His sufferings, and as Mediator for man in the presence of God (Romans 8. 34); a relation towards God and us about to come to an end when its object has been accomplished (1 Corinthians 15. 28). 4. Being made . . . better—by His exaltation by the Father (v. 3, 13); in contrast to His being "made lower than the angels" (ch. 2. 9). "Better," i. e., superior to. As "being" (v. 3) expresses His essential being: so "being made" (ch. 7. 26) marks what He became in His assumed manhood (Philippians 2. 6-9). Paul shows that His humbled form (at which the Jews might stumble) is no objection to His Divine Messiahship. As the law was given by the ministration of angels and Moses, it was inferior to the Gospel given by the Divine Son, who both is (v. 4-14) as God, and has been made, as the exalted Son of man (ch. 2. 5-18), much better than the angels. The manifestations of God by angels (and even by the angel of the covenant) at different times in the Old Testament, did not bring man and God into personal union, as the manifestation of God in human flesh does. by inheritance obtained—He always had the thing itself, viz., Sonship; but He "obtained by inheritance," according to the promise of the Father, the name "Son," whereby He is made known to men and angels. He is "the Son of God" in a sense far exalted above that in which angels are called "sons of God" (Job 1. 6; 38. 7). "The fulness of the glory of the peculiar name 'the Son of God,' is unattainable by human speech or thought. All appellations are but fragments of its glory—beams united in it as in a central sun. Revelation 19. 12. A name that no man knew but He Himself." 5. For—Substantiating His having "obtained a more excellent name than the angels," unto which—A frequent argument in this Epistle is derived from the silence of Scripture (v. 13; ch. 2. 16; 7. 3, 14). [BENGEI.] this day have I begotten thee—(Psalm 2. 7.) Fulfilled at the resurrection of Jesus, whereby the Father "declared," i. e., made manifest His Divine Sonship, heretofore veiled by His humiliation (Acts 13. 33; Romans 1. 4). Christ has a fourfold right to the title "Son of God:" (1.) By generation, as begotten of God; (2.) by commission, as sent by God; (3.) by resurrection, as "the first-begotten of the dead" (cf. Luke 20. 36; Romans 1. 4; Revelation 1. 5); (4.) by actual possession, as heir of all. [BISHOP PEARSON.] The Psalm here quoted applied primarily in a less full sense to Solomon, of whom God promised by Nathan to David, "I will be His Father, and he shall be my son." But as the whole theocracy was of Messianic import, the triumph of David over Hadad-ezer and neighbouring kings (2 Samuel 8.; Psalm 2. 2, 3, 9-12) is a type of God's ultimately subduing all enemies under His Son, whom He sets (Hebrew, anointed, Psalm 2. 6) on His "holy hill of Zion," as King of the Jews and of the whole earth, the antitype to Solomon, son of David. The "I" in Greek is emphatic; I the Everlasting Father have begotten thee this day, i. e., on this day, the day of thy being manifested as My Son, "the first-begotten of the dead" (Colossians 1. 18; Revelation 1. 5), when thou hast ransomed and opened heaven to thy people. He had been always Son, but now first was manifested as such in His once humbled, now exalted manhood united to His God-head. ALFORD refers "this day" to the eternal generation of the Son: The day in which the Son was begotten by the Father is an everlasting to-day: there never was a yesterday or past time to Him, nor a to-morrow or future time: "Nothing there is to come, and nothing past, but an eternal Now doth ever last" (Proverbs 30. 4; John 10. 30, 38; 16. 28; 17. 8). The communication of the Divine essence in its fulness, involves eternal generation; for the Divine essence has no beginning. But the context refers to a definite point of time, viz., that of His having entered on the inheritance (v. 4). The "bringing the first-begotten into the world" (v. 6), is not subsequent, as ALFORD thinks, to v. 5, but anterior to it (cf. Acts 2. 30-35). 6. And—Greek, "But." Not only this proves His superiority, BUT a more decisive proof is Psalm 97. 7, which shows that not only at His resurrection, but also in prospect of His being brought into the world (cf. ch. 9. 11; 10. 5) as man, in His incarnation, nativity (Luke 2. 9-14), temptation (Matthew 4. 10, 11), resurrection (Matthew 28. 2), and future second advent in glory, angels were designed by God to be subject to Him. Cf. 1 Timothy 3. 16, "Seen of angels:" God manifesting Messiah as one to be gazed at with adoring love by heavenly intelligences (Ephesians 3. 10; 2 Thessalonians 1. 9, 10; 1 Peter 3. 22). The fullest realization of His Lordship shall be at His second coming (Psalm 97. 7; 1 Corinthians 15. 24, 25; Philippians 2. 9). "Worship Him all ye gods" ("gods," i. e., exalted beings, as angels), refers to God; but it was universally admitted among the Hebrews that God would dwell, in a peculiar sense, in Messiah (so as to be in the Talmud phrase, "capable of being pointed to with the finger"); and so what was said of God was true of, and to be fulfilled in, Messiah. KIMCHI says that Psalms 93-101. contain in them the mystery of Messiah. God ruled the theocracy in and through Him. the world—subject to Christ (ch. 2. 5). As “the first-begotten” He has the rights of primogeniture (Romans 8. 29; Colossians 1. 15, 16, 18). In Deuteronomy 32, 43, the LXX. have, “Let all the angels of God worship Him,” words not now found in the Hebrew. This passage of the LXX. may have been in Paul’s mind as to the form, but the substance is taken from Psalm 97. 7. The type David, in the Psalm 89. 27 (quoted in v. 5), is called “God’s first-born, higher than the kings of the earth:” so the antitypical first-begotten, the son of David, is to be worshipped by all inferior lords, as angels (“gods,” Psalm 97. 7); for He is “King of kings and Lord of lords” (Revelation 19. 16). In the Greek, “again” is transposed; but this does not oblige us, as ALFORD thinks, to translate, “When He again shall have introduced,” &c., viz., at Christ’s second coming; for there is no previous mention of a first bringing in; and “again” is often used in quotations, not to be joined with the verb, but parenthetically (“that I may again quote Scripture”). English Version is correct (cf. Matthew 5. 33; Greek, John 12. 39). 7. of—The Greek is rather, “In reference to the angels,” sprits—or “winds:” Who employeth His angels as the winds, His ministers as the lightnings; or, He maketh His angelic ministers the directing powers of winds and flames, when these latter are required to perform His will. “Commissions them to assume the agency or form of flames for His purposes.” [ALFORD.] English Version, “Maketh His angels sprits,” means, He maketh them of a subtle, incorporeal nature, swift as the wind. So Psalm 18. 10, “A cherub . . . the wings of the wind.” Verse 14, “ministering sprits,” favours English Version here. As “sprits” implies the wind-like velocity and subtle nature of the Cherubim, so “flame of fire” expresses the burning devotion and intense all-consuming zeal of the adoring Seraphim (meaning “burning”), Isaiah 6. 1. The translation, “Maketh winds His messengers, and a flame of fire His ministers (1),” is plainly wrong. In the Psalm 104. 3, 4, the subject in each clause comes first, and the attribute predicated of it second; so the Greek article here marks “angels” and “ministers” as the subjects, and “winds” and “flame of fire,” predicates. Senemoth Rabba says, “God is called God of Zebaoth (the heavenly hosts), because He does what he pleases with his angels. When He pleases, He makes them to sit (Judges 6. 11); at other times to stand (Isaiah 6. 2); at times to resemble women (Zechariah 5. 9); at other times to resemble men (Genesis 18. 2); at times He makes them ‘sprits;’ at times, fire.” “Maketh” implies that, however exalted, they are but creatures, whereas the Son is the Creator (v. 10): not begotten from everlasting, nor to be worshipped, as the Son (Revelation 14. 7; 22. 8, 9). 8. O God—the Greek has the article to mark emphasis (Psalm 45. 6, 7). for ever . . . righteousness—Everlasting duration and righteousness go together (Psalm 45. 2; 89. 14). a sceptre of righteousness—lit., “a rod of rectitude,” or “straightforwardness.” The oldest MSS. prefix “and” (cf. Esther 4. 11). 9. iniquity—“unrighteousness.” Some oldest MSS. read, “Lawlessness.” therefore—because God loves righteousness and hates iniquity. God . . . thy God—JEROME, AUGUSTINE, &c., translate, Psalm 45. 7, “O God, thy God, hath anointed thee,” whereby Christ is addressed as God. This is probably the true translation of the Hebrew there, and also of the Greek of Hebrews here; for it is likely the Son is addressed “O God,” as in v. 8. The anointing here meant is not that at His baptism, when he solemnly entered on His ministry for us; but that with the “oil of gladness,” or “exulting joy” (which denotes a triumph, and follows as the consequence of His manifested love of righteousness and hatred of iniquity), wherewith, after His triumphant completion of His work, He has been anointed by the Father above His fellows (not only above us, His fellow-men, the adopted members of God’s family, whom “He is not ashamed to call His brethren,” but above the angels, fellow-partakers in part with Him, though infinitely His inferiors, in the glories, holiness, and joys of heaven; “sons of God,” and angel-“messengers,” though subordinate to the Divine Angel—“Messenger of the covenant”). Thus He is antitype to Solomon, “chosen of all David’s many sons to sit upon the throne of the kingdom of the Lord over Israel,” even as His father David was chosen before all the house of his father’s sons. The image is drawn from the custom of anointing guests at feasts (Psalm 23. 5); or rather of anointing kings: not until His ascension did He assume the kingdom as Son of man. A fuller accomplishment is yet to be, when He shall be VISIBLY the anointed King over the whole earth (set by the Father) on His holy hill of Zion, Psalm 2. 6, 8. So David, His type, was first anointed at Bethlehem (1 Samuel 16. 13; Psalm 89. 20); and yet again at Hebron, first over Judah (2 Samuel 2. 4), then over all Israel (2 Samuel 5. 3); not till the death of Saul did he enter on his actual kingdom, as it was not till after Christ’s death that the Father set Him at His right hand far above all principality (Ephesians 1. 20, 21). The 45th Psalm in its first meaning was addressed to Solomon; but the Holy Spirit inspired the writer to use language which in its fulness can only apply to the antitypical Solomon, the true Royal Head of the theocracy. 10. And—In another passage (Psalm 102. 25-27) He says, in the beginning—English Version, Psalm 102. 25, “of old;” Hebrew, “before,” “aforetime.” LXX., “in the beginning” (as in Genesis 1. 1) answers by contrast to the end implied in “they shall perish,” &c. The Greek order here (not in the LXX.) is, “Thou in the beginning, O Lord,” which throws the “Lord” into emphasis. “Christ is preached even in passages where many might contend that the Father was principally intended.” [BENGE.] laid the foundation of—“firmly founded” is included in the idea of the Greek, heavens—plural: not merely one, but manifold, and including various orders of heavenly intelligences (Ephesians 4. 10). works of thine hands—the heavens, as a woven veil or curtain spread out. 11. They—The earth and the heavens in their present state and form “shall perish” (ch. 12. 26, 27; 2 Peter 3. 13). “Perish” does not mean annihilation; just as it did not mean so in the case of “the world that, being overflowed with water, perished” under Noah (2 Peter 3. 6). The covenant of the possession of the earth was renewed with Noah and his seed on the renovated earth. So it shall be after the perishing by fire (2 Peter 3. 12, 13). remainest—through (so the Greek) all changes. as . . . a garment—(Isaiah 51. 6.) 12. vesture—Greek, “an enveloping cloak,” told them up—So the LXX., Psalm 102. 26; but the Hebrew, “change them.” The Spirit, by Paul, treats the Hebrew of the Old Testament, with independence of handling, presenting the Divine truth in various aspects; sometimes as here sanctioning the LXX. (cf. Isaiah 34. 4; Revelation 6. 14); sometimes the Hebrew; sometimes varying from both. changed—as one lays aside a garment to put on another. thou art the same—(Isaiah 46. 4; Malachi 3. 6.) The same in nature, therefore in covenant faithfulness to thy people. shall not fail—Hebrew, “shall not end.” Israel, in the Babylonian captivity, in Psalm 102., casts her hopes of deliverance on Messiah, the unchanging covenant-God of Israel. 13. Quotation from Psalm 110. 1. The image is taken from the custom of conquerors putting the feet on the necks of the conquered (Joshua 10. 24, 25). 14. ministering sprits—Referring to v. 7, “sprits . . . ministers.” They are incorporeal sprits, as God is, but ministering to Him as inferiors. sent forth—present participle: “Being sent forth” continually, as their regular service in all ages. to minister—Greek, “unto (i. e., for) ministry.” for them—Greek, “on account of them,” &c. Angels are sent forth on ministrations to God and Christ, not primarily to men, though for the good of “those who are about to inherit salvation” (so the Greek): the elect, who believe, or shall believe, for whom all things, angels included, work together for good (Romans 8. 28). Angels’ ministrations are not properly rendered to men, since the latter have no power of commanding them, though their ministrations to God are often directed to the good of men. So the superiority of the Son of God to angels is shown. They “all,” however various their ranks, minister; He is ministered to. They “stand” (Luke 1. 19) before God, or are “sent forth . . .

to execute the Divine commands on behalf of them whom He pleases to save; He "sits on the right hand of the Majesty on high" (v. 3, 13). He rules; they serve.

CHAPTER II.

Ver. 1-18. DANGER OF NEGLECTING SO GREAT SALVATION, FIRST SPOKEN BY CHRIST; TO WHOM, NOT TO ANGELS, THE NEW DISPENSATION WAS SUBJECTED; THOUGH HE WAS FOR A TIME HUMBLED BELOW THE ANGELS: THIS HUMILIATION TOOK PLACE BY DIVINE NECESSITY FOR OUR SALVATION. 1. Therefore—Because Christ the Mediator of the new covenant is so far (ch. 1.) above all angels, the mediators of the old covenant. the more earnest—Greek, "the more abundantly." heard—spoken by God (ch. 1. 1); and by the Lord (v. 3). let them slip—lit., "flow past them" (ch. 4. 1). 2. (cf. v. 3.) Argument a fortiori. spoken by angels—The Mosaic law spoken by the ministration of angels (Deuteronomy 33, 2; Psalm 68, 17; Acts 7, 53; Galatians 3, 19). When it is said, Exodus 20, 1, "God spake," it is meant He spake by angels as His mouthpiece, or at least angels repeating in unison with His voice the words of the Decalogue. Whereas the Gospel was first spoken by the Lord alone. was steadfast—Greek, "was made steadfast," or "confirmed:" was enforced by penalties on those violating it. transgression—by doing evil; lit., overstepping its bounds: a positive violation of it. disobedience—by neglecting to do good: a negative violation of it. recompense—(Deuteronomy 32, 35.) 3. we—who have received the message of salvation so clearly delivered to us (cf. ch. 12, 25). so great salvation—embodied in Jesus, whose very name means salvation, including not only deliverance from foes and from death, and the grant of temporal blessings (which the law promised to the obedient), but also grace of the Spirit, forgiveness of sins, and the promise of heaven, glory, and eternal life (v. 10). which—"inasmuch as it is a salvation which began," &c. spoken by the Lord—as the instrument of proclaiming it. Not as the law, spoken by the instrumentality of angels (v. 2). Both law and Gospel came from God; the difference here referred to lay in the instrumentality by which each respectively was promulgated (cf. v. 5). Angels recognize Him as "the Lord" (Matthew 28, 6; Luke 2, 11). confirmed unto us—not by penalties, as the law was confirmed, but by spiritual gifts (v. 4). by them that heard him—(cf. Luke 1, 2.) Though Paul had a special and independent revelation of Christ (Galatians 1, 16, 17, 19), yet he classes himself with those Jews whom he addresses, "unto us;" for like them in many particulars (ex. gr., the agony in Gethsemane, ch. 5, 7), he was dependent for autoptic information on the twelve apostles. So the discourses of Jesus, ex. gr., the Sermon on the Mount, and the first proclamation of the Gospel kingdom by the Lord (Matthew 4, 17), he could only know by the report of the Twelve: so the saying, "It is more blessed to give, than to receive" (Acts 20, 35). Paul mentions what they had heard, rather than what they had seen, conformably with what he began with, v. 1, 2, "Spake . . . spoken." Appropriately also in his Epistles to Gentiles, he dwells on his independent call to the apostleship of the Gentiles; in his Epistle to the Hebrews, he appeals to the apostles who had been long with the Lord (cf. Acts 1, 21; 10, 41): so in his sermon to the Jews in Antioch of Pisidia (Acts 13, 31); and "he only appeals to the testimony of these apostles in a general way, in order that he may bring the Hebrews to the Lord alone" [BENGEL], not to become partisans of particular apostles, as Peter, the apostle of the circumcision, and James, the bishop of Jerusalem. This verse implies that the Hebrews of the churches of Palestine and Syria (or those of them dispersed in Asia Minor [BENGEL], 1 Peter 1, 1, or in Alexandria) were primarily addressed in this Epistle; for of none so well could it be said, the Gospel was confirmed to them by the immediate nearers of the Lord: the past tense, "was confirmed," implies some little time had elapsed since this testification by eye-witnesses. 4. them—rather, "God also [as well as Christ, v. 3] bearing witness to it" . . . "Joining in

attestation of it." signs and wonders—performed by Christ and His apostles. "Signs" and miracles, or other facts regarded as proofs of a Divine mission; "wonders" are miracles viewed as prodigies, causing astonishment (Acts 2, 22, 33); powers are miracles viewed as evidences of superhuman power. divers miracles—Greek, "varied (miraculous) powers" (2 Corinthians 12, 12) granted to the apostles after the ascension. gifts, &c.—Greek, "distributions." The gift of the Holy Spirit was given to Christ without measure (John 3, 34), but to us it is distributed in various measures and operations (Romans 12, 3, 6, &c.; 1 Corinthians 12, 4-11). according to his own will—God's free and sovereign will, assigning one gift of the Spirit to one, another to another (Acts 5, 32; Ephesians 1, 5). 5. For—Confirming the assertion, v. 2, 3, that the new covenant was spoken by One higher than the mediators of the old covenant, viz., angels. Translate in the Greek order, to bring out the proper emphasis, "Not the angels hath He," &c. the world to come—Implying, He has subjected to angels the existing world, the Old Testament dispensation (then still partly existing as to its framework, v. 2, the political kingdoms of the earth (Daniel 4, 13; 10, 13, 20, 21; 12, 1), and the natural elements (Revelation 9, 11; 16, 4), and even individuals (Matthew 18, 10). "The world to come" is the new dispensation brought in by Christ, beginning in grace here, to be completed in glory hereafter. It is called "to come," or "about to be," as at the time of its being subjected to Christ by the Divine decree, it was as yet a thing of the future, and is still so to us, in respect to its full consummation. In respect to the subjecting of all things to Christ in fulfilment of Psalm 8., the realization is still "to come." Regarded from the Old Testament stand-point, which looks prophetically forward to the New Testament (and the Jewish priesthood and Old Testament ritual were in force then when Paul wrote, and continued till their forcible abrogation by the destruction of Jerusalem), it is "the world to come;" Paul, as addressing Jews, appropriately calls it so, according to their conventional way of viewing it. We, like them, still pray, "Thy kingdom come;" for its manifestation in glory is yet future. "This world" is used in contrast to express the present fallen condition of the world (Ephesians 2, 2). Believers belong not to this present world-course, but by faith rise in spirit to "the world to come," making it a present, though internal, reality. Still, in the present world, natural and social, angels are mediately rulers under God in some sense: not so in the coming world: man in it, and the Son of man, man's Head, are to be supreme. Hence greater reverence was paid to angels by men in the Old Testament than is permitted in the New Testament. For man's nature is exalted in Christ now, so that angels are our "fellow-servants" (Revelation 22, 9). In their ministrations they stand on a different footing from that on which they stood towards us in the Old Testament. We are "brethren" of Christ in a nearness not enjoyed even by angels (v. 10-12, 16). 6. But—It is not to angels the Gospel kingdom is subject, BUT, &c. one . . . testified—The usual way of quoting Scripture to readers familiar with it. Psalm 8, 5-7 praises Jehovah for exalting MAN, so as to subject all the works of God on earth to him: this dignity having been lost by the first Adam, is realized only in Christ the Son of man, the Representative Man and Head of our redeemed race. Thus Paul proves that it is to MAN, not to angels, that God has subjected the "world to come." In v. 6-8, MAN is spoken of in general ("him . . . him . . . his"); then at v. 9, first JESUS is introduced as fulfilling, as man, all the conditions of the prophecy, and through death passing Himself, and so consequently bringing us men, His "brethren," to "glory and honour." What—How insignificant in himself, yet how exalted by God's grace! (cf. Psalm 144, 3.) The Hebrew, Enosh and Ben-Adam, express man and Son of man in his weakness: "Son of man" is here used of any and every child of man: unlike, seemingly, the lord of creation, such as he was originally (Genesis 1, and 2.), and such as he is designed to be (Psalm 8.), and such as he actually is by title and shall hereafter more fully be in the person of, and in union with, Jesus, pre-eminently the Son of man (v. 9). art mindful—as of one absent. visitest—lookest after him, as one present. 7. a little—Not as BENGEL, "a little time." than the angels—*Hebrew, "than God," Elohim, i. e., the abstract qualities of God, such as angels possess in an inferior form, viz., heavenly, spiritual, incorporeal natures. Man, in his original creation, was set next beneath them. So the man Jesus, though Lord of angels, when He emptied Himself of the externals of His Divinity (Note, Philippians 2, 6, 7), was in His human nature "a little lower than the angels;" though this is not the primary reference here, but man in general. crownedst him with glory and honour—as the appointed kingly vicergerent of God over this earth (Genesis 1, and 2). and didst set him over the works of thy hands—Omitted in some of the oldest MSS.; but read by others and by oldest versions: so Psalm 8, 6, "Thou madest him to have dominion over the works of thy hands." 8. (1 Corinthians 15, 27.) For in that—i. e., "For in that" God saith in the 8th Psalm, "He put the all things (so the Greek, the all things just mentioned) in subjection under him (man), He left nothing," &c. As no limitation occurs in the sacred writing, the "all things" must include heavenly, as well as earthly things (cf. 1 Corinthians 3, 21, 22). But now—as things now are, we see not yet the all things put under man. 9. But—We see not man as yet exercising lordship over all things, "but rather, Him who was made a little lower than the angels (cf. Luke 22, 43), we behold (by faith: a different Greek verb from that for 'we see,' v. 8, which expresses the impression which our eyes passively receive from objects around us; whereas, 'we behold,' or 'look at,' implies the direction and intention of one deliberately regarding something which he tries to see: so ch. 3, 19; 10, 25, Greek), viz., Jesus, on account of His suffering of death, crowned," &c. He is already crowned, though unseen by us, save by faith; hereafter all things shall be subjected to Him visibly and fully. The ground of His exaltation is "on account of His having suffered death" (v. 10; Philippians 2, 8, 9). that He by the grace of God—(Titus 2, 11; 3, 4) The reading of ORIGEN, "That He without God" (laying aside His Divinity; or, for every being save God; or perhaps alluding to His having been temporarily "forsaken," as the Sin-bearer, by the Father on the cross), is not supported by the MSS. The "that," &c., is connected with "crowned with glory," &c., thus: His exaltation after sufferings is the perfecting or consummation of His work (v. 10) for us; without it His death would have been ineffectual; with it, and from it, flows the result that His tasting of death is available for (in behalf of, for the good of) every man. He is crowned as the Head in heaven of our common humanity, presenting His blood as the all-prevailing plea for us. This coronation above makes His death applicable for every individual man (observe the singular: not merely "for all men"), ch. 4, 14; 9, 24; 1 John 2, 2. "Taste death," implies his personal experimental undergoing of death: death of the body, and death (spiritually) of the soul, in His being forsaken of the Father. "As a physician first tastes his medicines to encourage his sick patient to take them, so Christ, when all men feared death, in order to persuade them to be bold in meeting it, tasted it Himself, though He had no need" [CHRYSOSTOM] (v. 14, 15). 10. For—Giving a reason why "the grace of God" required that Jesus "should taste death." it became him—the whole plan was [not only not derogatory to, but] highly becoming God, though unbelief considers it a disgrace. [BENGEL.] An answer to the Jews, and Hebrew Christians, whosever, through impatience at the delay in the promised advent of Christ's glory, were in danger of apostasy, stumbling at Christ crucified. The Jerusalem Christians especially were liable to this danger. This scheme of redemption was altogether such a one as harmonizes with the love, justice, and wisdom of God. for whom—God the Father (Romans 11, 36; 1 Corinthians 8, 6; Revelation 4, 11). In Colossians 1, 16 the same is said of Christ. all things—Greek, "the universe of things," "the all things." He uses for "God," the periphrasis, "Him for whom . . . by whom are all things," to mark the becomingness of Christ's* suffering as the way to His being "perfected" as "Captain of our salvation," seeing that His is the way that pleased Him whose will and whose glory are the end of all things, and by whose operation all things exist. in bringing—The Greek is past, "Having brought as He did," viz., in His electing purpose (cf. "Ye are sons," viz., in His purpose, Galatians 4, 6; Ephesians 1, 4), a purpose which is accomplished in Jesus being "perfected through sufferings." many—(Matthew 20, 28.) "The Church" (v. 12), "the general assembly" (ch. 12, 23). sons—no longer children as under the Old Testament law, but sons by adoption. unto glory—to share Christ's "glory" (v. 9; cf. v. 7; John 17, 10, 22, 24; Romans 8, 21). Sonship, holiness (v. 11), and glory, are inseparably joined. "Suffering," "salvation," and "glory," in Paul's writings, often go together (2 Timothy 2, 10). Salvation presupposes destruction, deliverance from which for us required Christ's "sufferings." to make . . . perfect—to consummate: to bring to consummated glory through sufferings, as the appointed avenue to it. "He who suffers for another, not only benefits him, but becomes himself the brighter and more perfect." [CHRYSOSTOM.] Bringing to the end of troubles, and to the goal full of glory: a metaphor from the contests in the public games. Cf. "It is finished," Luke 24, 26; John 19, 30. I prefer, with CALVIN, understanding, "to make perfect as a completed sacrifice": legal and official, not moral, perfection is meant: "to consecrate" (so the same Greek is translated ch. 7, 28; cf. Margin) by the finished expiation of His death, as our perfect High Priest, and so our "Captain of salvation" (Luke 13, 32). This agrees with v. 11, "He that sanctifieth," i. e., consecrates them by Himself being made a consecrated offering for them. So ch. 10, 14, 29; John 17, 19: by the perfecting of His consecration for them in His death, He perfects their consecration, and so throws open access to glory (ch. 10, 19-21; ch. 5, 9; 9, 9, accord with this sense). Captain of, &c.—lit., Prince-leader: as Joshua, not Moses, led the people into the Holy Land, so will our Joshua, or Jesus, lead us into the heavenly inheritance (Acts 13, 39). The same Greek is in ch. 12, 2, "Author of our faith." Acts 3, 15, "Prince of life" (5, 31). Preceding others by His example, as well as the originator of our salvation. 11. he that sanctifieth—Christ who once for all consecrates His people to God (Jude 1, bringing them nigh to Him as the consequence) and everlastingly glory, by having consecrated Himself for them in His being made "perfect (as their expiatory sacrifice) through sufferings" (v. 10; ch. 10, 10, 14, 29; John 17, 17, 19). God in His electing love, by Christ's finished work, perfectly sanctifies them to God's service and to heaven once for all: then they are progressively sanctified by the transforming Spirit. "Sanctification is glory working in embryo; glory is sanctification come to the birth, and manifested." [ALFORD.] they who are sanctified—Greek, "they that are being sanctified" (cf. the use of "sanctified," 1 Corinthians 7, 14). of one—Father, God: not in the sense wherein He is Father of all beings, as angels; for these are excluded by the argument (v. 16); but as He is Father of His spiritual human sons, Christ the Head and elder Brother, and His believing people, the members of the body and family. Thus, this and the following verses are meant to justify his having said, "many sons" (v. 10). "Of one" is not "of one father Adam," or "Abraham," as BENGEL, &c., suppose. For the Saviour's participation in the lowliness of our humanity is not mentioned till v. 14, and then as a consequence of what precedes. Moreover, "Sons of God" is, in Scripture usage, the dignity obtained by our union with Christ; and our brotherhood with Him flows from God being His and our Father. Christ's Sonship (by generation) in relation to God is reflected in the sonship (by adoption) of His brethren. he is not ashamed—though being the Son of God, since they have now by adoption obtained a like dignity, so that His majesty is not compromised by brotherhood with them (cf. ch. 11, 16). It is a striking feature in Christianity that it unites such amazing contrasts as "our brother and our God." [THOLUCK.] "God makes of sons of men sons of God, because God hath made of the Son of God the Son of man." [ST. AU-GUSTINE on Psalm 2.] 12. (Psalm 22, 22.) Messiah declares the name of the Father, not known fully as Christ's Father, and therefore their Father, till after His crucifixion (John 20, 17), among His brethren ("the Church," i. e., the congregation), that they in turn may praise Him (Psalm 22, 23). At v. 22, the 22d Psalm, which begins with Christ's cry, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" and details minutely His sorrows, passes from Christ's sufferings to His triumph, prefigured by the same in the experience of David. will I sing—as leader of the choir (Psalm 8, 2). 13. I will put my trust in him—From the LXX., Isaiah 8, 17, which immediately precedes the next quotation, "Behold, I and the children," &c. The only objection is, the following words, "and again," usually introduce a new quotation, whereas these two are parts of one and the same passage. However, this objection is not valid, as the two clauses express distinct ideas; "I will put my trust in Him" expresses His filial confidence in God as His Father, to whom He flees from His sufferings, and is not disappointed; which His believing brethren imitate, trusting solely in the Father through Christ, and not in their own merits. "Christ exhibited this 'trust,' not for Himself, for He and the Father are one, but for His own people" (v. 16). Each fresh aid given Him assured Him, as it does them, of aid for the future, until the complete victory was obtained over death and hell (Philippians 1, 16). [BENGE.] Behold I and the children, &c.—(Isaiah 8, 18.) "Sons" (v. 10), "brethren" (v. 12), and "children," imply His right and property in them from everlasting. He speaks of them as "children" of God, though not yet in being, yet considered as such in His purpose, and presents them before God the Father, who has given Him them, to be glorified with Himself. Isaiah (meaning "salvation of Jehovah") typically represented Messiah, who is at once Father and Son, Isaiah and Immanuel (Isaiah 9, 6). He expresses his resolve to rely, he and his children, not like Ahaz and the Jews on the Assyrian king, against the confederacy of Pekah of Israel, and Rezin of Syria, but on Jehovah; and then foretells the deliverance of Judah by God, in language which finds its antitypical full realization only in the far greater deliverance wrought by Messiah. Christ, the antitypical Prophet, similarly, instead of the human confidences of His age, Himself, and with Him GOD THE FATHER'S children (who are therefore His children, and so antitypical of Isaiah's children, though here regarded as His "brethren," cf. Isaiah 9, 6, "Father;" and "His seed," 53, 10) led by Him, trust wholly in God for salvation. The official words and acts of all the prophets find their antitype in the Great Prophet (Revelation 19, 10), just as His kingly office is antitypical to that of the theocratic kings; and His priestly office to the types and rites of the Aaronic priesthood. 14. He who has thus been shown to be the "Captain (Greek, Leader) of salvation" to the "many sons," by trusting and suffering like them, must therefore become man like them, in order that His death may be efficacious for them. [ALFORD.] the children—before mentioned (v. 13); those existing in His eternal purpose, though not in actual being. are partakers of—*lit., "have [in His purpose] been partakers" all in common. flesh and blood—Greek oldest MSS. have "blood and flesh." The inner and more important element, the blood, as the more immediate vehicle of the soul, stands before the more palpable element, the flesh; also, with reference to Christ's blood-shedding with a view to which He entered into community with our corporeal life. "The life of the flesh is in the blood; it is the blood that maketh an atonement for the soul" (Leviticus 17, 11, 14). likewise—Greek, "in a somewhat similar manner;" not altogether in a like manner. For He, unlike them, was conceived and born not in sin (ch. 4, 15). But mainly "in like manner;" not in mere semblance of a body, as the Docetæ heretics taught. took part of—participated in. The forfeited inheritance (according to Jewish law) was ransomed by the nearest of kin; so Jesus became our nearest of kin by His assumed humanity, in order to be our Redeemer. that through death—which He could not have undergone as God, but only by becoming man. Not by Almighty power but "by His death" (so the Greek) He overcame death. "Jesus suffering death overcame; Satan wielding death succumbed." [BENGE.] As David cut off the head of Goliath with the giant's own sword wherewith the latter was wont to win his victories. Coming to redeem mankind, Christ made Himself a sort of hook to destroy the devil; for in Him there was His humanity to attract the Devourer to Him, His divinity to pierce him, apparent weakness to provoke, hidden power to transfix the hungry ravisher. The Latin epigram says, "Mors mortis morti mortem nisi morte tulisset, Æternæ vitæ janua clausa foret." Had not death by death borne to death the death of Death, the gate of eternal life would have been closed. destroy—*lit., "render powerless;" deprive of all power to hurt His people. "That thou mightest still the enemy and avenger" (Psalm 8, 2). The same Greek verb is used. 2 Timothy 1, 10, "abolished death." There is no more death for believers. Christ plants in them an undying seed the germ of heavenly immortality, though believers have to pass through natural death. power—Satan is "strong" (Matthew 12, 29). of death—Implying that death itself is a power which, though originally foreign to human nature, now reigns over it (Romans 5, 12; 6, 9). The power which death as Satan wields. The author of sin is the author of its consequences. Cf. "power of the enemy" (Luke 10, 19). Satan has acquired over man (by God's law, Genesis 2, 17; Romans 6, 23) the power of death by man's sin, death being the executioner of sin, and man being Satan's "lawful captive." Jesus, by dying, has made the dying His own (Romans 14, 9), and has taken the prey from the mighty. Death's power was manifest; who wielded that power, lurking beneath it, is here expressed, viz., Satan. Wisdom 2, 24, "By the envy of the devil, death entered into the world." 15. fear of death—even before they had experienced its actual power. all their lifetime—Such a life can hardly be called life. subject to bondage—lit., "subjects of bondage;" not merely liable to it, but enthralled in it (cf. Romans 8, 15; Galatians 5, 1). Contrast with this bondage, the glory of the "sons" (v. 10). "Bondage" is defined by Aristotle, "The living not as one chooses;" "liberty," "the living as one chooses." Christ by delivering us from the curse of God against our sin, has taken from death all that made it formidable. Death, viewed apart from Christ, can only fill with horror, if the sinner dares to think. 16. For verily—Greek, "For as we all know;" "For as you will doubtless grant." Paul probably alludes to Isaiah 41, 8; Jeremiah 31, 32, LXX., from which all Jews would know well that the fact here stated as to Messiah was what the prophets had led them to expect. took not on him, &c.—rather, "It is not angels that He is helping (the present implies duration); but it is the seed of Abraham that He is helping." The verb is lit., to help by taking one by the hand, as in ch. 8, 9, "When I took them by the hand," &c. Thus it answers to "succour," v. 18, and "deliver," v. 15. "Not angels," who have no flesh and blood, but "the children," who have "flesh and blood," He takes hold of to help by "Himself taking part of the same" (v. 14). Whatever effect Christ's work may have on angels, He is not taking hold to help them by suffering in their nature to deliver them from death, as in our case. seed of Abraham—He views Christ's redemption (in compliment to the Hebrews whom he is addressing, and as enough for his present purpose) with reference to Abraham's seed, the Jewish nation, primarily; not that he excludes the Gentiles (v. 9, "for every man"), who, when believers, are the seed of Abraham spiritually (cf. v. 12; Psalm 22, 22, 25, 27), but direct reference to them, such as is in Romans 4, 11, 12, 16; Galatians 3, 7, 14, 23, 29, would be out of place in his present argument. It is the same argument for Jesus being the Christ which Matthew, writing his Gospel for the Hebrews, uses, tracing the genealogy of Jesus from Abraham, the father of the Jews, and the one to whom the promises were given, on which the Jews especially prided themselves (cf. Romans 9, 4, 5). 17. Wherefore—Greek, "Whence." Found in Paul's speech, Acts 26, 19. In all things—which are incidental to manhood, the being born, nourished, growing up, suffering. Sin is not, in the original constitution of man, a necessary attendant of manhood, so He had no sin. it behooved him—by moral necessity, considering what the justice and love of God required of Him as Mediator (cf. ch. 5. 3), the office which he had voluntarily undertaken in order to "help" man (v. 16.) his brethren—(v. 11)—"the seed of Abraham" (v. 16), and so also the spiritual seed, His elect out of all mankind. be—rather as Greek, "that He might become High Priest;" He was called so, when He was "made perfect by the things which He suffered" (v. 10; ch. 5. 8-10). He was actually made so, when He entered within the veil, from which last flows His ever-continuing intercession as Priest for us. The death, as man, must first be, in order that the bringing in of the blood into the heavenly Holy Place might follow, in which consisted the expiation as High Priest. merciful—to "the people" deserving wrath by "sins." Mercy is a prime requisite in a priest, since his office is to help the wretched and raise the fallen; such mercy is most likely to be found in one who has a fellow-feeling with the afflicted, having been so once Himself (ch. 4. 15); not that the Son of God needed to be taught by suffering to be merciful, but that in order to save us He needed to take our manhood with all its sorrows, thereby qualifying Himself, by experimental suffering with us, to be our sympathizing High Priest, and assuring us of His entire fellow-feeling with us in every sorrow. So in the main CALVIN remarks here, faithful—true to God (ch. 3. 5, 6) and to man (ch. 10. 23) in the mediatorial office which He has undertaken. High Priest—which Moses was not, though "faithful" (ch. 2). Nowhere, except in Psalm 110., Zechariah 6. 13, and in this Epistle, is Christ expressly called a Priest. In this Epistle alone His priesthood is professedly discussed; whence it is evident how necessary is this book of the New Testament. In Psalm 110., and Zechariah 6. 13, there is added mention of the kingdom of Christ, which elsewhere is spoken of without the priesthood, and that frequently. On the cross, whereon as Priest He offered the sacrifice, He had the title "King" inscribed over Him. [BENGEL.] to make reconciliation for the sins—rather as Greek, "to propitiate (in respect to) the sins;" "to expiate the sins." Strictly Divine justice is "propitiated;" but God's love is as much from everlasting as His justice; therefore, lest Christ's sacrifice, or its typical forerunners, the legal sacrifices, should be thought to be antecedent to God's grace and love, neither are said in the Old or New Testament to have propitiated God; otherwise Christ's sacrifices might have been thought to have first induced God to love and pity man, instead of (as the fact really is) His love having originated Christ's sacrifice, whereby Divine justice and Divine love are harmonized. The sinner is brought by that sacrifice into God's favour, which by sin he had forfeited; hence his right prayer is, "God be propitiated (so the Greek) to me who am a sinner" (Luke 18. 13). Sins bring death and "the fear of death" (v. 15). He had no sin Himself, and "made reconciliation for the iniquity" of all others (Daniel 9. 24). of the people—"the seed of Abraham" (v. 16); the literal Israel first, and then (in the design of God), through Israel, the believing Gentiles, the spiritual Israel (1 Peter 2. 10). 18. For—Explanation of how His being made like His brethren in all things has made Him a merciful and faithful High Priest for us (v. 17). in that—rather as Greek, "wherein He suffered Himself; having been tempted, He is able to succour them that are being tempted" in the same temptation; and as "He was tempted (tried and afflicted) in all points," He is able (by the power of sympathy) to succour us in all possible temptations and trials incidental to man (ch. 4. 16; 5. 2). He is the antitypical Solomon, having for every grain of Abraham's seed (which were to be as the sand for number), "largeness of heart even as the sand that is on the sea-shore" (1 Kings 4. 29). "Not only as God He knows our trials, but also as man He knows them by experimental feeling."

CHAPTER III.

Ver. 1-19. THE SON OF GOD GREATER THAN MOSES, WHEREFORE UNBELIEF TOWARDS HIM WILL INCUR A HEAVIER PUNISHMENT THAN BEFELL UNBELIEVING ISRAEL IN THE WILDERNESS. As Moses especially was

the prophet by whom "God in times past spake to the fathers," being the mediator of the law, Paul deems it necessary now to show that, great as was Moses, the Son of God is greater. EBRARD in ALFORD remarks, The angel of the covenant came in the name of God before Israel; Moses in the name of Israel before God; whereas the high priest came both in the name of God (bearing the name JEHOVAH on his forehead) before Israel, and in the name of Israel (bearing the names of the twelve tribes on his breast) before God (Exodus 23. 9-23, 36, 38). Now Christ is above the angels, according to chs. 1. and 2., because (1.) as Son of God He is higher; and (2.) because manhood, though originally lower than angels, is in Him exalted above them to the lordship of "the world to come," inasmuch as He is at once Messenger of God to men, and also atoning Priest-Representative of men before God (ch. 2. 17, 18). Parallel with this line of argument as to His superiority to angels (ch. 1. 4) runs that which here follows as to His superiority to Moses (ch. 3. 3); (1.) Because as Son over the house, He is above the servant in the house (v. 5, 6), just as the angels were shown to be but ministering (serving) spirits (ch. 1. 14), whereas He is the Son (v. 7, 8); (2.) because the bringing of Israel into the promised rest, which was not finished by Moses, is accomplished by Him (ch. 4. 1-11), through His being not merely a leader and lawgiver as Moses, but also a propitiatory High Priest (ch. 4. 14; 5. 10). 1. Therefore—Greek, "Whence," i. e., seeing we have such a sympathizing Helper you ought to "consider attentively" . . . "contemplate;" fix your eyes and mind on Him with a view to profiting by the contemplation (ch. 12. 2). The Greek word is often used by Luke, Paul's companion (Luke 12. 24, 27). brethren—in Christ, the common bond of union. partakers—"of the Holy Ghost." heavenly calling—coming to us from heaven, and leading us to heaven whence it comes. Philippians 3. 14, "the high calling;" Greek "the calling above," i. e., heavenly. the Apostle and High Priest of our profession—There is but one Greek article to both nouns, "Him who is at once Apostle and High Priest"—Apostle, as Ambassador (a higher designation than "angel"-messenger) sent by the Father (John 20. 21), pleading the cause of God with us; High Priest, as pleading our cause with God. Both His Apostleship and High Priesthood are comprehended in the one title, Mediator. [BENGEL.] Though the title "Apostle" is nowhere else applied to Christ, it is appropriate here in addressing Hebrews, who used the term of the delegates sent by the high priest to collect the temple tribute from Jews resident in foreign countries, even as Christ was Delegate of the Father to this world far off from Him (Matthew 21. 37). Hence as what applies to Him, applies also to His people, the Twelve are designated His apostles, even as He is the Father's (John 20. 21). It was desirable to avoid designating Him here "angel," in order to distinguish His nature from that of angels mentioned before, though he is "the Angel of the Covenant." The "legate of the Church" (Sheliach Tsibbur) offered up the prayers in the synagogue in the name of all, and for all. So Jesus, "the Apostle of our profession," is delegated to intercede for the Church before the Father. The words "of our profession," mark that it is not of the legal ritual, but of our Christian faith, that He is the High Priest. Paul compares Him as an Apostle to Moses; as High Priest to Aaron. He alone holds both offices combined, and in a more eminent degree than either, which those two brothers held apart. "Profession," or "confession," corresponds to God having spoken to us by His Son, sent as Apostle and High Priest. What God proclaims we confess. 2. He first notes the feature of resemblance between Moses and Christ, in order to conciliate the Hebrew Christians whom He addressed, and who still entertained a very high opinion of Moses; he afterwards brings forward Christ's superiority to Moses. Who was faithful—The Greek implies also that He still is faithful, viz., as our mediating High Priest, faithful to the trust God has assigned Him (ch. 2. 17). So Moses in God's house (Numbers 12. 7). appointed him—"made Him" HIGH PRIEST; to be supplied from the preceding context. Greek, "made;" so in ch. 5. 5; 1 Samuel 12. 6, Margin; Acts 2. 36; so the Greek fathers. Not as ALFORD, with AMBROSE and the Latins, "Created Him," i. e., as man, in His incarnation. The likeness of Moses to Messiah was foretold by Moses himself (Deuteronomy 18. 15). Other prophets only explained Moses, who was in this respect superior to them; but Christ was like Moses, yet superior. 3. For—Assigning the reason why they should "consider" attentively "Christ" (v. 1), highly as they regard Moses who resembled Him in faithfulness (v. 2). was—Greek, "has been." counted worthy of more glory—by God, when He exalted Him to His own right hand. The Hebrew Christians admitted the fact (ch. 1. 13). built the house—Greek, "inasmuch as He hath more honour than the house, who prepared it," or "established it," [ALFORD.] The Greek verb is used purposely instead of "built," in order to mark that the building meant is not a literal, but a spiritual house; the Church both of the Old Testament and New Testament; and that the building of such a house includes all the preparations of providence and grace needed to furnish it with "living stones" and fitting "servants." Thus, as Christ the Founder and Establisher (in Old Testament as well as the New Testament) is greater than the house so established, including the servants, He is greater also than Moses, who was but a "servant." Moses, as a servant, is a portion of the house, and less than the house; Christ, as the Instrumental Creator of all things, must be God, and so greater than the house of which Moses was but a part. Glory is the result of honour. 4. Some one must be the establisher of every house; Moses was not the establisher of the house, but a portion of it (but He who established all things, and therefore the spiritual house in question, is God). Christ, as being instrumentally the Establisher of all things, must be the Establisher of the house, and so greater than Moses. 5. faithful in all his house—i. e., in all God's house (v. 4). servant—Not here the Greek for "slave," but "a ministering attendant;" marking the high office of Moses towards God, though inferior to Christ, a kind of steward. for a testimony, &c.—in order that he might in his typical institutions give "testimony" to Israel "of the things" of the Gospel "which were to be spoken afterwards" by Christ (ch. 8. 5; 9. 8, 23; 10. 1). 6. But Christ—was and is faithful (v. 2). as a Son over his own house—rather, "over His (God's, v. 4) house;" and therefore, as the inference from His being one with God, over His own house. So ch. 10. 21, "Having an High Priest over the house of God." Christ enters His Father's house as the Master [over it], but Moses as a servant [in it, v. 2, 5]. [CHRYSOSTOM.] An ambassador in the absence of the king is very distinguished—in the presence of the king he falls back into the multitude. [BENGL.] whose house are we—Paul and his Hebrew readers. One old MS, with Vulgate and LUCIFER, reads, "which house;" but the weightiest MSS. support English Version reading. the rejoicing—rather, "the matter of rejoicing," of the hope—"of our hope." Since all our good things lie in hopes, we ought so to hold fast our hopes as already to rejoice, as though our hopes were realized. [CHRYSOSTOM.] firm unto the end—Omitted in LUCIFER and AMBROSE, and in one oldest MS, but supported by most oldest MSS. 7, &c.—Exhortation from Psalm 95., not through unbelief to lose participation in the spiritual house. Wherefore—Seeing that we are the house of God if we hold fast our confidence, &c. (v. 6). Jesus is "faithful," be not ye unfaithful (v. 2, 12). The sentence beginning with "wherefore," interrupted by the parenthesis confirming the argument from Psalm 95., is completed at v. 12, "Take heed," &c. Holy Ghost saith—by the Inspired Psalmist; so that the words of the latter are the words of God Himself. To-day—at length; in David's day, as contrasted with the days of Moses in the wilderness, and the whole time since then, during which they had been rebellious against God's voice; as for instance, in the wilderness (v. 8). The Psalm, each fresh time when used in public worship, by "to-day," will mean the particular day when it was, or is, used. hear—obediently. his voice—of grace. 8. Harden not your hearts—This phrase here only is used of man's own act; usually of God's act (Romans 9. 18). When man is spoken of as the agent in hardening, the phrase usually is, "harden his neck," or "back" (Nehemiah 9. 17). provocation . . . temptation—Massah-meribah, translated in Margin, "temptation . . . chiding," or "strife" (Exodus 17. 1-7). Both names seem to refer to that one event, the murmuring of the people against the Lord at Rephidim for want of water. The first offence especially ought to be guarded against, and is the most severely reprov'd, as it is apt to produce many more. Numbers 20. 1-13, and Deuteronomy 33. 8, mention a second similar occasion in the wilderness of Sin, near Kadesh, also called Meribah. in the day—Greek, "according to the day of," &c. 9. When—rather, "Where," viz., in the wilderness. your fathers—The authority of the ancients is not conclusive. [BENGL.] tempted me, proved me—The oldest MSS. read, "tempted (me) in the way of testing," i. e., putting (me) to the proof whether I was able and willing to relieve them, not believing that I am so. saw my works forty years—They saw, without being led thereby to repentance, my works of power partly in affording miraculous help, partly in executing vengeance, forty years. The "forty years" joined in the Hebrew and LXX., and below, v. 17, with "I was grieved," is here joined with "they saw." Both are true; for, during the same forty years that they were tempting God by unbelief, notwithstanding their seeing God's miraculous works, God was being grieved. The lesson intended to be hinted to the Hebrew Christians is, their "to-day" is to last only between the first preaching of the Gospel and Jerusalem's impending overthrow, viz., FORTY YEARS; exactly the number of years of Israel's sojourn in the wilderness, until the full measure of their guilt having been filled up all the rebels were overthrown. 10. grieved—displeased. Cf. "walk contrary," Leviticus 26. 24, 28. that generation—"that" implies alienation and estrangement. But the oldest MSS. read, "this." said—"grieved," or "displeased," at their first offence. Subsequently when they hardened their heart in unbelief still more, He swore in His wrath (v. 11); an ascending gradation (cf. v. 17, 18). and they have not known—Greek, "But these very persons," &c.; they perceived I was displeased with them, yet they, the same persons, did not a whit the more wish to know my ways [BENGL.]; cf. "But they," Psalm 106. 43. not known my ways—not known practically and believably the ways in which I would have had them go, so as to reach my rest (Exodus 18. 20). 11. So—lit., "as." I swore—BENGL. remarks the oath of God preceded the forty years. not—lit., "If they shall enter, &c. (God do so to me and more also)," 2 Samuel 3. 85. The Greek is the same, Mark 8. 12. my rest—Canaan, primarily, their rest after wandering in the wilderness: still, even when in it, they never fully enjoyed rest; whence it followed, that the threat extended farther than the exclusion of the unbelieving from the literal land of rest, and that the rest promised to the believing in its full blessedness was, and is, yet future: Psalm 25. 13; 37. 9, 11, 22, 29, and Christ's own beatitude (Matthew 5. 5) all accord with this, v. 9. 12. Take heed—to be joined with "wherefore," v. 7. lest there be—Greek (indicative), "lest there shall be;" lest there be, as I fear there is; implying that it is not merely a possible contingency, but that there is ground for thinking it will be so. in any—"in any one of you." Not merely ought all in general be on their guard, but they ought to be so concerned for the safety of each one member, as not to suffer any one to perish through their negligence. [CALVIN.] heart—The heart is not to be trusted. Cf. v. 10, "They do always err in their heart." unbelief—faithlessness. Christ is faithful; therefore, saith Paul to the Hebrews, we ought not to be faithless as our fathers were under Moses. departing—apostatizing. The opposite of "come unto" Him (ch. 4. 16). God punishes such apostates in kind. He departs from them—the worst of woes. the living God—Real: the distinctive characteristic of the God of Israel, not like the lifeless gods of the heathen; therefore One whose threats are awful realities. To apostatize from Christ is to apostatize from the living God (ch. 2. 3). 13. one another—Greek, "yourselves;" let each exhort himself and his neighbour. daily—Greek, "on each day," or "day by day." while it is called To-day—whilst the "to-day" lasts (the day of grace, Luke 4. 21, before the coming of the day of glory and judgment at Christ's coming, ch. 10. 25, 37). To-morrow is the day when idle men work, and fools repent. To-morrow is Satan's to-day; he cares not what good resolutions you form, if only you fix them to to-morrow. lest . . . of you—The "you" is emphatic, as distinguished from "your fathers" (v. 9). "That from among you no one (so the Greek order is in some of the oldest MSS.) be hardened" (v. 8). deceitfulness—causing you to "err in your heart." sin—unbelief. 1. For, &c.—Enforcing the warning, v. 12. partakers of Christ—(Cf. v. 1, 6.) So "partakers of the Holy Ghost" (ch. 6. 4). hold—Greek, "hold fast," the beginning of our confidence—i. e., the confidence (lit., substantial, solid confidence) of faith which we have begun (ch. 6. 11; 12. 2). A Christian so long as he is not made perfect, considers himself as a beginner. [BENGEL.] unto the end—unto the coming of Christ (ch. 12. 2). 15. While it is said—Connected with v. 13, "exhort one another, &c., while it is said To-day:" v. 14, "for we are made partakers," &c., being a parenthesis. "It entirely depends on yourselves that the invitation of the 95th Psalm be not a mere invitation, but also an actual enjoyment." ALFORD translates, "Since (i. e., for) it is said," &c., regarding v. 15 as a proof that we must "hold . . . confidence . . . unto the end," in order to be "partakers of Christ." 16. For some—rather interrogatively, "For who was it that, when they had heard (referring to 'if ye will hear,' v. 15), did provoke (God)?" The "for" implies, Ye need to take heed against unbelief; for, was it not because of unbelief that all our fathers were excluded (Ezekiel 2. 3)? "Some," and "not all," would be a faint way of putting his argument, when his object is to show the universality of the evil. Not merely some, but all the Israelites, for the solitary exceptions, Joshua and Caleb, are hardly to be taken into account in so general a statement. So v. 17, 18, are interrogative: (1.) The beginning of the provocation, soon after the departure from Egypt, is marked in v. 16; (2.) the forty years of it in the wilderness, v. 17; (3.) the denial of entrance into the land of rest, v. 18. Note, cf. 1 Corinthians 10. 5, "with the majority of them God was displeased," howbeit—"Nay (why need I put the question?), was it not all that came out of Egypt" (Exodus 17. 1, 2)? by Moses—by the instrumentality of Moses as their leader. 17. But—translate, "Moreover," as it is not in contrast to v. 16, but carrying out the same thought. corpses—lit., "limbs," implying that their bodies fell limb from limb. 18. to them that believed not—rather as Greek, "to them that disobeyed." Practical unbelief (Deuteronomy 1. 26). 19. they could not enter—through desiring it.

CHAPTER IV.

Ver. 1-16. THE PROMISE OF GOD'S REST IS FULLY REALIZED THROUGH CHRIST: LET US STRIVE TO OBTAIN IT BY HIM, OUR SYMPATHIZING HIGH PRIEST. 1. Let us . . . fear—not with slavish terror, but godly "fear and trembling" (Philippians 2. 12). Since so many have fallen, we have cause to fear (ch. 3. 17-19). being left us—still remaining to us after the others have, by neglect, lost it. his rest—God's heavenly rest, of which Canaan is the type. "To-day" still continues, during which there is the danger of falling to reach the rest. "To-day," rightly used, terminates in the rest which, when once obtained, is never lost (Revelation 3. 12). A foretaste of the rest is given in the inward rest which the believer's soul has in Christ. should seem to come short of it—Greek, "to have come short of it;" should be found, when the great trial of all shall take place [ALFORD], to have fallen short of attaining the promise. The word "seem" is a mitigating mode of expression, though not lessening the reality. BENGEL and OWEN take it, Lest there should be any semblance or appearance of falling short. 2. Gospel preached . . . unto them—in type: the earthly Canaan, wherein they failed to realize perfect rest, suggesting to them that they should look beyond to the heavenly land of rest, to which faith is the avenue, and from which unbelief excludes, as it did from the earthly Canaan. the word preached—lit., "the word of hearing:" the word heard by them. not being mixed with faith in them that heard—So the Syriac and the Old Latin Versions, older than any of our MSS., and LUCIFER, read, "As the world did not unite with the hearers in faith." The word heard being the food which, as the bread of life, must pass into flesh and blood through man's appropriating it to himself in faith. Hearing alone is of as little value as undigested food in a bad stomach. [THOLUCK.] The whole of oldest extant MS. authority supports a different reading, "unmingled as they were (Greek accusative agreeing with 'them') in faith with its hearers," i. e., with its believing, obedient hearers, as Caleb and Joshua. So "hear" is used for "obey" in the context, v. 7. "To-day, if ye will hear His voice." The disobedient, instead of being blended in "the same body," separated themselves as Korah: a tacit reproof to like separatists from the Christian assembling together (ch. 10. 25; Jude 19). 3. For—Justifying his assertion of the need of "faith," v. 2. we which have believed—we who at Christ's coming shall be found to have believed. do enter—i. e., are to enter: so two of the oldest MSS., and LUCIFER and the old Latin. Two other oldest MSS. read, "Let us enter." Into rest—Greek, "into the rest" which is promised in the 95th Psalm. as he said—God's saying that unbelief excludes from entrance implies that belief gains an entrance into the rest. What, however, Paul mainly here dwells on in the quotation is, that the promised "rest" has not yet been entered into. At v. 11 he again, as in ch. 3. 12-19 already, takes up faith as the indispensable qualification for entering it. although, &c.—Although God had finished His works of creation and entered on His rest from creation long before Moses' time, yet under that leader of Israel another rest was promised, which most fell short of through unbelief; and although the rest in Canaan was subsequently attained under Joshua, yet long after, in David's days, God, in the 95th Psalm, still speaks of the rest of God as not yet attained. THEREFORE, there must be meant a rest still future, viz., that which "remaineth for the people of God" in heaven, v. 3-9, when they shall rest from their works, as God did from His, v. 10. The argument is to show that by "my rest," God means a future rest, not for Himself, but for us. finished—Greek, "brought into existence," "made." 4. he spake—God (Genesis 2. 2). God did rest the seventh day—A rest not ending with the seventh day, but beginning then and still continuing, into which believers shall hereafter enter. God's rest is not a rest necessitated by fatigue, nor consisting in idleness, but is that upholding and governing of which creation was the beginning. [ALFORD.] Hence Moses records the end of each of the first six days, but not of the seventh. from all his works—Hebrew, Genesis 2. 2, "from all His work." God's "work" was one, comprehending, however, many "works." 5. in this place—In this passage of the Psalm again, it is implied that the rest was even then still future. 6. it remaineth—still to be realized. some must enter—The denial of entrance to unbelievers is a virtual promise of entrance to those that believe. God wishes not his rest to be empty, but furnished with guests (Luke 14. 23). they to whom it was first preached entered not—lit., "they who first (in the time of Moses) had the Gospel preached to them," viz., in type, as Note, v. 2. unbelief—Greek, rather "disobedience" (Note, ch. 3. 18). 7. Again—Anew the promise recurs. Translate as the Greek order is, "He limited a certain day, 'To-day.'" Here Paul interrupts the quotation by, "In (the Psalm of David saying after so long a time" (after 500 years' possession of Canaan), and resumes it by, "As it has been said before (so the Greek oldest MS., before, viz., ch. 3. 7, 15), To-day if ye hear His voice," &c. [ALFORD.] 8. Answer to the objection which might be made to his reasoning, viz., that those brought into Canaan by Joshua (so "Jesus" here means, as in Acts 7. 45) did enter the rest of God. If the rest of God meant Canaan, God would not after the entrance into that land, have spoken (or speak [ALFORD]) of another (future) day of entering the rest. 9. therefore—because God “speaks of another day” (Note, v. 8). remaineth—still to be realized hereafter by the “some (who) must enter therein” (v. 6), i. e., “the people of God,” the true Israel who shall enter into God's rest (“my rest,” v. 3). God's rest was a Sabbatism, so also will ours be, a rest—Greek, “Sabbatism.” In time there are many Sabbaths, but then there shall be the enjoyment and keeping of a Sabbath rest: one perfect and eternal. The “rest” in v. 8 is Greek “catapausis,” Hebrew, “Noah;” rest from weariness, as the ark rested on Ararat after its tossings to and fro; and as Israel, under Joshua, enjoyed at last rest from war in Canaan. But the “rest” in v. 9 is the nobler and more exalted (Hebrew) “Sabbath” rest; lit., cessation: rest from work when finished (v. 4), as God rested (Revelation 16. 17). The two ideas of “rest” combined, give the perfect view of the heavenly Sabbath. Rest from weariness, sorrow, and sin; and rest in the completion of God's new creation (Revelation 21. 5). The whole renovated creation shall share in it; nothing will there be to break the Sabbath of eternity; and the Triune God shall rejoice in the work of His hands (Zephaniah 3. 7). Moses, the representative of the law, could not lead Israel into Canaan: the law leads us to Christ, and there His office ceases, as that of Moses on the borders of Canaan: It is Jesus, the antitype of Joshua, who leads us into the heavenly rest. This verse indirectly establishes the obligation of the Sabbath still; for the type continues until the antitype supersedes it: so legal sacrifices continued till the great antitypical Sacrifice superseded it. As then the antitypical heavenly Sabbath rest will not be till Christ comes, our Gospel Joshua, to usher us into it, the typical earthly Sabbath must continue till then. The Jews call the future rest “the day which is all Sabbath.”

10. For—Justifying and explaining the word “rest,” or “Sabbatism,” just used (Note, v. 9). he that is entered—whosoever once enters. his rest—God's rest: the rest prepared by God for His people. [ESTIUS.] Rather, His rest: the man's rest: that assigned to him by God as his. The Greek is the same as that for “his own” immediately after. hath ceased—The Greek aorist is used of indefinite time, “Is wont to cease,” or rather, “rest;” rests. The past tense implies at the same time the certainty of it, as also that in this life a kind of foretaste in Christ is already given [GROTIUS] (Jeremiah 6. 16; Matthew 11. 28, 29). Our highest happiness shall, according to this verse, consist in our being united in one with God, and moulded into conformity with Him as our archetype. [CALVIN.] from his own works—even from those that were good and suitable to the time of doing work. Labour was followed by rest even in Paradise (Genesis 2. 3, 15). The work and subsequent rest of God are the archetype to which we should be conformed. The argument is, He who once enters rest, rests from labours; but God's people have not yet rested from them, therefore they have not yet entered the rest, and so it must be still future. ALFORD translates, “He that entered into his (or else God's), but rather ‘his;’ Isaiah 11. 10, ‘His rest:’ ‘the joy of the Lord;’ Matthew 25. 21, 23) rest (viz., Jesus, our Forerunner, v. 14; ch. 6. 20, ‘The Son of God that is passed through the heavens:’ in contrast to Joshua the type, who did not bring God's people into the heavenly rest, he himself (emphatically) rested from his works (v. 4), as God (did) from His own” (so the Greek, works). The argument, though generally applying to any one who has entered his rest, probably alludes to Jesus in particular, the antitypical Joshua, who, having entered His rest at the Ascension, has ceased or rested from His work of the new creation, as God on the seventh day rested from the work of physical creation. Not that He has ceased to carry on the work of redemption, nay, He upholds it by His mediation; but He has ceased from those portions of the work which constitute the foundation, the sacrifice has been once for all accomplished. Cf. as to God's creation rest, once for all completed, and rested from, but now still upheld (Note, v. 4).

11. Let us . . . therefore—Seeing such a promise is before us, which we may, like them, fall short of through unbelief. labour—Greek, “strive diligently.” that rest—which is still future and so glorious. Or, in ALFORD's translation of v. 10, “That rest into which Christ has entered before” (v. 14; ch. 6. 20). fall—with the soul, not merely the body, as the rebel Israelites fell (ch. 3. 17). after the same example—ALFORD translates, “fall into the same example.” The less prominent place of the “fall” in the Greek favours this. The sense is, “lest any fall into such disobedience (so the Greek for ‘unbelief’ means) as they gave a sample of.” [GROTIUS.] The Jews say, “The parents are a sign (warning) to their sons.”

12. For—Such diligent striving (v. 11) is incumbent on us, for we have to do with a God whose “word” whereby we shall be judged, is heart-searching, and whose eyes are all-seeing (v. 13). The qualities here attributed to the word of God, and the whole context, show that it is regarded in its JUDICIAL power, whereby it doomed the disobedient Israelites to exclusion from Canaan, and shall exclude unbelieving so-called Christians from the heavenly rest. The written word of God is not the prominent thought here, though the passage is often quoted as if it were. Still the word of God (the same as that preached, v. 2), used here in the broadest sense, but with special reference to its judicial power, INCLUDES the word of God, the sword of the Spirit with double edge, one edge for convicting and converting some (v. 2), and the other for condemning and destroying the unbelieving (v. 14). Revelation 19. 15 similarly represents the Word's judicial power as a sharp sword going out of Christ's mouth to smite the nations. The same word which is saving to the faithful (v. 2) is destroying to the disobedient (2 Corinthians 2. 15, 16). The personal Word, to whom some refer the passage, is not here meant: for He is not the sword, but has the sword. Thus reference to Joshua appropriately follows in v. 8. quick—Greek, “living;” having living power, as “the rod of the mouth and the breath of the lips” of “the living God.”

powerful—Greek, “energetic;” not only living, but energetically efficacious. sharper—“more cutting.” two-edged—sharpened at both edge and back. Cf. “sword of the Spirit . . . word of God” (Ephesians 6. 17). Its double power seems to be implied by its being “two-edged.” “It judges all that is in the heart, for there it passes through, at once punishing [unbelievers] and searching” [both believers and unbelievers]. [CHRYSOSTOM.] PHILO similarly speaks of “God passing between the parts of Abraham's sacrifices [Genesis 15. 17, where, however, it is a ‘burning lamp’ that passed between the pieces] with His word, which is the cutter of all things: which sword, being sharpened to the utmost keenness, never ceases to divide all sensible things, and even things not perceptible to sense or physically divisible, but perceptible and divisible by the word.” Paul's early training, both in the Greek schools of Tarsus and the Hebrew schools at Jerusalem, accounts fully for his acquaintance with Philo's modes of thought, which were sure to be current among learned Jews everywhere, though Philo himself belonged to Alexandria, not Jerusalem. Addressing Jews, he by the Spirit sanctions what was true in their current literature, as he similarly did in addressing Gentiles (Acts 17. 28). piercing—Greek, “coming through.” even to the dividing asunder of soul and spirit—i. e., reaching through even to the separation of the animal soul, the lower part of man's incorporeal nature, the seat of animal desires, which he has in common with the brutes; cf. the same Greek, 1 Corinthians 2. 14, “the natural [animal-souled] man” (Jude 19), from the spirit (the higher part of man, receptive of the Spirit of God, and allying him to heavenly beings). and of the joints and marrow—rather, (reaching even to) “both the joints (so as to divide them) and marrow.” Christ “knows what is in man” (John 2. 25): so His word reaches as far as to the most intimate and accurate knowledge of man's most hidden parts, feelings, and thoughts, dividing, i. e., distinguishing what is spiritual from what is carnal and animal in him: the spirit from the soul: so Proverbs 20. 27. As the knife of the Levitical priest reached to dividing parts, closely united as the joints of the limbs, and penetrated to the innermost parts, as the marrows (the Greek is plural); so the word of God divides the closely-joined parts of man's immaterial being, soul and spirit, and penetrates to the innermost parts of the spirit. The clause (reaching even to) "both the joints and marrow" is subordinate to the clause, "even to the dividing asunder of soul and spirit." (In the oldest MSS., as in English Version, there is no "both," as there is in the clause "both the joints and," &c., which marks the latter to be subordinate.) An image (appropriate in addressing Jews) from the literal dividing of joints, and penetrating to, so as to open out, the marrow, by the priest's knife, illustrating the previously-mentioned spiritual "dividing of soul from spirit," whereby each (soul as well as spirit) is laid bare and "naked" before God; this view accords with v. 13. Evidently "the dividing of the soul from the spirit" answers to the "joints" which the sword, when it reaches unto, divides asunder, as the "spirit" answers to the innermost "marrow." "Moses forms the soul, Christ the spirit. The soul draws with it the body; the spirit draws with it both soul and body." ALFORD'S interpretation is clumsy, by which he makes the soul itself, and the spirit itself, to be divided, instead of the soul from the spirit: so also he makes not only the joints to be divided asunder, but the marrow also to be divided (?). The Word's dividing and far-penetrating power, has both a punitive and a healing effect. discerner of the thoughts—Greek, "capable of judging the purposes." intents—rather, "conceptions" [CRELLIUS]; "ideas" [ALFORD.] As the Greek for "thoughts" refers to the mind and feelings, so that for "intents," or rather "mental conceptions," refers to the intellect. 13. creature—visible or invisible. in his sight—in God's sight (v. 12). "God's wisdom, simply manifold, and uniformly multiform, with incomprehensible comprehension, comprehends all things incomprehensible." opened—lit., "thrown on the back so as to have the neck laid bare," as a victim with neck exposed for sacrifice. The Greek perfect tense implies that this is our continuous state in relation to God. "Show, O man, shame and fear towards thy God, for no veil, no twisting, bending, colouring, or disguise, can cover unbelief" (Greek, "disobedience," v. 11). Let us, therefore, earnestly labour to enter the rest lest any fall through practical unbelief (v. 11). 14. having, therefore, &c.—Resuming ch. 2. 17. great—as being "the Son of God, higher than the heavens" (ch. 7. 26): the archetype and antitype of the legal high priest. passed into the heavens—rather, "passed through the heavens," viz., those which come between us and God, the aerial heaven, and that above the latter containing the heavenly bodies, the sun, moon, &c. These heavens were the veil which our High Priest passed through into the heaven of heavens, the immediate presence of God, just as the Levitical high priest passed through the veil into the Holy of holies. Neither Moses, nor even Joshua, could bring us into this rest, but Jesus, as our Forerunner, already spiritually, and hereafter in actual presence, body, soul, and spirit, brings His people into the heavenly rest. Jesus—the antitypical Joshua (v. 8). hold fast—the opposite of "let slip" (ch. 2. 1); and "fall away" (ch. 6. 6). As the genitive follows, the lit. sense is, "Let us take hold of our profession," i. e., of the faith and hope which are subjects of our profession and confession. The accusative follows when the sense is "hold fast." [TITTMANN.] 15. For—The motive to "holding our profession" (v. 14), viz., the sympathy and help we may expect from our High Priest. Though "great" (v. 14), He is not above caring for us; nay, as being in all points one with us as to manhood, sin only excepted, He sympathizes with us in every temptation. Though exalted to the highest heavens, He has changed His place, not His nature and office in relation to us, His condition, but not His affection. Cf. Matthew 26. 38, "Watch with me:" showing His desire in the days of His flesh for the sympathy of those whom He loved: so He now gives His suffering people His sympathy. Cf. Aaron, the type, bearing the names of the twelve tribes in the breastplate of judgment on his heart, when he entered into the holy place, for a memorial before the Lord continually (Exodus 28. 29). cannot be touched with the feeling of—Greek, "cannot sympathize with our infirmities:" our weaknesses, physical and moral (not sin, but liability to its assaults). He, though sinless, can sympathize with us sinners; His understanding more acutely perceived the forms of temptation than we who are weak can; His will repelled them as instantaneously as the fire does the drop of water cast into it. He, therefore, experimentally knew what power was needed to overcome temptations. He is capable of sympathizing, for He was at the same time tempted without sin, and yet truly tempted. [BENGEL.] In Him alone we have an example suited to men of every character and under all circumstances. In sympathy He adapts himself to each, as if He had not merely taken on Him man's nature in general, but also the peculiar nature of that single individual. but—nay, rather, He was (one) tempted." [ALFORD.] like as we are—Greek, "according to (our) similitude," without sin—Greek choris, "separate from sin" (ch. 7. 26). If the Greek aneu had been used, sin would have been regarded as the object absent from Christ the subject; but choris here implies that Christ, the subject, is regarded as separated from sin the object. [TITTMANN.] Thus, throughout His temptations in their origin, process and result, sin had nothing in him; He was apart and separate from it. [ALFORD.] 16. come—rather as Greek, "approach," "draw near." boldly—Greek, "with confidence," or "freedom of speech" (Ephesians 6. 19). the throne of grace—God's throne is become to us a throne of grace through the mediation of our High Priest at God's right hand (ch. 8. 1; 12. 2). Pleading our High Priest Jesus' meritorious death, we shall always find God on a throne of grace. Contrast Job's complaint (Job 23. 3-8) and Elihu's "If," &c. (Job 33. 23-28). obtain—rather, "receive." mercy—"Compassion," by its derivation (lit., fellow-feeling from community of suffering), corresponds to the character of our High Priest "touched with the feeling of our infirmities" (v. 15). find grace—Corresponding to "throne of grace." Mercy especially refers to the remission and removal of sins; grace, to the saving bestowal of spiritual gifts. [EUSTIUS.] Cf. Come unto me . . . and I will give you rest (the rest received on first believing); take my yoke on you . . . and ye shall find rest (the continuing rest and peace found in daily submitting to Christ's easy yoke; the former answers to "receive mercy" here; the latter, to "find grace," Matthew 11. 28, 29). in time of need—Greek, "seasonably." Before we are overwhelmed by the temptation; when we most need it, in temptations and persecutions; such as is suitable to the time, persons, and end designed (Psalm 104. 27). A supply of grace is in store for believers against all exigencies; but they are only supplied with it according as the need arises. Cf. "in due time," Romans 5. 6. Not, as ALFORD explains, "Help in time," i. e., to-day, while it is yet open to us; the accepted time (2 Corinthians 6. 2). help—Cf. ch. 2. 18, "He is able to succour them that are tempted."

CHAPTER V.

VCT. 1-14. CHRIST'S HIGH PRIESTHOOD; NEEDED QUALIFICATIONS; MUST BE A MAN; MUST NOT HAVE ASSUMED THE DIGNITY HIMSELF, BUT HAD BEEN APPOINTED BY GOD; THEIR LOW SPIRITUAL PERCEPTIONS A BAR TO PAUL'S SAYING ALL HE MIGHT ON CHRIST'S MELCHISEDECIKE PRIESTHOOD. 1. For—Substantiating ch. 4. 15. every—i. e., every legitimate high priest; for instance, the Levitical, as he is addressing Hebrews, among whom the Levitical priesthood was established as the legitimate one. Whatever, reasons Paul, is excellent in the Levitical priests, is also in Christ, and besides excellencies which are not in the Levitical priests, taken from among men—not from among angels, who could not have a fellow-feeling with us men. This qualification Christ has, as being, like the Levitical priests, a man (ch. 2. 14, 16). Being "from men," He can be "for (i. e., in behalf of, for the good of) men." ordained—Greek, "constituted," "appointed." both gifts—to be joined with "for sins," as "sacrifices" is (the "both . . . and" requires this); therefore not the Hebrew Mincha, unbloody offerings, but animal whole burnt offerings, spontaneously given. "Sacr-

nces" are the animal sacrifices due according to the legal ordinance. [ESTIUS.] 2. Who can—Greek, "Being able;" not pleasing himself (Romans 15. 3). have compassion—Greek, "estimate mildly;" "feel leniently;" or "moderately towards;" "to make allowance for;" not showing stern rigour save to the obstinate (ch. 10. 28). ignorant—sins not committed in resistance of light and knowledge, but as Paul's past sin (1 Timothy 1. 13). No sacrifice was appointed for wilful sin committed with a high hand; for such were to be punished with death; all other sins, viz., ignorances and errors, were confessed and expiated with sacrifices by the high priest. out of the way—not deliberately and altogether wilfully erring, but deluded through the fraud of Satan and their own carnal frailty and thoughtlessness. infirmity—moral weakness which is sinful, and makes men capable of sin, and so requires to be expiated by sacrifices. This kind of "infirmity" Christ had not; He had the "infirmity" of body whereby He was capable of suffering and death. 3. by reason hereof—"on account of this" infirmity, he ought . . . also for himself, to offer for sins—the Levitical priest ought; in this our High Priest is superior to the Levitical. The second "for" is a different Greek term from the first; "in behalf of the people, &c., on account of sins." 4. no man—of any other family but Aaron's, according to the Mosaic law, can take to himself the office of high priest. This verse is quoted by some to prove the need of an apostolic succession of ordination in the Christian ministry; but the reference here is to the priesthood, not the Christian ministry. The analogy in our Christian dispensation would warn ministers, seeing that God has separated them from the congregation of His people to bring them near Himself, and to do the service of His house, and to minister (as He separated the Levites, Korah with his company), that content with this, they should beware of assuming the sacrificial priesthood also, which belongs to Christ alone. The sin of Korah was, not content with the ministry as a Levite, he took the sacerdotal priesthood also. No Christian minister, as such, is ever called Hieruus, i. e., sacrificing priest. All Christians, without distinction, whether ministers or people, have a metaphorical, not a literal, priesthood. The sacrifices which they offer are spiritual, not literal, their bodies and the fruit of their lips, praises continually (ch. 13. 15). Christ alone had a proper and true sacrifice to offer. The law sacrifices were typical, not metaphorical, as the Christian's, nor proper and true, as Christ's. In Roman times the Mosaic restriction of the priesthood to Aaron's family was violated. 5. glorified not himself—did not assume the glory of the priestly office of Himself without the call of God (John 8. 54). but he that said—i. e., the Father glorified Him or appointed Him to the priesthood. This appointment was in involved in, and was the result of, the Sonship of Christ, which qualified Him for it. None but the Divine Son could have fulfilled such an office (ch. 10. 5-9). The connection of Sonship and priesthood is typified in the Hebrew title for priests being given to David's sons (2 Samuel 8. 18). Christ did not constitute Himself the Son of God, but was from everlasting the only-begotten of the Father. On His Sonship depended His glorification, and His being called of God (v. 10), as Priest. 6. He is here called simply "Priest;" in v. 5, "High Priest." He is a Priest absolutely, because He stands alone in that character without an equal. He is "High Priest" in respect of the Aaronic type, and also in respect to us, whom He has made priests by throwing open to us access to God. [BENGEL.] "The order of Melchisedec" is explained in ch. 7. 15, "the similitude of Melchisedec." The priesthood is similarly combined with His kingly office in Zechariah 6. 13. Melchisedec was at once man, priest, and king. Paul's selecting as the type of Christ one not of the stock of Abraham, on which the Jews prided themselves, is an intimation of Messianic universalism. 7. in the days of his flesh—(Ch. 2. 14; 10. 20.) Verses 7-10 state summarily the subject about to be handled more fully in chs. 7. and 8. when he had offered—rather, "in that He offered." His crying and tears were part of the experimental lesson of obedience which He submitted to learn from the Father (when God was qualifying Him for the high priesthood). "Who" is to be construed with "learned obedience" (or rather as Greek, "His obedience," the obedience which we all know about). This all shows that "Christ glorified not Himself to be made an High Priest" (v. 5), but was appointed thereto by the Father. prayers and supplications—Greek, "both prayers and supplications." In Gethsemane, where He prayed thrice, and on the cross, where He cried, My God, my God, &c., probably repeating inwardly all the 22d Psalm. "Prayers" refer to the mind: "supplications" also to the body [viz., the suppliant attitude] (Matthew 26. 39). [BENGEL.] with strong crying and tears—The "tears" are an additional fact here communicated to us by the inspired apostle, not recorded in the Gospels, though implied. Matthew 26. 37, "sorrowful and very heavy." Mark 14. 33; Luke 22. 44, "in an agony He prayed more earnestly . . . His sweat . . . great drops of blood falling down to the ground." Psalm 22. 1 ("roaring . . . cry"); 2, 19, 21, 24; 69. 3, 10, "I wept." able to save him from death—Mark 14. 36, "All things are possible unto thee" (John 12. 27). His cry showed His entire participation of man's infirmity: His reference of His wish to the will of God, His sinless faith and obedience. heard in that he feared—There is no intimation in Psalm 22., or the Gospels, that Christ prayed to be saved from the mere act of dying. What He feared was the hiding of the Father's countenance. His holy filial love must rightly have shrunk from this strange and bitterest of trials without the imputation of impatience. To have been passively content at the approach of such a cloud would have been, not faith, but sin. The cup of death He prayed to be freed from, was, not corporal, but spiritual death, i. e., the (temporary) separation of His human soul from the light of God's countenance. His prayer was "heard" in His Father's strengthening Him so as to hold fast His unwavering faith under the trial (My God, my God, was still His filial cry under it, still exclaiming God as His, though God hid His face), and soon removing it in answer to His cry during the darkness on the cross, "My God, my God," &c. But see below a further explanation of how He was heard. The Greek lit. is, "Was heard from His fear," i. e., so as to be saved from His fear. Cf. Psalm 22. 21, which well accords with this, "Save me from the lion's mouth (His prayer): thou hast heard me from the horns of the unicorns." Or what better accords with the strict meaning of the Greek noun, "in consequence of His REVERENTIAL FEAR," i. e., in that He shrank from the horrors of separation from the bright presence of the Father, yet was reverentially cautious by no thought or word of impatience to give way to a shadow of distrust or want of perfect filial love. In the same sense ch. 12. 28 uses the noun, and ch. 11. 7 the verb. ALFORD somewhat similarly translates, "By reason of His reverent submission." I prefer "reverent fear." The word in derivation means the cautious handling of some precious, yet delicate vessel, which with ruder handling might easily be broken. [TRENCH.] This fully agrees with Jesus' spirit, "If it be possible . . . nevertheless not my will, but thy will be done;" and with the context, v. 5, "Glorified not Himself to be made an High Priest," implying reverent fear: wherein it appears He had the requisite for the office specified v. 4, "No man taketh this honour unto himself." ALFORD well says, What is true in the Christian's life, that what we ask from God, though He may not grant in the form we wish, yet He grants in His own, and that a better form, does not hold good in Christ's case; for Christ's real prayer, "not my will, but thine be done," in consistency with His reverent fear towards the Father, was granted in the very form in which it was expressed, not in another. 8. Though He was (so it ought to be translated: a positive admitted fact: not a mere supposition as were would imply) God's Divine Son (whence, even in His agony, He so lovingly and often cried, Father, Matthew 26. 39), yet He learned His (so the Greek) obedience, not from His Sonship, but from His sufferings. As the Son, He was always obedient to the Father's will; but the special obedience needed to qualify Him as our High Priest, He learned experimentally in practical suffering. Cf. Philipplans 2. 6-8, "Equal with God, but . . . took upon Him the form of a servant, and became obedient unto death," &c. He was obedient already before His passion, but He stooped to a still more humiliating and trying form of obedience then. The Greek adage is, Pathemata mathemata, "sufferings, disciplinings." Praying and obeying, as in Christ's case, ought to go hand in hand. 9. made perfect—completed, brought to His goal of learning and suffering through death (ch. 2. 10) [ALFORD], viz., at His glorious resurrection and ascension. author—Greek, "cause." unto all . . . that obey him—As Christ obeyed the Father, so must we obey Him by faith. eternal salvation—obtained for us in the short "days of Jesus' flesh" (v. 7; cf. v. 6, "for ever," Isaiah 45. 17). 10. Greek, rather, "Addressed by God (by the appellation) High Priest." Being formally recognized by God as High Priest at the time of His being "made perfect" (v. 9). He was High Priest already in the purpose of God before His passion; but after it, when perfected, He was formally addressed so. 11. Here he digresses to complain of the low spiritual attainments of the Palestinian Christians, and to warn them of the danger of falling from light once enjoyed; at the same time encouraging them by God's faithfulness to persevere. At ch. 6. 20 he resumes the comparison of Christ to Melchisedec. hard to be uttered—rather as Greek, "hard of interpretation to speak." Heard for me to state intelligibly to you owing to your dullness about spiritual things. Hence, instead of saying many things, he writes in comparatively few words (ch. 13. 22). In the "we," Paul, as usual, includes Timothy with himself in addressing them. ye are—Greek, "ye have become dull" (the Greek, by derivation, means hard to move): this implies that once, when first "enlightened," they were earnest and zealous, but had become dull. That the Hebrew believers at JERUSALEM were dull in spiritual things, and legal in spirit, appears from Acts 21. 20-24, where James and the elders expressly say of the "thousands of Jews which believe," that "they are all zealous of the law;" this was at Paul's last visit to Jerusalem, after which this Epistle seems to have been written (v. 12, Note on "for the time"). 12. for the time—considering the long time that you have been Christians. Therefore this Epistle was not one of those early written. which be the first principles—Greek, "the rudiments of the beginning of," &c. A Pauline phrase (Notes, Galatians 4. 3, 9). Ye need not only to be taught the first elements, but also "which they be." They are therefore enumerated ch. 6. 1, 2. [BENGL.] ALFORD translates, "That some one teach you the rudiments;" but the position of the Greek tina, inclines me to take it interrogatively, "which," as English Version, Syriac, Vulgate, &c. of the oracles of God—viz., of the Old Testament: instead of seeing Christ as the end of the Old Testament Scripture, they were relapsing towards Judaism, so as not only not to be capable of understanding the typical reference to Christ of such an Old Testament personage as Melchisedec, but even much more elementary references. are become—through indolence. milk . . . not . . . strong meat—"Milk" refers to such fundamental first principles as he enumerates ch. 6. 1, 2. The solid meat, or food, is not absolutely necessary for preserving life, but is so for acquiring greater strength. Especially in the case of the Hebrews, who were much given to allegorical interpretations of their law, which they so much venerated, the application of the Old Testament types, to Christ and His High Priesthood, was calculated much to strengthen them in the Christian faith. [LIMBORCH.] 13. useth—Greek, "partaketh," i. e., taketh as his portion. Even strong men partake of milk, but do not make milk their chief, much less their sole, diet. the word of righteousness—the Gospel wherein "the righteousness of God is revealed from faith to faith" (Romans 1. 17), and which is called "the ministration of righteousness" (2 Corinthians 3. 9). This includes the doctrine of justification and sanctification: the first principles, as well as the perfection, of the doctrine of Christ: the nature of the offices and person of Christ as the true Melchisedec, i. e., "King of righteousness" (cf.

Matthew 3. 15). 14. strong meat—"solid food." by reason of use—Greek, "habit." them . . . of full age—lit., "perfect:" akin to "perfection" (ch. 6. 1). senses—organs of sense. exercised—similarly connected with "righteousness" in ch. 12. 11. to discern both good and evil—as a child no longer an infant (Isalah 7. 16): so able to distinguish between sound and unsound doctrine. The mere child puts into its mouth things hurtful and things nutritious, without discrimination: but not so the adult. Paul again alludes to their tendency not to discriminate, but to be carried about by strange doctrines, in ch. 13. 9.

CHAPTER VI.

Ver. 1-14. WARNING AGAINST RETROGRADING, WHICH SOON LEADS TO APOSTASY; ENCOURAGEMENT TO STEADFASTNESS FROM GOD'S FAITHFULNESS TO HIS WORD AND OATH. 1. Therefore—Wherefore: seeing that ye ought not now to be still "babes" (ch. 5. 11-14). leaving—getting further forward than the elementary "principles." "As in building a house one must never leave the foundation: yet to be always labouring in 'laying the foundation' would be ridiculous." [CALVIN.] the principles of the doctrine—Greek, "the word of the beginning," i. e., the discussion of the first principles of Christianity (ch. 5. 12). let us go on—Greek, "let us be borne forward," or "bear ourselves forward:" implying active exertion: press on. St. Paul, in teaching, here classifies himself with the Hebrew readers, or (as they ought to be) learners, and says, Let us together press forward. perfection—the matured knowledge of those who are "of full age" (ch. 5. 14) in Christian attainments. foundation of—i. e., consisting in "repentance," repentance from dead works—viz., not springing from the vital principle of faith and love toward God, and so counted, like their doer, dead before God. This repentance from dead works is therefore paired with "faith toward God." The three pairs of truths enumerated are designedly such as JEWISH believers might in some degree have known from the Old Testament, but had been taught more clearly when they became Christians. This accounts for the omission of distinct specification of some essential first principle of Christian truth. Hence, too, he mentions "faith toward God," and not explicitly faith toward Christ (though of course included). Repentance and faith were the first principles taught under the Gospel. 2. the doctrine of baptism—paired with "laying on of hands," as the latter followed on Christian baptism, and answers to the rite of confirmation in Episcopal churches. Jewish believers passed, by an easy transition, from Jewish baptismal purifications (ch. 9. 10, "washings"), baptism of proselytes, and John's baptism, and legal imposition of hands, to their Christian analogues, baptism, and the subsequent laying on of hands, accompanied by the gift of the Holy Ghost (cf. v. 4). Greek, Baptismoi, plural, including Jewish and Christian baptisms, are to be distinguished from Baptisma, singular, restricted to Christian baptism. The six particulars here specified had been, as it were, the Christian Catechism of the Old Testament; and such Jews who had begun to recognize Jesus as the Christ immediately on the new light being shed on these fundamental particulars, were accounted as having the elementary principles of the doctrine of Christ. [BENGL.] The first and most obvious elementary instruction of Jews would be the teaching them the typical significance of their own ceremonial law in its Christian fulfilment. [ALFORD.] resurrection, &c.—held already by the Jews from the Old Testament: confirmed with clearer light in Christian teaching or "doctrine." eternal judgment—judgment fraught with eternal consequences either of joy or of woe. 3. will we do—So some of the oldest MSS. read; but others, "Let us do." "This," i. e., "Go on unto perfection." if God permit—For even in the case of good resolutions, we cannot carry them into effect, save through God "working in us both to will and to do of His good pleasure" (Philipplans 2. 13). The "for" in v. 4 refers to this: I say, if God permit, for there are cases where God does not permit, ex. gr., "it is impossible," &c.

Without God's blessing, the cultivation of the ground does not succeed (v. 7). 4. We must "go on toward perfection;" for if we fall away, after having received enlightenment, it will be impossible to renew us again to repentance. for those—"in the case of those," once enlightened—once for all illuminated by the word of God taught in connection with "baptism" (to which, in v. 2, as once for all done, "once enlightened" here answers), cf. Ephesians 5. 26. This passage probably originated the application of the term "illumination" to baptism in subsequent times. Illumination, however, was not supposed to be the inseparable accompaniment of baptism: thus CHRYSOSTOM says, "Heretics have baptism, not illumination: they are baptized in body, but not enlightened in soul: as Simon Magus was baptized, but not illuminated." That "enlightened" here means knowledge of the word of truth, appears from comparing the same Greek word "illuminated," ch. 10. 32, with 26, where "knowledge of the truth" answers to it. tasted of the heavenly gift—tasted for themselves. As "enlightened" refers to the sense of sight: so here taste follows. "The heavenly gift;" Christ given by the Father, and revealed by the enlightening word preached and written: as conferring peace in the remission of sins; and as the Bestower of the gift of the Holy Spirit (Acts 8. 19, 20). made partakers of the Holy Ghost—Specified as distinct from, though so inseparably connected with, "enlightened," and "tasted of the heavenly gift," Christ, as answering to "laying on of hands" after baptism, which was then generally accompanied with the impartation of the Holy Ghost in miraculous gifts. 5. tasted the good word of God—Distinct from "tasted of (genitive) the heavenly gift:" we do not yet enjoy all the fulness of Christ, but only have a taste of Him, the heavenly gift now; but believers may taste the whole word (accusative) of God already, viz., God's "good word" of promise. The Old Testament promise of Canaan to Israel typified "the good word of God's" promise of the heavenly rest (ch. 4). Therefore, there immediately follows the clause, "the powers of the world to come." As "enlightening" and "tasting of the heavenly gift," Christ, the Bread of Life, answers to FAITH: so "made partakers of the Holy Ghost," to CHARITY, which is the first fruit of the Spirit: and "tasted the good word of God, and the powers of the world to come," to HOPE. Thus the triad of privileges answers to the Trinity, the Father, Son, and Spirit, in their respective works toward us. "The world to come," is the Christian dispensation, viewed especially in its future glories, though already begun in grace here. The world to come thus stands in contrast to course of this world, altogether disorganized because God is not its spring of action and end. By faith, Christians make the world to come a present reality, though but a foretaste of the perfect future. The powers of this new spiritual world, partly exhibited in outward miracles at that time, and then, as now, especially consisting in the Spirit's inward quickening influences, are the earnest of the coming inheritance above, and lead the believer who gives himself up to the Spirit to seek to live as the angels, to sit with Christ in heavenly places, to set the affections on things above, and not on things on earth, and to look for Christ's coming and the full manifestation of the world to come. This "world to come," in its future aspect, thus corresponds to "resurrection of the dead and eternal life" (v. 2), the first Christian principles which the Hebrew believers had been taught, by the Christian light being thrown back on their Old Testament for their instruction (Note, 1, 2). "The world to come," which, as to its "powers," exists already in the redeemed, will pass into a fully realized fact at Christ's coming (Colossians 3. 4). 6. If—Greek, "And (yet) have fallen away;" cf. a less extreme falling or declension, Galatians 5. 4, "Ye are fallen from grace." Here an entire and wilful apostasy is meant; the Hebrews had not yet so fallen away; but he warns them that such would be the final result of retrogression, if, instead of "going on to perfection," they should need to learn again the first principles of Christianity (v. 1). to renew them again—they have been "once" (v. 4) already renewed, or made anew, and now they need to be "renewed" over "again." crucify to themselves the Son of God—"are crucifying to themselves" Christ, instead of, like Paul, crucifying the world unto them by the cross of Christ (Galatians 6. 14). So in ch. 10. 29, "trodden under foot the Son of God, and counted the blood of the covenant, wherewith . . . sanctified, an unholy thing." "The Son of God," marking His dignity, shows the greatness of their offence. put him to an open shame—lit., "make a public example of" Him, as if He were a malefactor suspended on a tree. What the carnal Israel did outwardly, those who fall away from light do inwardly, they virtually crucify again the Son of God; "they tear him out of the recesses of their hearts where He had fixed His abode, and exhibit Him to the open scoffs of the world as something powerless and common." [BLEEK in ALFORD.] The Montanists and Novatians used this passage to justify the lasting exclusion from the Church of those who had once lapsed. The Catholic Church always opposed this view, and readmitted the lapsed on their repentance, but did not rebaptize them. This passage implies that persons may be in some sense "renewed," and yet fall away finally; for the words, "renew again," imply that they have been, in some sense, not the full sense, ONCE RENEWED by the Holy Ghost; but certainly not that they are "the elect," for these can never fall away, being chosen unto everlasting life (John 10. 28). The elect abide in Christ, hear and continuously obey His voice, and do not fall away. He who abides not in Christ, is cast forth as a withered branch; but he who abides in Him becomes more and more free from sin; the wicked one cannot touch him; and he by faith overcomes the world. A temporary faith is possible, without one thereby being constituted one of the elect (Mark 4. 16, 17). At the same time it does not limit God's grace, as if it were "impossible" for God to reclaim even such a hardened rebel so as yet to look on Him whom he has pierced. The impossibility rests in their having known in themselves once the power of Christ's sacrifice, and yet now rejecting it; there cannot possibly be any new means devised for their renewal afresh, and the means provided by God's love they now, after experience of them, deliberately and continuously reject; their conscience being seared, and they "twice dead" (Jude 12), are now past hope, except by a miracle of God's grace. "It is the curse of evil eternally to propagate evil." [THOLOUK.] "He who is led into the whole (?) compass of Christian experiences, may yet cease to abide in them; he who abides not in them, was, at the very time when he had those objective experiences, not subjectively true to them; otherwise there would have been fulfilled in him, 'Whosoever hath, to him shall be given, and he shall have more abundance' (Matthew 13. 12), so that he would have abided in them and not have fallen away." [THOLOUK.] Such a one was never truly a Spirit-led disciple of Christ (Romans 8. 14-17). The sin against the Holy Ghost, though somewhat similar, is not identical with this sin; for that sin may be committed by those outside the Church (as in Matthew 12. 24, 31, 32); this, only by those inside. 7. the earth—rather as Greek (no article), "land," which drinketh in—Greek, "which has drunk in;" not merely receiving it on the surface. Answering to those who have enjoyed the privilege of Christian experiences, being in some sense renewed by the Holy Ghost; true alike of those who persevere and those who "fall away." the rain that cometh oft upon it—not merely falling over it, or towards it, but falling and resting upon it so as to cover it (the Greek genitive, not the accusative). The "oft" implies, on God's part, the riches of His abounding grace ("coming" spontaneously, and often); and, on the apostate's part, the wilful perversity whereby he has done continual despite to the oft-repeated motions of the Spirit. Cf. "How often," Matthew 23. 37. The rain of heaven falls both on the elect and the apostates. bringeth forth—as the natural result of "having drunk in the rain." See above. herbs—provender. meet—fit. Such as the master of the soil wishes. The opposite of "rejected," v. 8. by whom—rather as Greek, "for (i. e., on account of) whom," viz., the lords of the soil; not the labourers, as English Version, viz., God and His Christ (1 Corinthians 3. 9). The heart of man is the earth; man is the dresser; herbs are brought forth meet, not for the dresser, by whom, but for God, the owner of the soil, for whom it is dressed. The plural is general, the owners whoever they may be; here God, receiveth—"partaketh of." blessing—fruitfulness. Contrast God's curse causing unfruitfulness, Genesis 3, 17, 18; also spiritually (Jeremiah 17. 5-8). from God—Man's use of means is vain unless God bless (1 Corinthians 3. 6, 7). 8. that which—rather as Greek (no article), "But if it (the 'land' v. 7) bear;" not so favourable a word as "bringeth forth," v. 7, said of the good soil. briers—Greek, "thistles." rejected—after having been tested; so the Greek implies. Reprobate . . . rejected by the Lord. nigh unto cursing—on the verge of being given up to its own barrenness by the just curse of God. This "nigh" softens the severity of the previous "it is impossible," &c. (v. 4, 6). The ground is not yet actually *curse*d. whose—"of which (land) the end is unto burning," viz., with the consuming fire of the last judgment; as the land of Sodom was given to "brimstone, salt, and burning" (Deuteronomy 29. 23); so as to the ungodly (Matthew 3. 10, 12; 7. 19; 13. 30; John 15. 6; 2 Peter 3. 10). Jerusalem, which had so resisted the grace of Christ, was then nigh unto cursing, and in a few years was burned. Cf. Matthew 22. 7, "Burned up their city;" an earnest of a like fate to all wilful abusers of God's grace (ch. 10. 26, 27). 9. we are persuaded—on good grounds; the result of proof. Cf. Romans 15. 14, "I myself am persuaded of you, my brethren, that ye are full of goodness." A confirmation of the Pauline authorship of this Epistle. beloved—Appositely here introduced; LOVE to you prompts me in the strong warnings I have just given, not that I entertain unfavourable thoughts of you; nay, I anticipate better things of you, Greek, "the things which are better;" that ye are not thorn-bearing, or nigh unto cursing, and doomed unto burning, but heirs of salvation in accordance with God's faithfulness (ch. 6. 10). things that accompany—Greek, "things that hold by;" i. e., are close unto "salvation." Things that are linked unto salvation (cf. v. 19). In opposition to "nigh unto cursing." though—Greek, "if even we thus speak." "For it is better to make you afraid with words, that ye may not suffer in fact." 10. not unrighteous—not unfaithful to His own gracious promise. Not that we have any inherent right to claim reward; for (1.) a servant has no merit, as he only does that which is his bounden duty; (2.) our best performances bear no proportion to what we leave undone; (3.) all strength comes from God; but God has promised of His own grace to reward the good works of His people (already accepted through faith in Christ); it is His promise, not our merits, which would make it unrighteous were He not to reward His people's works. God will be no man's debtor. your work—your whole Christian life of active obedience. labour of love—The oldest MSS. omit "labour of," which probably crept in from 1 Thesalonians 1. 3. As "love" occurs here, so "hope," v. 11, "faith," v. 12; as in 1 Corinthians 13. 13: the Pauline triad. By their love he sharpens their hope and faith. ye have showed—(Cf. ch. 10. 32-34.) toward his name—your acts of love to the saints were done for His name's sake. The distressed condition of the Palestinian Christians appears from the collection for them. Though receiving bounty from other churches, and therefore not able to minister much by pecuniary help, yet those somewhat better off could minister to the greatest sufferers in their Church in various other ways (cf. 2 Timothy 1. 18). St. Paul, as elsewhere, gives them the utmost credit for their graces, whilst delicately hinting the need of perseverance, a lack of which had probably somewhat begun to show itself. 11. And—Greek, "But." desire—Greek, "earnestly desire." The language of fatherly affection, rather than command. every one of you—Implying that all in the Palestinian churches had not shown the same diligence as some of those whom he praises in v. 10. "He cares alike for great and small, and overlooks none." "Every one of them," even those diligent in acts of LOVE v. 10), needed to be stimulated to persevere in the same diligence with a view to the full assurance of HOPE unto the end. They needed, besides love, patient perseverance, resting on hope and faith (ch. 10. 36; 13. 7). Cf. "the full assurance of faith," ch. 10. 22; Romans 4. 21; 1 Thesalonians 1. 5. unto the end—the coming of Christ. 12. be not—Greek, "become not." In ch. 5. 11, he said, "Ye have become dull (Greek, stiothful) of hearing;" here he warns them not to become "stiothful" absolutely, viz., also in mind and deed. He will not become stiothful who keeps always the end in view; hope is the means of ensuring this. followers—Greek, "imitators;" so in Ephesians 5. 1, Greek; 1 Corinthians 11. 1. patience—Greek, "long-suffering endurance." There is the long-suffering patience, or endurance of love, 1 Corinthians 13. 4, and that of faith, v. 15. them who . . . inherit the promises—Greek, ". . . who are *inheritin*g," &c.; to whom the promises are their inheritance. Not that they have actually entered on the perfect inheritance, which ch. 11. 13, 39, 40 explicitly denies, though doubtless the dead in Christ have, in the disembodied soul, a foretaste of it; but "them (enumerated in ch. 11) who in every age have been, are, or shall be, inheritors of the promises;" of whom Abraham is an illustrious example (v. 13). 13. For—Confirming the reasonableness of resting on "the promises" as infallibly sure, resting as they do on God's oath, by the instance of Abraham. "He now gives consolation, by the oath of God's grace, to those whom, in chs. 3. and 4., he had warned by the oath of God's 'wrath.' The oath of wrath did not primarily extend its force beyond the wilderness; but the oath of grace is in force for ever." [BENGEL.] 14. multiplying . . . multiply—Hebraism for superabundantly multiply. thee—The increase of Abraham's seed is virtually an increase of himself. The argument here refers to Abraham himself as an example; therefore Paul quotes Genesis 22. 17, "thee," instead of "thy seed." 15. so—thus relying on the promise. 16. for confirmation—not to be joined, as English Version, to "an oath;" but to "an end." [ALFORD.] I prefer, "The oath is to them, in respect to confirmation (of one's solemn promise or covenant; as here, God's), an end of all contradiction" (so the Greek is translated, ch. 12. 3), or "gainsaying." This passage shows, (1.) an oath is sanctioned even in the Christian dispensation as lawful; (2.) that the limits to its use are, that it only be employed where it can put an end to contradiction in disputes, and for confirmation of a solemn promise. 17. Wherein—i. e., Which being the case among men, God, in accommodation to their manner of confirming covenants, superadded to His sure word His oath; the "two immutable things" (v. 18). willing . . . counsel—Greek, "willing . . . will;" words akin. Expressing the utmost benignity. [BENGEL.] more abundantly—than had He not sworn. His word would have been amply enough; but, to make assurance doubly sure, He "interposed with an oath" (so the Greek). Lit., He acted as Mediator, coming between Himself and us; as if He were less, while He swears, than Himself by whom He swears [for the less among men usually swear by the greater]. Dost thou not yet believe, thou that hearest the promise? [BENGEL.] heirs of promise—not only Abraham's literal, but also his spiritual, seed (Galatians 3. 29). 18. immutable—translate, as in v. 17, "unchangeable." impossible . . . to lie—"ever to lie;" this is the force of the Greek aorist [ALFORD]. His not being able to deny Himself is a proof, not of weakness, but of strength incomparable. consolation—under doubts and fears, and so "encouragement," lit., exhortation. fled for refuge—as if from a shipwreck. Or, as one fleeing to one of the six cities of refuge. Kadesh, i. e., holy, implies the holiness of Jesus, our Refuge. Shechem, i. e., shoulder, the government is upon his shoulder (Isalah 9. 6). Hebron, i. e., fellowship, believers are called into the fellowship of Christ. Bezer, i. e., a fortress, Christ is so to all who trust in Him. Ramoth, i. e., high, for Him hath God exalted with His right hand (Acts 5. 31). Golan, i. e., joy, for in Him all the saints are justified and shall glory. lay hold upon the hope—i. e., the object of our hope, as upon a preservative from sinking. set before us—as a prize for which we strive; a new image, viz., the race-course (ch. 12. 1, 2). 19. Hope is found represented on coins by an anchor. sure and steadfast— sure in respect to us; steadfast, or "firm" [ALFORD], in itself. Not such an anchor as will not keep the vessel from tossing, or an anchor unsound or too light. [THEOPHYLACT.] which entereth into that [i. e., the place] within the veil—Two images beautifully combined: I. The soul is the ship; the world the sea; the bliss beyond the world, the distant coast; the hope resting on faith, the anchor which prevents the vessel being tossed to and fro; the encouraging consolation through the promise and oath of God, the cable connecting the ship and anchor. II. The world is the fore-court; heaven, the Holy of holies; Christ, the High Priest going before us, so as to enable us, after Him, and through Him, to enter within the veil. ESTIUS explains, As the anchor does not stay in the waters, but enters the ground hidden beneath the waters, and fastens itself in it, so hope, our anchor of the soul, is not satisfied with merely coming to the vestibule, i. e., is not content with merely earthly and visible goods, but penetrates even to those which are within the veil, viz., to the Holy of holies, where it lays hold on God Himself, and heavenly goods, and fastens on them. "Hope, entering within heaven, hath made us already to be in the things promised to us, even whilst we are still below, and have not yet received them; such strength hope has, as to make those that are earthly to become heavenly." "The soul clings, as one in fear of shipwreck, to an anchor, and sees not whither the cable of the anchor runs—where it is fastened; but she knows that it is fastened behind the veil which hides the future glory." veil—Greek, cutapetasma; the second veil which shut in the Holiest place. The outer veil was called by a distinct Greek term, calumna; "the second (i. e., the inner) veil." 20. The absence of the Greek article requires ALFORD's translation, "Where, AS forerunner for us (i. e., in our behalf), entered Jesus" [and is now: this last clause is implied in the "where" of the Greek, which implies being IN a place: "whither" is understood to "entered," taken out of "where"; whither Jesus entered, and where He is now]. The "for us" implies that it was not for Himself, as God, He needed to enter there, but as our High Priest, representing and introducing us, His followers, opening the way to us, by His intercession with the Father, as the Aaronic high priest entered the Holiest place once a year to make propitiation for the people. The first-fruits of our nature are ascended, and so the rest is sanctified. Christ's ascension is our promotion; and whither the glory of the Head has preceded, thither the hope of the body, too, is called. We ought to keep festal day, since Christ has taken up and set in the heavens the first-fruit of our lump, that is, the human flesh. [CHRYSOSTOM.] As John Baptist was Christ's forerunner on earth, so Christ is ours in heaven.

CHAPTER VII.

Ver. 1-23. CHRIST'S HIGH PRIESTHOOD AFTER THE ORDER OF MELCHISEDEC SUPERIOR TO AARON'S. 1. this Melchisedec—(Ch. 6. 20; Psalm 110. 4.) The verb does not come till v. 3, "abideth." king . . . priest—Christ unites these offices in their highest sense, and so restores the patriarchal union of these offices. Salem—Jerusalem, i. e., seeing peace; or thence make Salem distinct, and to be that mentioned (Genesis 33. 18; John 3. 22). the most high God—called also "Possessor of heaven and earth" (Genesis 11. 19, 22). This title of God, "the Most High," handed down by tradition from the primitive revelation, appears in the Phœnician god "Elion," i. e., Most High. It is used to imply that the God whom Melchisedec served is THE TRUE GOD, and not one of the gods of the nations around. So it is used in the only other cases in which it is found in the New Testament, viz., in the address of the demoniac, and the divining dæmonel constrained to confess that her own gods were false, and God the only true God. who met Abraham—in company with the king of Sodom (Genesis 11. 17, 18). slaughter—perhaps defeat, as ALFORD translates. So Genesis 14. 17 (cf. 15.) may be translated. Arloch, king of Ellasar, lived and reigned after the disaster. [BENGEL.] However, if Chedorlaomer, and Amraphel, and Tidal, were slain, though Arloch survived "slaughter of the kings" would be correct. blessed him—as priest he first blessed Abraham on God's part, next he blessed God on Abraham's part: a reciprocal blessing. Not a mere wish, but an authoritative and efficacious intercession as a priest. The Most High God's prerogative as "Possessor of heaven and earth," is made over to Abraham; and Abraham's glory, from his victory over the foe, is made over to God. A blessed exchange for Abraham (Genesis 14. 19, 20). 2. gave—Greek, "apportioned:" assigned as his portion. tenth . . . of all—viz., the booty taken. The tithes given are closely associated with the priesthood: the mediating priest received them as a pledge of the giver's whole property being God's; and as he conveyed God's gifts to man (v. 1, "blessed him"), so also man's gifts to God. Melchisedec is a sample of how God preserves, amidst general apostasy, an elect remnant. The meeting of Melchisedec and Abraham is the connecting link between the two dispensations, the patriarchal, represented by Melchisedec, who seems to have been specially consecrated by God as a KING-PRIEST, the highest form of that primitive system in which each father of a household was priest in it, and the Levitical, represented by Abraham, in which the priesthood was to be limited to one family of one tribe and one nation. The Levitical was parenthetical, and severed the kingdom and priesthood; the patriarchal was the true forerunner of Christ's, which, like Melchisedec's, unites the kingship and priesthood, and is not derived from other man, or transmitted to other man; but derived from God, and is transmitted in God to a never-ending perpetuity. Melchisedec's priesthood continueth in Christ for ever. For other points of superiority, see v. 16-21. Melchisedec must have had some special consecration above the other patriarchs, as Abraham, who also exercised the priesthood, else Abraham would not have paid tithe to him as to a superior: his peculiar function seems to have been, by God's special call, KING-priest; whereas no other patriarch-priest was also a God-consecrated king. first being—Paul begins the mystical explanation of the historical fact (allegorical explanations being familiar to Jews), by mentioning the significancy of the name. righteousness—not merely righteous; so Christ. Hebrew Malchi means king; Tzedek, righteousness. King of Salem—not only his own name, but that of the city which he ruled, had a typical significance, viz., peace. Christ is the true Prince of peace. The peace which He brings is the fruit of righteousness. 3. Without father, &c.—Explained by "without genealogy" (so the Greek is for "without descent"), cf. v. 6, i. e., his genealogy is not known; whereas a Levitical priest could not dispense with the proof of his descent. having neither beginning of days nor end of life—viz., history not having recorded his beginning nor end, as it has the beginning and end of Aaron. The Greek idiom expressed by "without father," &c., one whose parentage was humble or unknown. "Days" mean his time of discharging his function. So the eternity spoken of in Psalm 110. 4 is that of the priestly office chiefly. made like—it is not said that he was absolutely "like." Made like, viz., in the particulars here specified. Nothing is said in Genesis of the end of his priesthood, or of his having had in his priesthood either predecessor or successor, which, in a typical point of view, represents Christ's eternal priesthood, without beginning or end. Aaron's end is recorded; Melchisedec's not: typically significant. "The Son of God" is not said to be made like unto Melchisedec, but Melchisedec to be "made like the Son of God." When ALFORD denies that Melchisedec was made like the Son of God in respect of his priesthood, on the ground that Melchisedec was prior in time to our Lord, he forgets that Christ's eternal priesthood was an archetypal reality in God's purpose from everlasting, to which Melchisedec's priesthood was "made like" in due time. The Son of God is the more ancient, and is the archetype: cf. ch. 8. 5, where the heavenly things are represented as the primary archetype of the Levitical ordinances. The epithets, "without father, &c., beginning of days nor end, abideth continually," belong to Melchisedec only in respect to his priesthood, and in so far as he is the type of the Son of God, and are strictly true of Hlm alone. Melchisedec was, in his priesthood, "made like" Christ, as far as the imperfect type could represent the lineaments of the perfect archetype. "The portraits of a living man can be seen on the canvas, yet the man is very different from his picture." There is nothing in the account, Genesis 14., to mark Melchisedec as a superhuman being; he is classed with the other kings in the chapter as a living historic personage: not as ORIGEN thought, an angel; nor as the Jews thought, Shem, son of Noah; nor as CALMET, Enoch; nor as the Melchisedekites, that he was the Holy Ghost; nor as others, the Divine Word. He was probably of Shemitic, not Canaanite origin; the last independent representative of the original Shemitic population, which had been vanquished by the Canaanites, Ham's descendants. The greatness of Abraham then lay in hopes; of Melchisedec, in present possession. Melchisedec was the highest and last representative of the Noahic covenant, as Christ was the highest and ever-enduring representative of the Abrahamic. Melchisedec, like Christ, unites in himself the kingly and priestly offices, which Abraham does not. ALFORD thinks the epithets are, in some sense, strictly true of Melchisedec himself; not merely in the typical sense given above; but that he had not, as mortal men have, a beginning or end of life (?). A very improbable theory, and only to be resorted to in the last extremity, which has no place here. With Melchisedec, whose priesthood probably lasted a long period, the priesthood and worship of the true God in Canaan ceased. He was first and last king-priest there, till Christ, the antitype; and therefore his priesthood is said to last forever, because it both lasts a long time, and lasts as long as the nature of the thing itself (viz., his life, and the continuance of God's worship in Canaan) admits. If Melchisedec were high priest for ever in a literal sense, then Christ and he would now still be high priests, and we should have two instead of one (!). THOLUCK remarks, "Melchisedec remains in so far as the type remains in the antitype, in so far as his priesthood remains in Christ." The father and mother of Melchisedec, as also his children, are not descended from Levi, as the Levitical priests (v. 6) were required to be, and are not even mentioned by Moses. The wife of Aaron, Elisheba, the mother from whom the Levitical priests spring, is mentioned; as also Sarah, the original mother of the Jewish nation itself. As man, Christ had no father; as God, no mother. 4. consider—not merely see, but weigh with attentive contemplation, the fact. also—"To whom (as his superior) Abraham even paid tithe (went so far as to pay tithe) of (consisting of, lit., from) the best of the spoils" (lit., the top of the heap; whether of corn, the first-fruits of which, taken from the top, used to be consecrated to God; or of spoils, from the top of which the general used to take some portion for consecration to God, or for his own use). He paid "tithes of ALL," and those tithes were taken out of the topmost and best portion of the whole spoils. the patriarch—in the Greek emphatically standing at the end of the whole sentence: And this payer of tithe being no less a personage than "the patriarch," the first forefather and head of our Jewish race and nation. See Note, v. 3, on Melchisedec's superiority as specially consecrated king-priest, above the other patriarch-priests. 5. sons of Levi—viz., those alone who belonged to the family of Aaron, to whom the priesthood was restricted. Tithes originally paid to the whole tribe of Levi, became at length attached to the priesthood. according to the law—sanctioned by Jehovah (ch. 9. 19). of their brethren—with whom, in point of natural descent, they are on a level. though, &c.—though thus on a level by common descent from Abraham, they yet pay tithe to the Levites, whose brethren they are. Now the Levites are subordinate to the priests; and these again to Abraham, their common progenitor; and Abraham to Melchisedec. "How great" (v. 4) then, must this Melchisedec be in respect to his priesthood, as compared with the Levitical, though the latter received tithes! and now unspcakably great must "the Son of God" be, to whom, as the sacerdotal archetype (in God's purpose), Melchisedec was made like! Thus compare the "consider," v. 4, in the case of Melchisedec, the type, with the "consider" (Greek, contemplate attentively, Note, ch. 3. 1. 1, a stronger word than here) in the case of Christ, the archetype. 6. he whose descent is not counted from them—not from "the sons of Levi," as those "who receive the priesthood." This verse explains "without descent" (Greek genealogy in both verses, v. 3). He who needs not, as the Levitical priests, to be able to trace his genealogy back to Levi. received—Greek, "hath received tithes." blessed—Greek, "hath blessed." The perfect tense implies that the significance of the fact endures to the present time. him that had—"the possessor of the promises," Abraham's peculiar distinction and designation. Paul exalts Abraham in order still more to exalt Melchisedec. When Christ is the subject, the singular "promise" is used. "The promises" in the plural, refer to God's promise of greatness to himself and his seed, and of the possession of Canaan, twice repeated before the blessing of Melchisedec. As the priests, though above the people (v. 7) whom it was their duty to "bless," were yet subordinate to Abraham; and as Abraham was subordinate to Melchisedec, who blessed him, Melchisedec must be much above the Levitical priests. 7. The principle that the blessing is superior to him whom he blesses, holds good only in a blessing given with Divine authority; not merely a prayerful wish, but one that is divinely efficient in working its purport, as that of the patriarchs on their children: so Christ's blessing, Luke 24. 51; Acts 3. 26. 8. Second point of superiority: Melchisedec's is an enduring, the Levitical a transitory, priesthood. As the law was a parenthesis between Abraham's dispensation of promise of grace, and its enduring fulfilment at Christ's coming (Romans 5. 20, Greek, "The law entered as something accititious and by the way"); so the Levitical priesthood was parenthetical and temporary, between Melchisedec's typically-enduring priesthood, and its antitypical realization in our ever-continuing High Priest, Christ. here—in the Levitical priesthood. there—in the priesthood after the order of Melchisedec. In order to bring out the typical parallel more strongly, Paul substitutes "He of whom it is witnessed that he liveth," for the more untypical, "He who is made like to Him that liveth." Melchisedec "liveth" merely in his official capacity, his priesthood being continued in Christ. Christ, on the other hand, is, in His own person, "ever-living after the power of an endless life" (v. 16, 25). Melchisedec's death not being recorded, is expressed by the positive term "liveth," for the sake of bringing into prominence the antitype, Christ, of whom alone it is strictly and perfectly true, "that He liveth." 9. as I may so say—to preclude what he is about to say being taken in the mere literal sense; I may say that, virtually, Levi, in the person of his father Abraham, acknowledged Melchisedec's superiority, and paid tithes to him. who receiveth tithes—(Cf. v. 5) in Abraham—Greek, "by means of (by the hand of) Abraham;" through Abraham. "Paid tithes," lit., "hath been tithed," i. e., been taken tithes of. 10. in the loins of his father—i. e., forefather Abraham. Christ did not, in this sense, pay tithes in Abraham, for He never was in the loins of an earthly father. [ALFORD.] Though, in respect to His mother, He was "of the fruit of (David's, and so of) Abraham's loins," yet, being supernaturally, without human father, conceived, as He is above the natural law of birth, so is He above the law of tithes. Those alone born in the natural way, and so in sin, being under the curse, needed to pay tithe to the priest, that he might make propitiation for their sin. Not so Christ, who derived only his flesh, not also the taint of the flesh, from Abraham. BENGEL remarks, The blessings which Abraham had before meeting Melchisedec were the general promises, and the special one of a natural seed, and so of Levi; but the promises under which Christ was comprehended, and the faith for which Abraham was so commended, followed after Abraham's meeting Melchisedec, and being blessed by him: to which fact, Genesis 15. 1, "After these things," calls our attention.

This explains why Christ, the supernatural seed, is not included as paying tithes through Abraham to Melchisedec. 11. perfection—absolute: "the bringing of man to his highest state, viz., that of salvation and sanctification." under it—The reading in the oldest MSS. is, "Upon it (i. e., on the ground of it as the basis, the priest having to administer the law, Malachi 2. 7: it being presupposed) the people (ch. 9, 19, "all the people") hath received the law" (the Greek is perfect, not aorist; implying the people was still observing the law). what further need—(Ch. 8. 7.) For God does nothing needless. another—rather as Greek, "that a different priest (one of a different order) should arise" (anew, v. 15). not be called—Greek, "not be said (to be) after the order of Aaron," i. e., that, when spoken of in the Psalm 110. 4, "He is not said to be (as we should expect, if the Aaronic priesthood was perfect) after the order of Aaron." 12. For—The reason why Paul presses the words "after the order of Melchisedec" in Psalm 110. 4, viz., because these presuppose a change or transference of the priesthood, and this carries with it a change also of the law (which is inseparably bound up with the priesthood, both stand and fall together, v. 11). This is his answer to those who might object, What need was there of a new covenant? 13. Confirming the truth that a change is made of the law (v. 12), by another fact showing the distinctness of the new priesthood from the Aaronic. these things—(Psalm 110. 4)—pertaineth—Greek, "hath partaken of" (the perfect tense implies the continuance still of His manhood). another—"a different tribe" from that of Levi. 14. evident—lit., "manifest before the eyes" as a thing indisputable; a proof that whatever difficulties may now appear, then Jesus Christ's genealogy laboured under none. our Lord—the only place where this now common title occurs without "Jesus," or "Christ," except 2 Peter 3. 15. sprung—as a plant, and a branch. Judah—Genesis 49. 10; Luke 1. 27, 39 (Hebron of Judah, where LIGHTFOOT thinks Jesus was conceived); 2. 4, 5; Revelation 5. 5. of which tribe . . . priesthood—"in respect to which tribe Moses spake nothing concerning priests" (so the oldest MSS. read, nothing to imply that priests were to be taken from it). 15. Another proof that the law, or economy, is changed, viz., forasmuch as Christ is appointed Priest, "not according to the law of a carnal (i. e., a mere outward) commandment," but "according to the power of an indissoluble (so the Greek) life." The 110th Psalm appoints Him "for ever" (v. 17). The Levitical law required a definite carnal descent. In contrast stands "the power;" Christ's spiritual, inward, living power of overcoming death. Not agreeably to a statute is Christ appointed, but according to an inward living power. It—the change of the law or economy, the statement (v. 12, 18). far more—Greek, "more abundantly." for that—"seeing that," lit., "if;" so Romans 5. 10. after the similitude of Melchisedec—answering to "after the order of Melchisedec" (ch. 5. 10). The "order" cannot mean a series of priests, for Melchisedec neither received his priesthood from, nor transmitted it to, any other mere man; it must mean "answering to the office of Melchisedec." Christ's priesthood is similar to Melchisedec's in that it is "for ever" (v. 16, 17). another—rather as Greek, "a different." 16. carnal . . . endless—mutually contrasted. As "form" and "power" are opposed, 2 Timothy 3. 5; so here "the law" and "power," cf. Romans 8. 3, "The law was weak through the flesh;" and v. 18, "weakness." "The law" is here not the law in general, but the statute as to the priesthood. "Carnal," as being only outward and temporary, is contrasted with "endless," or, as Greek, "Indissoluble." Commandment is contrasted with "life." The law can give a commandment, but it cannot give life (v. 19). But our High Priest's inherent "power," now in heaven, has in Him "life for ever;" ch. 9. 14, "through the eternal Spirit;" ch. 7. 25, "able" . . . "ever liveth" (John 5. 26). It is in the power of His resurrection life, not of His earthly life, that Christ officiates as a Priest. 17. For—Proving His life to be "endless" or indissoluble (v. 16). The emphasis is on "for ever." The oldest MSS. read, "He is testified of, that Thou art," &c. 18. there is—Greek, "there takes place," according to Psalm 110. 4. disannulling—a repealing. of the commandment—ordaining the Levitical priesthood. And, as the Levitical priesthood and the law are inseparably joined, since the former is repealed, the latter is so also (Note, v. 11). going before—the legal ordinance introducing and giving place to the Christian, the antitypical and permanent end of the former. weakness and unprofitableness—The opposite of "power" (v. 16). 19. For, &c.—Justifying his calling the law weak and unprofitable (v. 18). The law could not bring men to true justification or sanctification before God, which is the "perfection" that we all need in order to be accepted of Him, and which we have in Christ. nothing—not merely "no one," but "nothing." The law brought nothing to its perfected end; everything in it was introductory to its antitype in the Christian economy, which realizes the perfection contemplated; cf. "unprofitableness," v. 18. Did—rather connect with v. 18, thus, "There takes place (by virtue of Psalm 110. 4) a repealing of the commandment (on the one hand), but (on the other) a bringing in afterwards (the Greek expresses that there is a bringing in of something over and above the law; a super-inducing, or accession of something new, viz., something better than the good things which the pre-existing law promised [WAHL] of a better hope," not one weak and unprofitable, but, as elsewhere the Christian dispensation is called, "everlasting," "true," "the second," "more excellent," "different," "living," "new," "to come," "perfect." Cf. ch. 8. 6, bringing us near to God, now in spirit, hereafter both in spirit and in body. we draw nigh unto God—the sure token of "perfection." Weakness is the opposite of this filial confidence of access. The access through the legal sacrifices was only symbolical and through the medium of a priest; that through Christ is immediate, perfect, and spiritual. 20. Another proof of the superiority of Christ's Melchisedec-like priesthood; the oath of God gave a solemn weight to it which was not in the law-priesthood, which was not so confirmed. he was made Priest—rather supply from v. 22, which completes the sentence begun in this verse, v. 21 being a parenthesis, "Inasmuch as not without an oath He was made surety of the testament (for, &c.), of so much better a testament hath Jesus been made the surety." 21. Translate in the Greek order, "For they indeed (the existing legal priests) without the (solemn) promise on oath (so the Greek [TITTMANN]) are made priests," by him—God, unto him—the Lord, the Son of God (Psalm 110. 1). not repent—never change His purpose. after the order of Melchisedec—Omitted in some oldest MSS., contained in others. 22. surety—ensuring in His own person the certainty of the covenant to us. This He did by becoming responsible for our guilt, by sealing the covenant with His blood, and by being openly acknowledged as our triumphant Saviour by the Father, who raised Him from the dead. Thus He is at once God's surety for man, and man's surety for God, and so Mediator between God and man (ch. 8. 6). better—Ch. 8. 6; 13. 20, "everlasting." testament—sometimes translated "covenant." The Greek term implies that it is appointed by God, and comprises the relations and bearings partly of a covenant, partly of a testament: (1.) the appointment made without the concurrence of a second party, of somewhat concerning that second party; a last will or testament, so in ch. 9. 16, 17; (2.) a mutual agreement in which both parties consent. 23. Another proof of superiority; the Levitical priests were many, as death caused the need of continually new ones being appointed in succession. Christ dies not, and so hath a priesthood which passes not from one to another. were—Greek, "are made." many—one after another; opposed to His "unchangeable" (that does not pass from one to another) priesthood" (v. 21). not suffered to continue—Greek, "hindered from permanently continuing," viz., in the priesthood. 24. he—emphatic; Greek, himself So in Psalm 110. 4, "Thou art a priest;" singular, not priests, "many." contineth—Greek, simple verb, not the compound as in v. 23. "Remaneth," viz., in life. unchangeable—Greek, "hath His priesthood unchangeable;" not passing from one to another, intransmissible

Therefore no earthly so-called apostolic succession of priests are His vicegerents. The Jewish priests had successors in office, because "they could not continue by reason of death." But this man, because He liveth ever, hath no successor in office, not even Peter (1 Peter 5. 1). 25. Wherefore—Greek, "Whence;" inasmuch as "He remaineth for ever," also—as a natural consequence flowing from the last, at the same time a new and higher thing. [ALFORD.] save—His very name JESUS (v. 22) meaning Saviour—to the uttermost—altogether, perfectly, so that nothing should be wanting afterwards for ever. [TITTMANN.] It means "in any wise," "utterly," in Luke 13. 11, come unto God—by faith, by him—through Him as their mediating Priest, instead of through the Levitical priests, seeing he ever liveth—resuming "He continueth ever," v. 21; therefore "He is able to the uttermost;" He is not, like the Levitical priest, prevented by death, for "He ever liveth" (v. 23), to make intercession—There was but the one offering on earth once for all. But the intercession for us in the heavens (v. 26) is ever continuing, whence the result follows, that we can never be separated from the love of God in Christ. He intercedes only for those who come unto God through Him, not for the unbelieving world (John 17. 9). As samples of His intercession, cf. the prophetic descriptions in the Old Testament, "By an humble omnipotency (for it was by His humiliation that He obtained all power), or omnipotent humility, appearing in the presence, and presenting His postulations at the throne of God. [BISHOP PEARSON.] He was not only the offering, but the priest who offered it. Therefore, He has become not only a sacrifice, but an intercessor; His intercession being founded on His voluntary offering of Himself without spot to God. We are not only then in virtue of His sacrifice forgiven, but in virtue of the intercession admitted to favour and grace. [ARCHBISHOP MAGEE.] 26. such—as is above described. The oldest MSS. read, "also," "For to us (as sinners; emphatical) there was also becoming (besides the other excellencies of our High Priest) such an High Priest." holy—pious (a distinct Greek word from that for holy, which latter implies consecration) towards God; perfectly answering God's will in reverent piety (Psalm 16. 10). harmless—lit., "free from evil" and guile, in relation to Himself. undefiled—not defiled by stain contracted from others, in relation to men. Temptation, to which He was exposed, left no trace of evil in Him. separate—rather, "separated from sinners," viz., in His heavenly state as our High Priest above, after He had been parted from the earth, as the Levitical high priest was separated from the people in the sanctuary (whence he was not to go out), Leviticus 21. 12. Though justifying through faith the ungodly, He hath no contact with them as such. He is lifted above our sinful community, being "made higher than the heavens," at the same time that He makes believers as such (not as sinners), "to sit together (with Him) in heavenly places" (Ephesians 2. 6). Just as Moses on the mount was separated from and above the people, and alone with God. This proves Jesus is God. "Though innumerable lies have been forged against the venerable Jesus, none dared to charge Him with any intemperance." [ORIGEN.] made—Jesus was higher before (John 17. 5), and as the God-MAN was made so by the Father after His humiliation (cf. ch. 1. 4). higher than the heavens—for "He passed through (so the Greek) the heavens" (ch. 4. 14). 27. daily—"day by day." The priests daily offered sacrifices (ch. 9. 6; 10. 11; Exodus 29. 38-42). The high priests took part in these daily-offered sacrifices only on festival days; but as they represented the whole priesthood, the daily offerings are here attributed to them; their exclusive function was to offer the atonement "once every year" (ch. 9. 7), and "year by year continually" (ch. 10. 1). The "daily" strictly belongs to Christ, not to the high priests, "who needeth not daily, as those high priests (year by year, and their subordinate priests daily), to offer," &c. offer up—The Greek term is peculiarly used of sacrifices for sin. The high priest's double offering on the day of atonement, the bullock for himself, and the goat for the people's sins, had its counterpart in the two lambs offered daily by the ordinary priests. this he did—not "died first for His own sins and then the people's," but for the people's only. The negation is twofold: He needeth not to offer (1) daily; nor (2) to offer for His own sins also; for He offered Himself a spotless sacrifice (v. 26; ch. 4. 15). The sinless alone could offer for the sinful. once—rather as Greek, "once for all." The sufficiency of the one sacrifice to atone for all sins for ever, resulted from its absolute spotlessness. 28. For—Reason for the difference stated in v. 27, between His one sacrifice and their oft-repeated sacrifices, viz., because of His entire freedom from the sinful infirmity to which they are subject. He needed not, as they, to offer for His own sin; and being now exempt from death and "perfected for evermore," He needs not to REPEAT His sacrifice, the word—"the word" confirmed by "the oath." which—which oath was after the law, viz., in Psalm 110. 4, abrogating the preceding law-priesthood. The son—contrasted with "men," consecrated—Greek, "made perfect" once for all, as in ch. 2. 10; 5. 9, Notes. Opposed to "having infirmity." Consecrated as a perfected priest by His perfected sacrifice, and consequent anointing and exaltation to the right hand of the Father.

CHAPTER VIII.

Ver. 1-13. CHRIST, THE HIGH PRIEST IN THE TRUE SANCTUARY, SUPERSEDING THE LEVITICAL PRIESTHOOD; THE NEW RENDERS OBSOLETE THE OLD COVENANT. 1. the sum—rather, "the principal point;" for the participle is present, not past, which would be required if the meaning were "the sum." "The chief point in (or, 'in the case;') so the Greek, ch. 9. 10, 15, 17) the things which we are speaking," lit., "which are being spoken." such—so transcendently pre-eminent, viz., in this respect, that "He is set on the right hand of;" &c. Infinitely above all other priests in this one grand respect, He exercises His priesthood in HEAVEN, not in the earthly "holiest place" (ch. 10. 12). The Levitical high priests, even when they entered the Holiest place once a year, only stood for a brief space before the symbol of God's throne; but Jesus sits on the throne of the Divine Majesty in the heaven itself, and this for ever (ch. 10. 11, 12). 2. minister—The Greek term implies priestly ministry in the temple. the sanctuary—Greek, "the holy places;" the Holy of holies. Here the heavenly sanctuary is meant. the true—the archetypal and antitypical, as contrasted with the typical and symbolical (ch. 9. 21). Greek alethinos (used here) is opposed to that which does not fulfil its idea, as for instance, a type; alethes, to that which is untrue and unreal, as a lie. The measure of alethes is reality; that of alethinos, ideality. In alethes the idea corresponds to the thing; in alethinos, the thing to the idea. [KALMIS in ALFORD.] tabernacle—(Ch. 9. 11.) His body. Through His glorified body as the tabernacle, Christ passes into the heavenly "Holy of holies," the immediate immaterial presence of God, where He intercedes for us. This tabernacle in which God dwells, is where God in Christ meets us who are "members of His body, of His flesh, and of His bones." This tabernacle answers to the heavenly Jerusalem, where God's visible presence is to be manifested to His perfected saints and angels, who are united in Christ the Head; in contradistinction to His personal invisible presence in the Holy of holies unapproachable save to Christ. John 1. 14, "Word . . . dwelt among us," Greek, "tabernacled." pitched—Greek, "fixed" firmly. not man—as Moses (v. 5). 3. For—Assigning his reason for calling him "minister of the sanctuary" (v. 2). somewhat—He does not offer again His once for all completed sacrifice. But as the high priest did not enter the Holy place without blood, so Christ has entered the heavenly Holy place with His own blood. That "blood of sprinkling" is in heaven. And is thence made effectual to sprinkle believers as the end of their election (1 Peter 1. 2). The term "consecrate" as a priest, is lit., to fill the hand, implying that an offering is given into the hands of the priest, which it is his duty to present to God. If a man be a priest, he must have some gift in his hands to offer. Therefore, Christ, as a priest, has His blood as His oblation to offer before God

4. Implying that Christ's priestly office is exercised in heaven, not in earth; in the power of His resurrection life, not of His earthly life. For—The oldest MSS. read, "accordingly then." If, &c.—"if He were on earth, He could not even (so the Greek) be a priest" (cf. ch. 7. 13, 14); therefore, certainly, could not exercise the high priestly function in the earthly Holy of holies. seeing that, &c.—"since there are" already, and exist now (the temple service not yet being set aside, as it was on the destruction of Jerusalem, "those (the oldest MSS. omit 'priests') who offer the (appointed) gifts according to (the) law." Therefore, His sacerdotal "ministry" must be "in the heavens," not on earth (v. 1). "If His priesthood terminated on the earth, He would not even be a priest at all." [BENGEL.] I conceive that the denial here of Christ's priesthood on earth, does not extend to the sacrifice on the cross which He offered as a priest on earth; but applies only to the crowning work of His priesthood, the bringing of the blood into the Holy of holies, which He could not have done in the earthly Holy of holies, as not being an Aaronic priest. The place (the heavenly Holy of holies) was as essential to the atonement being made as the oblation (the blood). The body was burnt without the gate; but the sanctification was effected by the presentation of the blood within the sanctuary by the high priest. If on earth, He would not be a priest in the sense of the law of Moses ("according to the law" is emphatic). 5. Who—viz., the priests. serve unto the example—not "after the example," as BENGEL explains. But as in ch. 13. 10, "serve the tabernacle," i. e., do it service: so "serve (the tabernacle which is but) the outline and shadow." The Greek for "example" is here taken for the sketch, copy, or suggestive representation of the heavenly sanctuary, which is the antitypical reality and primary archetype. "The mount" answers to heaven, ch. 12. 22. admonished—The Greek especially applies to Divine responses and commands. to make—perfectly: so the Greek. See—Take heed; accurately observing the pattern, that so thou mayest make, &c. saith he—God, the pattern—an accurate representation, presented in vision to Moses, of the heavenly real sanctuary. Thus the earthly tabernacle was copy of a copy; but the latter accurately representing the grand archetypal original in heaven (Exodus 25, 40). 6. now—not time; but "as it is." more excellent ministry—than any earthly ministry. by how much—in proportion as. Mediator—Coming between us and God, to carry into effect God's covenant with us. "The messenger (angel) of the covenant," which—Greek, "one which" [ALFORD]: inasmuch as being one which, &c. established—Greek, "enacted as a law." So Romans 3. 27, "law of faith;" and 8. 2; 9. 31, apply "law" to the Gospel covenant. It is implied hereby, the Gospel is founded on the law, in the spirit and essence of the latter. upon—resting upon. better promises—enumerated v. 10, 11. The Old Testament promises were mainly of earthly, the New Testament promises, of heavenly blessings; the exact fulfilment of the earthly promises was a pledge of the fulfilment of the heavenly. "Like a physician who prescribes a certain diet to a patient, and then when the patient is beginning to recover, changes the diet, permitting what he had before forbidden; or as a teacher gives his pupil an elementary lesson at first, preparatory to leading him to a higher stage;" so RABBI ALBO in his Ikkarim. Cf. Jeremiah 7. 21, 22, which shows that God's original design in the old covenant ritual system was, that it should be pedagogical, as a schoolmaster leading and preparing men for Christ. 7. Same reasoning as in ch. 7. 11. faultless—perfect in all its parts, so as not to be found fault with as wanting anything which ought to be there: answering all the purposes of a law. The law in its morality was blameless, Greek amomos; but in saving us it was defective, and so not faultless, Greek amemptos. should no place have been sought—as it has to be now; and as it is sought in the prophecy (v. 8-11). The old covenant would have anticipated all man's wants, so as to give no occasion for seeking something more perfectly adequate. Cf. on the phrase "place . . . sought," ch. 12. 17. 8. finding fault with them—the people of the old covenant, who were not made "faultless" by it (v. 7); and whose disregard of God's covenant made Him to 'regard them not' (v. 9). The law is not in itself blamed, but the people who had not observed it. he saith—(Jeremiah 31. 31-34; cf. Ezekiel 11. 19; 36. 25-27.) At Rama, the headquarters of Nebuzaradan, whither the captives of Jerusalem had been led, Jeremiah uttered this prophecy of Israel's restoration under another David, whereby Rachel, walling for her lost children, shall be comforted; literally in part fulfilled at the restoration under Zerubbabel, and more fully to be hereafter at Israel's return to their own land; spiritually fulfilled in the Gospel covenant, whereby God forgives absolutely His people's sins, and writes His law by His Spirit on the hearts of believers, the true Israel. "This prophecy forms the third part of the third trilogy of the three great trilogies into which Jeremiah's prophecies may be divided: Jeremiah 21-25, against the shepherds of the people; 26-29, against the false prophets; 30, and 31., the book of restoration." [DELITZSCH in ALFORD.] Behold, the days come—The frequent formula introducing a Messianic prophecy. make—Greek, "perfect;" "consummate." A suitable expression as to the new covenant, which perfected what the old could not (cf. end of v. 9, with end of v. 10). Israel . . . Judah—therefore, the ten tribes, as well as Judah, share in the new covenant. As both shared the exile, so both shall share the literal and spiritual restoration. 9. Not according to—very different from, and far superior to, the old covenant, which only "worked wrath" (Romans 4. 15) through man's "not regarding" it. The new covenant enables us to obey by the Spirit's inward impulse producing love because of the forgiveness of our sins. made with—rather as Greek, "to:" the Israelites being only recipients, not co-agents [ALFORD] with God. I took them by the hand—as a father takes his child by the hand to support and guide his steps. "There are three periods: (1.) that of the promise; (2.) that of the pedagogical instruction; (3.) that of fulfilment." [BENGEL.] The second, that of the pedagogical pupilage, began at the exodus from Egypt. I regarded them not—English Version, Jeremiah 31. 32, translates, "Although I was an husband unto them." St. Paul's translation here is supported by LXX., Syriac, and GSENIUS, and accords with the kindred Arabic, The Hebrews regarded not God, so God, in righteous retribution, regarded them not. On "continued not in my covenant," SCHELLING observes: The law was in fact the mere ideal of a religious constitution: in practice, the Jews were throughout, before the captivity, more or less polytheists, except in the time of David, and the first years of Solomon (the type of Messiah's reign.) Even after the return from Babylon, to idolatry, there succeeded what was not much better, formalism and hypocrisy (Matthew 12. 43). The law was (1.) a typical picture, tracing out the features of the glorious Gospel to be revealed; (2.) it had a delegated virtue from the Gospel, which ceased, therefore, when the Gospel came. 10. make with—Greek, "make unto." Israel—Comprising the before disunited (v. 8) ten tribes kingdom, and that of Judah. They are united in the spiritual Israel, the elect Church, now: they shall be so in the literal restored kingdom of Israel to come. I will put—it, "(I) giving." This is the first of the "better promises" (v. 6). mind—their intelligent faculty. In—rather, "on their hearts." Not on tables of stone as the law (2 Corinthians 3. 3). write—Greek, "inscribe." I will be to them a God, &c.—Fulfilled first in the outward kingdom of God. Next, in the inward Gospel kingdom. Thirdly, in the kingdom at once outward and inward, the spiritual being manifested outwardly (Revelation 2. 3). Cf. a similar progression as to the priesthood (1.) Exodus 19. 6; (2.) 1 Peter 2. 5; (3.) Isaiah 61. 6; Revelation 1. 6. This progressive advance of the significance of the Old Testament institutions, &c., says TROTUCK, shows the transparency and prophetic character which runs throughout the whole. 11. Second of the "better promises" (v. 6). they shall not—"they shall not have to teach." [ALFORD.] his neighbour—So Vulgate reads; but the oldest MSS. have "his (fellow) citizen." brother—a closer and more endearing relation than fellow-citizen. from the least to the greatest—Greek, “from the little one to the great one.” Zechariah 12. 8, “He that is feeble among them shall be as David.” Under the old covenant, the priest’s lips were to keep knowledge, and at his mouth the people were to seek the law: under the new covenant, the Holy Spirit teaches every believer. Not that the mutual teaching of brethren is excluded whilst the covenant is being promulgated; but when once the Holy Spirit shall have fully taught all the remission of their sins and inward sanctification, then there shall be no further need of man teaching his fellow-man. Cf. 1 Thessalonians 4. 9; 5. 1, an earnest of that perfect state to come. On the way to that perfect state every man should teach his neighbour. “The teaching is not hard and forced, because grace renders all teachable; for it is not the ministry of the letter, but of the spirit (2 Corinthians 3. 6). The believer’s firmness does not depend on the authority of human teachers. God Himself teaches.” [BENGEL.] The New Testament is shorter than the Old Testament, because, instead of the details of an outward letter law, it gives the all-embracing principles of the spiritual law written on the conscience, leading one to spontaneous instinctive obedience in outward details. None save the Lord can teach effectually, “know the Lord.” 12. For, &c.—The third of “the better promises” (v. 6). The forgiveness of sins is, and will be, the root of this new state of inward grace and knowledge of the Lord. Sin being abolished, sinners obtain grace. I will be merciful—Greek, “propitious;” the Hebrew “salach” is always used of God only in relation to men. and their iniquities—Not found in Vulgate, Syriac, Coptic, and one oldest Greek MS.; but most oldest MSS. have the words (cf. ch. 10. 17). remember no more—Contrast the law, ch. 10. 3. 13. he—God. made . . . old—“hath (at the time of speaking the prophecy) antiquated the first covenant.” From the time of God’s mention of a new covenant (since God’s words are all realities) the first covenant might be regarded as ever dwindling away, until its complete abolition on the actual introduction of the Gospel. Both covenants cannot exist side by side. Mark how verbal inspiration is proved in Paul’s argument turning wholly on the one word “NEW” (covenant), occurring but once in the Old Testament. that which decayeth—Greek, “that which is being antiquated,” viz., at the time when Jeremiah spake. For in Paul’s time, according to his view, the new had absolutely set aside the old covenant. The Greek for (Kaine) New Testament) implies that it is of a different kind and supersedes the old: not merely recent (Greek, nea). Cf. Hosea 3. 4, 5.

CHAPTER IX.

Ver. 1-23. INFERIORITY OF THE OLD TO THE NEW COVENANT IN THE MEANS OF ACCESS TO GOD: THE BLOOD OF BULLS AND GOATS OF NO REAL AVAIL: THE BLOOD OF CHRIST ALL-SUFFICIENT TO PURGE AWAY SIN, WHENCE FLOWS OUR HOPE OF HIS APPEARING AGAIN FOR OUR PERFECT SALVATION. 1. Then verily—Greek, “accordingly then.” Resuming the subject from ch. 8. 5. In accordance with the command given to Moses, “the first covenant had,” &c. had—not “has,” for as a covenant it no longer existed, though its rites were observed till the destruction of Jerusalem. ordinances—of Divine right and institution. service—worship. a worldly sanctuary—Greek, “its (lit., the) sanctuary worldly,” mundane: consisting of the elements of the visible world. Contrasted with the heavenly sanctuary. Cf. v. 11, 12, “not of this building,” v. 24. Material, outward, perishing (however precious its materials were), and also defective religiously. In v. 2-5, “the worldly sanctuary” is discussed; in v. 6, &c., the “ordinances of worship.” The outer tabernacle the Jews believed, signified this world; the Holy of holies, heaven. JOSEPHUS calls the outer, divided into two parts, “a secular and common place,” answering to “the earth and sea;” and the inner holiest place, the third part, appropriated to God and not accessible to men. 2. Defining the worldly tabernacle. a tabernacle—the tabernacle.” made—built and furnished. the first—the anterior tabernacle. candlestick . . . table—Typifying light and life (Exodus 25. 31-39). The candlestick consisted of a shaft and six branches of gold, seven in all, the bowls made like almonds, with a knop and a flower in one branch. It was carried in Vespasian’s triumph, and the figure is to be seen on Titus’ arch at Rome. The table of shittim wood, covered with gold, was for the shew-bread (Exodus 25. 23-30). shew-bread—lit., “the setting forth of the loaves,” i. e., the loaves set forth: “the show of the bread.” [ALFORD.] In the outer holy place: so the Eucharist continues until our entrance into the heavenly Holy of holies (1 Corinthians 11. 26). which, &c.—“which (tabernacle) is called the holy place,” as distinguished from “the Holy of holies.” 3. And—Greek, “But.” after—behind: within. second veil—There were two veils or curtains, one before the Holy of holies (catapetasma), here alluded to, the other before the tabernacle door (calumna), called—as opposed to “the true,” 4. golden censer—The Greek must not be translated “altar of incense,” for it was not in “the holiest” place “after the second veil,” but in “the holy place;” but as in 2 Chronicles 26. 19, and Ezekiel 8. 11, “censer;” so Vulgate and Syriac. This golden censer was only used on the day of atonement (other kinds of censers on other days), and is therefore associated with the holiest place, as being taken into it on that anniversary by the high priest. The expression “which had,” does not mean that the golden censer was deposited there, for in that case the high priest would have had to go in and bring it out before burning incense in it; but that the golden censer was one of the articles belonging to, and used for, the yearly service in the holiest place. He virtually supposes (without specifying) the existence of the “altar of incense” in the anterior holy place, by mentioning the golden censer filled with incense from it: the incense answers to the prayers of the saints; and the altar though outside the holiest place, is connected with it (standing close by the second veil, directly before the ark of the covenant), even as we find an antitypical altar in heaven. The rending of the veil by Christ has brought the antitypes to the altar, candlestick, and shew-bread of the anterior holy place into the holiest place, heaven. In 1 Kings 6. 22, Hebrew, the altar is said to belong to the oracle, or holiest place (cf. Exodus 30. 6). ark—of shittim wood, i. e., acacia. Not in the second temple, but in its stead was a stone basement (called “the stone of foundation”), three fingers high. pot—“golden,” added in the LXX., and sanctioned by Paul. manna—An omer, each man’s daily portion. In 1 Kings 8. 9; 2 Chronicles 5. 10, it is said there was nothing in the ark of Solomon’s temple save the two stone tables of the law put in by Moses. But the expression that there was nothing then therein save the two tables, leaves the inference to be drawn that formerly there were the other things mentioned by the Rabbis and by Paul here, the pot of manna (the memorial of God’s providential care of Israel) and the rod of Aaron (the memorial of the lawful priesthood, Numbers 17. 3, 5, 7, 10). The expressions “before the Lord,” Exodus 16. 32, and “before the testimony,” Numbers 17. 10, thus mean, “in the ark.” “In,” however, may be used here (as the corresponding Hebrew word) as to things attached to the ark as appendages, as the book of the law was put “in the side of the ark,” and so the golden jewels offered by the Philistines (1 Samuel 6. 8). tables of the covenant—(Deuteronomy 9. 9; 10. 2.) 5. over it—over “the ark of the covenant.” cherubin—representing the ruling powers by which God acts in the moral and natural world. See my Note, Ezekiel 1. 6; 10. 1. Hence sometimes they answer to the ministering angels; but mostly to the elect redeemed, by whom God shall hereafter rule the world and set forth His manifold wisdom: redeemed humanity, combining in, and with itself, the highest forms of subordinate creaturely life; not angels. They stand on the mercy-seat, and on that ground become the habitation of God, from which His glory is to shine upon the world. They expressly say, Revelation 5. 8-10, “Thou hast redeemed us.” They are there distinguished from the angels, and associated with the elders. They were of one piece with the mercy-seat, even as the Church is one with Christ: their sole standing is on the blood-sprinkled mercy-seat; they gaze down at it as the redeemed shall for ever; they are "the habitation of God through the Spirit," of glory—The cherubim were bearers of the Divine glory, whence, perhaps, they derive their name. The Shekinah, or cloud of glory, in which Jehovah appeared between the cherubim over the mercy-seat, the lid of the ark, is doubtless the reference. THOLUCK thinks the twelve loaves of the shew-bread represent the twelve tribes of the nation, presented as a community before God consecrated to Him [just as in the Lord's Supper believers, the spiritual Israel, all partaking of the one bread, and becoming one bread and one body, present themselves before the Lord as consecrated to Him, 1 Corinthians 10. 16, 17]; the oil and light, the pure knowledge of the Lord, in which the covenant people are to shine [the seven (lights), implying perfection]; the ark of the covenant, the symbol of God's kingdom in the old covenant, and representing God dwelling among His own; the ten commandments in the ark, the law as the basis of union between God and man; the mercy-seat covering the law and sprinkled with the blood of atonement for the collective sin of the people, God's mercy [in Christ] stronger than the law; the cherubim, the personified [redeemed] creation, looking down on the mercy-seat, where God's mercy, and God's law, are set forth as the basis of creation, mercy-seat—Greek, "the propitiatory;" the golden cover of the ark, on which was sprinkled the blood of the propitiatory sacrifice on the day of atonement; the footstool of Jehovah; the meeting-place of Him and His people. we cannot—conveniently: besides what met the eye in the sanctuary, there were spiritual realities symbolized which it would take too long to discuss in detail, our chief subject at present being the priesthood and the sacrifices. "Which" refers not merely to the cherubim, but to all the contents of the sanctuary enumerated, v. 2-5. 6. The use made of the sanctuary so furnished by the high priest on the anniversary of atonement, ordained—arranged, always—twice at the least every day, for the morning and evening care of the lamps, and offering of incense (Exodus 30. 7, 8). went—Greek, "enter:" present tense. 7. once every year—The tenth day of the seventh month. He entered within the veil on that day twice at least. Thus "once" means here on the one occasion only. The two, or possibly more, entrances on that one day were regarded as parts of the one whole. not without blood—(Ch. 8. 3.) offered—Greek, "offers," errors—Greek, "ignorances:" "inadvertent errors." They might have known, as the law was clearly promulgated, and they were bound to study it; so that their ignorance was culpable (cf. Acts 3. 17; Ephesians 4. 13; 1 Peter 1. 14). Though one's ignorance may mitigate one's punishment (Luke 12. 48), it does not wholly exempt from punishment. 8. The Holy Ghost—Moses himself did not comprehend the typical meaning (1 Peter 1. 11, 12). signifying—by the typical exclusion of all from the holiest, save the high priest once a year. the holiest of all—heaven, the antitype. the first tabernacle—the anterior tabernacle, representative of the whole Levitical system. While it (the first tabernacle, and that which represents the Levitical system) as yet "has a standing" (so the Greek, i. e., has continuance: lasts, the way to heaven (the antitypical "holiest place") is not yet made manifest (cf. ch. 10. 19, 20). The Old Testament economy is represented by the holy place, the New Testament economy by the Holy of holies. Redemption, by Christ, has opened the Holy of holies (access to heaven by faith now, ch. 4. 16; 7. 19, 25; 10. 19, 22; by sight hereafter, Isaiah 33. 24; Revelation 11. 19; 21. 2, 3) to all mankind. The Greek for "not yet" (me po) refers to the mind of the Spirit: the Spirit intimating that men should not think the way was yet opened. [TITTMANN.] The Greek negative, ou po, would deny the fact objectively; me po, denies the thing subjectively. 9. Which—"The which," viz., anterior tabernacle: "as being that which was," &c. [ALFORD.] figure—Greek, "parabolic:" a parabolic setting forth of the character of the Old Testament, for—"in reference to the existing time." The time of the temple worship really belonged to the Old Testament, but continued still in Paul's time and that of his Hebrew readers. "The time of reformation" (v. 10) stands in contrast to this, "the existing time;" though, in reality, "the time of reformation," the New Testament time, was now present and existing. So "the age to come," is the phrase applied to the Gospel, because it was present only to believers, and its fullness even to them is still to come. Cf. v. 11, "good things to come," in which—tabernacle, not time, according to the reading of the oldest MSS. Or translate, "According to which" parabolic representation, or figure, were—Greek, "are." gifts—unbloody oblations, could not—Greek, "cannot:" are not able, him that did the service—any worshipper. The Greek is latreuein, serve God, which is all men's duty; not leitourgein, to serve in a ministerial office. make perfect—perfectly remove the sense of guilt, and sanctify inwardly through love, as pertaining to the conscience—"in respect to the (moral-religious) consciousness." They can only reach as far as the outward flesh (cf. "carnal ordinances," v. 10, 13, 14). 10. Which—sacrifices, stood—consisted in [ALFORD]; or, have attached to them only things which appertain to the use of foods, &c. The rites of meats, &c., go side by side with the sacrifices (THOLUCK and WAHL), cf. Colossians 2. 16, drinks—(Leviticus 10. 9; 11. 4.) Usage subsequently to the law added many observances as to meats and drinks. washings—(Exodus 29. 4.) and carnal ordinances—One oldest MS., Syriac and Coptic, omit "and." "Carnal ordinances" stand in apposition to "sacrifices" (v. 9). Carnal (outward, affecting only the flesh) is opposed to spiritual. Contrast "flesh" with "conscience" (v. 13, 14). imposed—as a burden (Acts 15. 10, 23) continually pressing heavy. until the time of reformation—Greek, "the season of rectification," when the reality should supersede the type (ch. 8. 8-12). Cf. "better;" v. 23. 11. But—in contrast to "could not make . . . perfect" (v. 9). Christ—The Messiah, of whom all the prophets foretold; not "Jesus" here. From whom the "reformation" (v. 10), or rectification, emanates, which frees from the yoke of carnal ordinances, and which is being realized gradually now, and shall be perfectly in the consummation of "the age (world) to come." "Christ . . . High Priest," exactly answers to Leviticus 4. 5, "the priest that is anointed," an—rather, "having come forward (cf. ch. 10. 7, a different Greek word, picturesquely presenting Him before us) as High Priest." The Levitical priests must therefore retire. Just as on the day of atonement, no work was done, no sacrifice was offered, or priest was allowed to be in the tabernacle while the high priest went into the holiest place to make atonement (Leviticus 16. 17, 29). So not our righteousness, nor any other priest's sacrifice, but Christ alone atones; and as the high priest before offering incense had on common garments of a priest, but after it wore his holy garments of "glory and beauty" (Exodus 23.) in entering the holiest, so Christ entered the heavenly holiest in His glorified body. good things to come—Greek, "the good things to come," ch. 10. 1; "better promises," ch. 8. 6; the "eternal inheritance," v. 15; 1 Peter 1. 4; the "things hoped for," ch. 11. 1. by a tabernacle—Joined with "He entered." Translate, "Through the . . . tabernacle" (of which we know). [ALFORD.] As the Jewish high priest passed through the anterior tabernacle into the holiest place, so Christ passed through heaven into the inner abode of the unseen and unapproachable God. Thus, "the tabernacle" here is the heavens through which He passed (Note, ch. 4. 14). But "the tabernacle" is also the glorified body of Christ (Note, ch. 8. 2), "not of this building" (not of the mere natural "creation, but of the spiritual and heavenly, the new creation"), the Head of the mystical body, the Church. Through this glorified body He passes into the heavenly holiest place (v. 24), the immaterial, unapproachable presence of God, where He intercedes for us. His glorified body, as the meeting-place of God and all Christ's redeemed, and the angels, answers to the heavens through which He passed, and passes. His body is opposed to the tabernacle, as His blood to the blood of goats, &c. greater

—as contrasted with the small dimensions of the earthly anterior tabernacle. more perfect—Effective in giving pardon, peace, sanctification, and access to closest communion with God (cf. v. 9; ch. 10. 1). not made with hands—but by the Lord Himself (ch. 8. 2). 12. Neither—“Nor yet.” by—“through;” as the means of His approach. goats . . . calves—Not a bullock, such as the Levitical high priest offered for himself, and a goat for the people, on the day of atonement (Leviticus 16. 6, 15), year by year, whence the plural is used, goats . . . calves. Besides the goat offered for the people the blood of which was sprinkled before the mercy-seat, the high priest led forth a second goat, viz., the scapegoat; over it he confessed the people's sins, putting them on the head of the goat, and sent as the sin-bearer into the wilderness out of sight, implying that the atonement effected by the goat sin offering (of which the ceremony of the scapegoat is a part, and not distinct from the sin offering) consisted in the transfer of the people's sins on the goat, and their consequent removal out of sight. The translation of sins on the victim usual in other expiatory sacrifices being omitted in the case of the slain goat, but employed in the case of the goat sent away, proved the two goats were regarded as one offering. [ARCHBISHOP MAGEE.] Christ's death is symbolized by the slain goat; His resurrection to life by the living goat sent away. Modern Jews substitute in some places a cock for the goat as an expiation, the sins of the offerers being transferred to the entrails, and exposed on the house-top for the birds to carry out of sight, as the scapegoat did; the Hebrew for man and cock being similar, Gebher. [BUXTORF.] by—“through,” as the means of His entrance; the key unlocking the heavenly Holy of holies to Him. The Greek is forcible, “through the blood of His own” (cf. v. 23). once—“once for all.” having obtained—having thereby obtained; lit., “found for Himself,” as a thing of insuperable difficulty to all save Divine Omnipotence, self-devoting zeal, and love, to find. The access of Christ to the Father was arduous (ch. 5. 7). None before had trodden the path. eternal—The entrance of our Redeemer, once for all, into the heavenly holiest place, secures eternal redemption to us; whereas the Jewish high priest's entrance was repeated year by year, and the effect temporary and partial. “On redemption,” cf. Matthew 20. 28; Ephesians 1. 7; Colossians 1. 14; 1 Timothy 2. 5; Titus 2. 14; 1 Peter 1. 19.

13-28. PROOF, AND ENLARGEMENT ON, THE “ETERNAL REDEMPTION” MENTIONED, v. 12. For His blood, offered by Himself, purifies not only outwardly, as the Levitical sacrifices on the day of atonement, but inwardly unto the service of the living God (v. 13, 14). His death is the inaugurating act of the new covenant, and of the heavenly sanctuary (v. 15-23). His entrance into the true Holy of holies is the consummation of His once for all offered sacrifice of atonement (v. 24, 26); henceforth, His reappearance alone remains to complete our redemption (v. 27, 28). 13. if—as we know is the case; so the Greek indicative means. Argument from the less to the greater. If the blood of mere brutes could purify in any, however small a degree, how much more shall inward purification, and complete and eternal salvation, be wrought by the blood of Christ, in whom dwelt all the fulness of the Godhead? ashes of an heifer—(Numbers 19. 16-18.) The type is full of comfort for us. The water of separation, made of the ashes of the red heifer, was the provision for removing ceremonial defilement whenever incurred by contact with the dead. As she was slain without the camp, so Christ (cf. ch. 13. 11; Numbers 19. 3, 4). The ashes were laid by for constant use; so the continually cleansing effects of Christ's blood, once for all shed. In our wilderness journey we are continually contracting defilement by contact with the spiritually dead, and with dead works, and need therefore continual application to the antitypical life-giving cleansing blood of Christ, whereby we are afresh restored to peace and living communion with God in the heavenly holy place. the unclean—Greek, “those defiled” on any particular occasion. purifying—Greek, “purity.” the flesh—their effect in themselves extended no further. The law had a carnal and a spiritual aspect; carnal, as an instrument of the Hebrew polity, God, their King, accepting, in minor offences, expiatory victims instead of the sinner, otherwise doomed to death; spiritual, as the shadow of good things to come (ch. 10. 1). The spiritual Israelite derived, in partaking of these legal rights, spiritual blessings not flowing from them, but from the great antitype. Ceremonial sacrifices released from temporal penalties and ceremonial disqualifications; Christ's sacrifice releases from everlasting penalties (v. 12), and moral impurities on the conscience disqualifying from access to God (v. 14). The purification of the flesh (the mere outward man) was by “sprinkling;” the washing followed by inseparable connection (Numbers 19. 19). So justification is followed by renewing. 14. offered himself—The voluntary nature of the offering gives it especial efficacy. He “through the eternal Spirit,” i. e., His Divine Spirit (Romans 1. 4, in contrast to His “flesh,” v. 3; His Godhead, 1 Timothy 3. 16; 1 Peter 3. 18), “His inner personality” [ALFORD], which gave a free consent to the act, offered Himself. The animals offered had no spirit or will to consent in the act of sacrifice; they were offered according to the law; they had a life neither enduring, nor of any intrinsic efficacy. But He from eternity, with His Divine and everlasting Spirit, concurred with the Father's will of redemption by Him. His offering began on the altar of the cross, and was completed in His entering the holiest place with His blood. The eternity and infinitude of His Divine Spirit (cf. ch. 7. 16) gives eternal (“eternal redemption,” v. 12, also cf. v. 15) and infinite merit to His offering, so that not even the infinite justice of God has any exception to take against it. It was “through His most burning love, flowing from His eternal Spirit,” that He offered Himself. [ECCLAMPADIUS.] without spot—the animal victims had to be without outward blemish; Christ on the cross was a victim inwardly and essentially stainless (1 Peter 1. 19). purge—purify from fear, guilt, alienation from God, and selfishness, the source of dead works (v. 22, 23). your—The oldest MSS. read “our.” Vulgate, however, supports English Version reading. conscience—moral religious consciousness. dead works—all works done in the natural state, which is a state of sin, are dead; for they come not from living faith in, and love to “the living God” (ch. 11. 6). As contact with a dead body defiled ceremonially (cf. the allusion, “ashes of an heifer,” v. 13), so dead works defile the inner consciousness spiritually. to—so as to serve. The ceremonially unclean could not serve God in the outward communion of His people; so the unrevived cannot serve God in spiritual communion. Man's works before justification, however lifelike they look, are dead, and cannot therefore be accepted before the living God. To have offered a dead animal to God would have been an insult (cf. Malachi 1. 8), much more for a man not justified by Christ's blood to offer dead works. But those purified by Christ's blood in living faith do serve (Romans 12. 1), and shall more fully serve God (Revelation 22. 3). living God—therefore requiring living spiritual service (John 4. 21). 15. for this cause—Because of the all-cleansing power of His blood, this fits Him to be Mediator (ch. 8. 6, ensuring to both parties, God and us, the ratification) of the new covenant, which secures both forgiveness for the sins not covered by the former imperfect covenant or testament, and also an eternal inheritance to the called. by means of death—rather, as Greek, “death having taken place.” At the moment that His death took place, the necessary effect is, “the called receive the (fulfilment of the) promise” (so Luke 24. 49 uses “promise;” ch. 6. 15; Acts 1. 4); that moment divides the Old from the New Testament. The “called” are the elect “heirs,” “partakers of the heavenly calling” (ch. 3. 1). redemption of . . . transgressions . . . under . . . first testament—the transgressions of all men from Adam to Christ, first against the primitive revelation, then against the revelations to the patriarchs, then against the law given to Israel, the representative people of the world. The “first testament” thus includes the whole period from Adam to Christ, and not merely that of the covenant with Israel, which was a concentrated representation of the covenant made with (or the first testament given to) mankind by sacrifice, down from the fall to redemption. Before the inheritance by the New Testament (for here the idea of the "INHERITANCE," following as the result of Christ's "death," being introduced, requires the Greek to be translated testament, as it was before covenant) could come in, there must be redemption (i. e., deliverance from the penalties incurred by) the transgressions committed under the first testament, for the propitiatory sacrifices under the first testament reached only as far as removing outward ceremonial defilement. But in order to obtain the inheritance which is a reality, there must be a real propitiation, since God could not enter into covenant-relation with us so long as past sins were unexpiated; Romans 3, 24, 25, "a propitiation . . . His righteousness for the remission of sins that are past," the promise—to Abraham, might—Greek, "may receive," which previously they could not (ch. 11, 39, 40). 16. A general axiomatic truth; It is "a testament;" not the testament. The testator must die before his testament takes effect (v. 17). This is a common meaning of the Greek noun diathece. So in Luke 22, 29, "I appoint (by testamentary disposition; the cognate Greek verb diatithemai) unto you a kingdom, as my Father hath appointed unto me." The need of death before the testamentary appointment takes effect, holds good in Christ's relation as MAN to us; of course not in God's relation to Christ. be—lit., "be borne;" "be involved in the case;" be inferred; or else, "be brought forward in court," so as to give effect to the will. This sense (testament) of the Greek diathece here does not exclude its other secondary senses in the other passages of the New Testament: (1.) a covenant between two parties; (2.) an arrangement, or disposition, made by God alone in relation to us. Thus, Matthew 26, 28 may be translated, "Blood of the covenant;" for a testament does not require blood shedding. Cf. Exodus 24, 8 (covenant), which Christ quotes, though it is probable He included in sense "testament;" also under the Greek word diathece (comprehending both meanings, "covenant" and "testament"), as this designation strictly and properly applies to the new dispensation, and is rightly applicable to the old also, not in itself, but when viewed as typifying the new, which is properly a testament. Moses (Exodus 24, 8) speaks of the same thing as [Christ and] Paul. Moses, by the term "covenant," does not mean aught save one concerning giving the heavenly inheritance typified by Canaan after the death of the Testator, which he represented by the sprinkling of blood. And Paul, by the term "testament," does not mean aught save one having conditions attached to it, one which is at the same time a covenant [POLI, Synopsis]; the conditions are fulfilled by Christ, not by us, except that we must believe, but even this God works in His people. THOLUCK explains, as elsewhere, "covenant . . . covenant . . . mediating victim;" the masculine is used of the victim personified, and regarded as mediator of the covenant; especially as in the new covenant a MAN (Christ) took the place of the victim. The covenanting parties used to pass between the divided parts of the sacrificed animals; but, without reference to this rite, the need of a sacrifice for establishing a covenant sufficiently explains this verse. Others, also, explaining the Greek as "covenant," consider that the death of the sacrificial victim represented in all covenants the death of both parties as unalterably bound to the covenant. So in the redemption-covenant, the death of Jesus symbolized the death of God (?) in the person of the mediating victim, and the death of man in the same. But the expression is not "there must be the death of both parties making the covenant," but singular, "of Him who made (aorist, past time; not 'of Him making') the testament." Also, it is "death," not "sacrifice" or "slaying." Plainly, the death is supposed to be past (aorist, "made"); and the fact of the death is brought (Greek) before court to give effect to the will. These requisites of a will, or testament, concur here; 1. A testator; 2. heirs; 3. goods; 4. the death of the testator; 5. the fact of the death brought forward in court. In Matthew 26, 28 two other requisites appear: witnesses, the disciples; and a seal, the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, the sign of His blood wherewith the testament is primarily sealed. It is true the heir is ordinarily the successor of him who dies and so ceases to have the possession. But in this case Christ comes to life again, and is Himself (including all that He hath), in the power of His now endless life, His people's inheritance; in His being Heir (ch. 1, 2), they are heirs. 17. after—lit., "over," as we say "upon the death of the testators;" not as THOLUCK, "on the condition that slain sacrifices be there," which the Greek hardly sanctions. otherwise—"seeing that it is never availing." [ALFORD.] BENGEI and LACHMANN read with an interrogation, "Since, is it ever in force (surely not) while the testator liveth?" 18. Whereupon—rather, "Whence," dedicated—"inaugurated." The Old Testament strictly and formally began on that day of inauguration. "Where the disposition, or arrangement, is ratified by the blood of another, viz., of animals, which cannot make a covenant, much less make a testament, it is not strictly a testament; where it is ratified by the death of him that makes the arrangement, it is strictly, Greek diathece, Hebrew berith, taken in a wider sense, a testament" [BENGEI]; thus, in v. 18, referring to the old dispensation, we may translate, "the first (covenant);" or better, retain "the first (testament)," not that the old dispensation, regarded by itself, is a testament, but it is so when regarded as the typical representative of the new, which is strictly a Testament. 19. For—Confirming the general truth, v. 16. spoken . . . according to the law—strictly adhering to every direction of "the law of commandments contained in ordinances" (Ephesians 2, 15). Cf. Exodus 24, 3, "Moses told the people all the words of the Lord, and all the judgments; and all the people answered with one voice," &c. the blood of calves—Greek, "the calves," viz., those sacrificed by the "young men" whom he sent to do so (Exodus 24, 5). The "peace offerings" there mentioned were "of oxen" (LXX., "little calves"), and the "burnt offerings" were probably (though this is not specified), as on the day of atonement, goats. The law in Exodus sanctioned formally many sacrificial practices in use by tradition, from the primitive revelation long before. with water—Prescribed, though not in Exodus 24, yet in other purifications, as ex. gr., of the leper, and the water of separation which contained the ashes of the red heifer. scarlet wool, and hyssop—Ordinarily used for purification. Scarlet or crimson, resembling blood: it was thought to be a peculiarly deep, fast dye, whence it typified sin (Note, Isaiah 1, 18). So Jesus wore a scarlet robe, the emblem of the deep-dyed sins He bore on Him, though He had none in Him. Wool was used as imbibing and retaining water; the hyssop, as a bushy, tufty plant (wrapt round with the scarlet wool), was used for sprinkling it. The wool was also a symbol of purity (Isaiah 1, 18). The Hyssopus officinalis grows on walls, with small lanceolate-formed woolly leaves, an inch long, with blue and white flowers, and a knotty stalk about a foot high. sprinkled . . . the book—viz., out of which he had read "every precept;" the book of the testament or covenant. This sprinkling of the book is not mentioned in Exodus 24. Hence BENGEI translates, "And (having taken) the book itself (so Exodus 24, 7), he both sprinkled all the people, and (v. 21) moreover sprinkled the tabernacle." But the Greek supports English Version. Paul, by inspiration, supplies the particular specified here, not in Exodus 24, 7. The sprinkling of the roll (so the Greek for "book") of the covenant, or testament, as well as of the people, implies that neither can the law be fulfilled, nor the people be purged from their sins, save by the sprinkling of the blood of Christ (1 Peter 1, 2). Cf. v. 33, which shows that there is something atypical to the Bible in heaven itself (cf. Revelation 20, 12). The Greek, "itself," distinguishes the book itself from the "precepts" in it which he "spoke," 20, Exodus 24, 8, "Behold the blood of the covenant, which the Lord has made with you concerning all these words." The change is here made to accord with Christ's inauguration of the new testament, or covenant, as recorded by St. Luke 22, 20, "This cup (is) the new testament in my blood, which is shed for you;" the only Gospel in which the "is" has to be supplied. Luke was Paul's companion, which accounts for the correspondence, as here too "is" has to be supplied. testament—(Note, v. 16, 17.) The Greek diathece means both testament and covenant: the term "covenant" better suits the old dispensation, though the idea testament is included, for the old was one in its typical relation to the new dispensation, to which the term "testament" is better suited. Christ has sealed the testament with His blood, of which the Lord's Supper is the sacramental sign. The testator was represented by the animals slain in the old dispensation. In both dispensations the inheritance was bequeathed: in the new by One who has come in person and died; in the old by the same one, only typically and ceremonially present. See ALFORD'S excellent Note. enjoined unto you—commissioned me to ratify in relation to you. In the old dispensation the condition to be fulfilled on the people's part is implied in the words, Exodus 24. 8. "(Lord made with you) concerning all these words." But here Paul omits this clause, as he includes the fulfilment of this condition of obedience to "all these words" in the new covenant, as part of God's promise, in ch. 8. 8, 10, 12, whereby Christ fulfils all for our justification, and will enable us by putting His Spirit in us to fulfil all in our new progressive, and finally complete sanctification. 21. Greek, "And, moreover, in like manner." The sprinkling of the tabernacle with blood is added by inspiration here to the account in Exodus 30. 25-30; 40. 9, 10, which mentions only Moses' anointing the tabernacle and its vessels. In Leviticus 8. 10, 15, 30, the sprinkling of blood upon Aaron and his garments, and upon his sons, and upon the altar, is mentioned as well as the anointing, so that we might naturally infer, as JOSEPHUS has distinctly stated, that the tabernacle and its vessels were sprinkled with blood as well as being anointed: Leviticus 16. 16, 19, 20, 33, virtually sanctions this inference. The tabernacle and its contents needed purification (2 Chronicles 29. 21). 22. almost—to be joined with "all things," viz., almost all things under the old dispensation. The exceptions to all things being purified by blood are, Exodus 19. 10; Leviticus 15. 5, &c.; 16. 26, 28; 22. 6; Numbers 31. 22-24. without—Greek, "apart from." shedding of blood—shed in the slaughter of the victim, and poured out at the altar subsequently. The pouring out of the blood on the altar is the main part of the sacrifice (Leviticus 17. 11), and it could not have place apart from the previous shedding of the blood in the slaying. Paul has, perhaps, in mind here, Luke 22. 20, "This cup is the new testament in my blood, which is shed for you." is—Greek, "takes place:" comes to pass. remission—of sins: a favourite expression of Luke, Paul's companion. Properly used of remitting a debt (Matthew 6. 12; 18. 27, 32); our sins are debts. On the truth here, cf. Leviticus 5. 11-13, an exception because of poverty, confirming the general rule. 23. patterns—"the suggestive representations;" the typical copies (Note, ch. 8. 5). things in the heavens—the heavenly tabernacle and the things therein. purified with these—with the blood of bulls and goats. heavenly things themselves—the archetypes. Man's sin had introduced an element of disorder into the relations of God and His holy angels in respect to man. The purification removes this element of disorder, and changes God's wrath against man in heaven (designed to be the place of God's revealing His grace to men and angels) into a smile of reconciliation. Cf. "peace in heaven" (Luke 19. 38.) "The uncreated heaven of God, though in itself untroubled light, yet needed a purification in so far as the light of love was obscured by the fire of wrath against sinful man." [DELITZSCH in ALFORD.] Contrast Revelation 12. 7-10, Christ's atonement had the effect also of casting Satan out of heaven (Luke 10. 18; John 12. 31; cf. ch. 2. 14). Christ's body, the true tabernacle (notes, ch. 8. 2; 9. 11), as bearing our imputed sin (2 Corinthians 5. 21), was consecrated (John 17. 17, 19) and purified by the shedding of His blood to be the meeting-place of God and man. sacrifice—The plural is used in expressing the general proposition, though strictly referring to the one sacrifice of Christ once for all. Paul implies, that His one sacrifice, by its matchless excellency, is equivalent to the Levitical many sacrifices. It, though but one, is manifold in its effects and applicability to many. 24. Resumption more fully of the thought, "He entered in once into the holy place," v. 12. He has in v. 13, 14, expanded the words "by His own blood," v. 12; and in v. 15-23, he has enlarged on "an High Priest of good things to come." not . . . into . . . holy places made with hands—as was the Holy of holies in the earthly tabernacle (note, v. 11). figures—copies "of the true" holiest place, heaven, the original archetype (ch. 8. 5). into heaven itself—the immediate presence of the invisible God beyond all the created heavens, through which latter Jesus passed (note, ch. 4. 14; 1 Timothy 6. 16). now—ever since His ascension in the present economy (cf. v. 26). to appear—TO PRESENT HIMSELF; Greek, "to be made to appear." Mere man may have a vision through a medium, or veil, as Moses had (Exodus 23. 18, 20-23). Christ alone beholds the Father without a veil, and is His perfect image. Through seeing HIM only can we see the Father. in the presence of God—Greek, "to the face of God." The saints shall hereafter see God's face in Christ (Revelation 22. 4); the earnest of which is now given (2 Corinthians 3. 18). Aaron, the Levitical high priest for the people, stood before the ark and only saw the cloud, the symbol of God's glory (Exodus 28. 30). for us—in our behalf as our Advocate and Intercessor (ch. 7. 25; Romans 8. 34; 1 John 2. 1). "It is enough that Jesus should show Himself for us to the Father: the sight of Jesus satisfied God in our behalf. He brings before the face of God no offering which has exhausted itself, and, as only sufficing for a time, needs renewal; but He himself is in person, by virtue of the eternal Spirit, i. e., the imperishable life of His person, now and for ever freed from death, our eternally present offering before God." [DELITZSCH in ALFORD.] 25. As in v. 24, Paul said, it was not into the typical, but the true sanctuary, that Christ is entered; so now he says, that His sacrifice needs not, as the Levitical sacrifices did, to be repeated. Construe, "Nor yet did He enter for this purpose that He may offer Himself often," i. e., present Himself in the presence of God, as the high priest does (Paul uses the present tense, as the legal service was then existing), year by year, on the day of atonement, entering the Holy of holies. with—lit., "in." blood of others—not his own, as Christ did. 26. then—in that case. must . . . have suffered—rather as Greek, "It would have been necessary for Him often to suffer." In order to "offer" (v. 25), or present Himself often before God in the heavenly holiest place, like the legal high priests making fresh renewals of this high priestly function. He would have had, and would have often to suffer. His oblation of Himself before God was once for all (i. e., the bringing in of His blood into the heavenly Holy of holies), and therefore the preliminary suffering was once for all. since the foundation of the world—The continued sins of men, from their first creation, would entail a continual suffering on earth, and consequent oblation of His blood in the heavenly holiest place, since the foundation of the world, if the one oblation "in the fulness of time" were not sufficient. PHILLO, de Mon., p. 637, shows that the high priest of the Hebrews offered sacrifices for the whole human race. "If there had been greater efficacy in the repetition of the oblation, Christ necessarily would not have been so long promised, but would have been sent immediately after the foundation of the world to suffer, and offer Himself at successive periods." [GRIEUS.] now—as the case is. once—for all; without need of renewal. Rome's fiction of an UNBLOODY sacrifice in the mass, contradicts her assertion that the blood of Christ is present in the wine; and also confutes her assertion that the mass is propitiatory; for, if unbloody, it cannot be propitiatory; for without shedding of blood there is no remission (v. 22). Moreover, the expression "once" for all here, and in v. 23, and ch. 10. 10, 12, proves the falsity of her view that there is a continually-repeated offering of Christ in the Eucharist or mass. The offering of Christ was a thing once done that it might be thought of for ever (Note, cf. ch. 10. 12). in the end of the world—Greek, "at the consummation of the ages;" the winding up of all the previous ages from the foundation of the world; to be followed by a new age (ch. 1. 1, 2). The last age, beyond which no further age is to be expected before Christ's speedy second coming, which is the complement of the first coming; tit., "the ends of the ages;" Matthew 28. 20 is lit., "the consummation of the age," or world (singular; not as here, plural, ages). Cf. "the fulness of times," Ephesians 1. 10. appeared—Greek, "been manifested" on earth (1 Timothy 3. 16; 1 Peter 1. 20). English Version has confounded three distinct Greek verbs, by translating all alike, v. 24, 26, 28, "appear." But, in v. 24, it is "to present Himself," viz., before God in the heavenly sanctuary; in v. 26, "been manifested" on earth; in v. 28, "shall be seen" by all, and especially believers. put away—abolish; doing away sin's power as well by delivering men from its guilt and penalty, so that it should be powerless to condemn men, as also from its yoke, so that they shall at last sin no more. sin—Singular number; all the sins of men of every age are regarded as one mass laid on Christ. He hath not only atoned for all actual sins, but destroyed sin itself. John 1. 29, "Behold the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin (not merely the sins: singular, not plural) of the world." by the sacrifice of himself—Greek, "by (through) His own sacrifice;" not by "blood of others" (v. 25). ALFORD loses this contrast in translating, "By his sacrifice." 27. as—inasmuch as. it is appointed—Greek, "it is laid up (as our appointed lot)," Colossians 1. 5. The word "appointed" (so Hebrew "Seth" means) in the case of man, answers to "anointed" in the case of Jesus; therefore "the Christ," i. e., the anointed, is the title here given designedly. He is the representative man; and there is a strict correspondence between the history of man and that of the Son of man. The two most solemn facts of our being are here connected with the two most gracious truths of our dispensation, our death and judgment answering in parallelism to Christ's first coming to die for us, and His second coming to consummate our salvation. once—and no more. after this the judgment—viz., at Christ's appearing, to which, in v. 23, "judgment" in this verse is parallel. Not "after this comes the heavenly glory." The intermediate state is a state of joyous, or else agonizing and fearful expectation of "judgment;" after the judgment comes the full and final state of joy, or else woe. 28. Christ—Greek, "THE Christ;" the representative MAN; representing all men, as the first Adam did. once offered—not "often," v. 25; just as "men," of whom He is the representative Head, are appointed by God once to die. He did not need to die again and again for each individual, or each successive generation of men, for He represents all men of every age, and therefore needed to die but once for all, so as to exhaust the penalty of death incurred by all. He was offered by the Father, His own "eternal Spirit" (v. 14) concurring; as Abraham spared not Isaac, but offered him, the son himself unresistingly submitting to the father's will (Genesis 22), to bear the sins—Referring to Isaiah 53. 12, "He bare the sins of many," viz., on Himself; so "bear" means, Leviticus 24. 15; Numbers 5. 31; 14. 34. The Greek is lit. to bear up (1 Peter 2. 24). "Our sins were laid on Him. When, therefore, He was lifted up on the cross, He bare up our sins along with Him." [BENGLI.] many—not opposed to all, but to few. He, the One, was offered for many; and that once for all (cf. Matthew 20. 23). appear—rather, as Greek, "be seen." No longer in the alien "form of a servant," but in His own proper glory. without—apart from . . . separate from . . . "sin." Not bearing the sin of many on Him as at His first coming (even then there was no sin in Him). That sin has been at His first coming once for all taken away, so as to need no repetition of His sin offering of Himself (v. 26). At His second coming He shall have no more to do with sin. look for him—with waiting expectation even unto the end (so the Greek). It is translated "wait for" in Romans 8. 19, 23; 1 Corinthians 1. 7, which see, unto salvation—to bring in completed salvation; redeeming then the body which is as yet subject to the bondage of corruption. Hence, in Philipians 3. 20 he says, "we look for THE SAVIOUR." Note, Christ's prophetic office, as the Divine Teacher, was especially exercised during His earthly ministry; His priestly is now from His first to His second coming; His kingly office shall be fully manifested at, and after, His second coming.

CHAPTER X.

Ver. 1-39. CONCLUSION OF THE FOREGOING ARGUMENT. THE YEARLY RECURRING LAW SACRIFICES CANNOT PERFECT THE WORSHIPPER, BUT CHRIST'S ONCE-FOR-ALL OFFERING CAN. Instead of the daily ministry of the Levitical priests, Christ's service is perfected by the one sacrifice, whence He now sits on the right hand of God as a Priest-King, until all His foes shall be subdued unto Him. Thus the new covenant (ch. 8. 8-12) is inaugurated, whereby the law is written on the heart, so that an offering for sin is needed no more. Wherefore we ought to draw near the Holiest in firm faith and love; fearful of the awful results of apostasy; looking for the recompense to be given at Christ's coming. 1. Previously the oneness of Christ's offering was shown; now is shown its perfection as contrasted with the law sacrifices. having—Inasmuch as it has but "the shadow, not the very image," i. e., not the exact likeness, reality, and full revelation, such as the Gospel has. The "image" here means the archetype (cf. ch. 9. 24), the original, solid image [BENGLI] realizing to us those heavenly verities, of which the law furnished but a shadowy outline before. Cf. 2 Corinthians 3. 13, 14, 18; the Gospel is the very setting forth by the Word and Spirit of the heavenly realities themselves, out of which it (the Gospel) is constructed. So ALFORD. As Christ is "the express image (Greek, impress) of the Father's person" (ch. 1. 3), so the Gospel is the heavenly verities themselves manifested by revelation—the heavenly very archetype, of which the law was drawn as a sketch, or outline copy (ch. 8. 5). The law was a continual process of acted prophecy, proving the Divine design that its counterparts should come; and proving the truth of those counterparts when they came. Thus the imperfect and continued expiatory sacrifices before Christ foretold, and now prove the reality of, Christ's one perfect antitypical expiation. good things to come—(ch. 9. 11)—belonging to "the world (age) to come." Good things in part made present by faith to the believer, and to be fully realized hereafter in actual and perfect enjoyment. LESSING says, "As Christ's Church on earth is a prediction of the economy of the future life, so the Old Testament economy is a prediction of the Christian Church." In relation to the temporal good things of the law, the spiritual and eternal good things of the Gospel are "good things to come." Colossians 2. 17 calls legal ordinances "the shadow," and Christ "the body." never—at any time (v. 11). with those sacrifices—rather, "with the same sacrifices. year by year—This clause in the Greek refers to the whole sentence, not merely to the words "which they the priests offered" (Greek, "offer"). Thus the sense is, not as English Version, but, the law year by year, by the repetition of the same sacrifices, testifies its inability to perfect the worshippers, viz., on the YEARLY day of atonement. The "daily" sacrifices are referred to, v. 11. continually—Greek, "continuously." Implying that they offer a tollsome and ineffectual "continuous" round of the "same" atonement-sacrifices recurring "year by year." perfect—fully meet man's needs as to justification and sanctification (Note, ch. 9. 9). comers thereunto—those so coming unto God, viz., the worshippers (the whole people) coming to God in the person of their representative, the high priest. 2. For—If the law could, by its sacrifices, have perfected the worshippers, they—the sacrifices, once purged—if they were once for all cleansed (ch. 7. 27). conscience—"consciousness of sin" (ch. 9. 9). 3. But—So far from those sacrifices ceasing to be offered (v. 2). in, &c.—in the fact of their being offered, and in the course of their being offered on the day of atonement. Contrast v. 17, a remembrance—a recalling to mind by the high priest's confession, on the day of atonement, of the sins both of each past year and of all former years, proving that the expiatory sacrifices of former years were not felt by men's consciences to have fully atoned for former sins; in fact, the expiation and remission were only legal and typical (v. 4, 11). The Gospel remission, on the contrary, is so complete, that sins are "remembered no more" (v. 17) by God. It is unbelief to "forget" this once-for-all purgation, and to fear on account of "former sins" (2 Peter 1. 9). The believer, once for all bathed, needs only to "wash" his hands and "feet" of soils, according as he daily contracts them, in Christ's blood (John 13. 10). 4. For—Reason why, necessarily, there is a continually recurring "remembrance of sins" in the legal sacrifices (v. 3). Typically, "the blood of bulls," &c., sacrificed, had power; but it was only in virtue of the power of the one real antitypical sacrifice of Christ; they had no power in themselves; they were not the instrument of perfect vicarious atonement, but an exhibition of the need of it, suggesting to the faithful Israelite the sure hope of coming redemption, according to God's promise. take away—"take off." The Greek, v. 11, is stronger, explaining the weaker word here, "take away utterly." The blood of brutes could not take away the sin of man. A MAN must do that (Notes, ch. 9. 12-14). 5. Christ's voluntary self-offering, in contrast to those inefficient sacrifices, is shown to fulfil perfectly "the will of God" as to our redemption, by completely atoning "for (our) sins." Wherefore—Seeing that a nobler than animal sacrifices was needed to "take away sins," when he cometh—Greek, "coming." The time referred to is the period before His entrance into the world, when the inefficiency of animal sacrifices for expiation had been proved. [THOLUCK.] Or, the time is that between Jesus' first dawning of reason as a child, and the beginning of His public ministry, during which, being ripened in human resolution, He was intently devoting Himself to the doing of His Father's will. [ALFORD.] But the time of "coming" is present; not "when He had come," but "when coming into the world;" so, in order to accord with ALFORD's view, "the world" must mean His PUBLIC ministry: when coming, or about to come, into public. The Greek verbs are in the past: "sacrifice, &c., thou didst not wish, but a body thou didst prepare for me;" and, "Lo, I am come." Therefore, in order to harmonize these times, the present coming, or about to come, with the past, "A body thou didst prepare for me," we must either explain as ALFORD, or else, if we take the period to be before His actual arrival in the world (the earth) or incarnation, we must explain the past tenses to refer to God's purpose, which speaks of what He designed from eternity as though it were already fulfilled. "A body thou didst prepare in thy eternal counsel." This seems to me more likely than explaining "coming into the world," coming into public, or entering on His public ministry. David, in Psalm 40. (here quoted), reviews his past troubles and God's having delivered him from them, and his consequent desire to render willing obedience to God as more acceptable than sacrifices; but the Spirit puts into his mouth language finding its partial application to David, and its full realization only in the Divine Son of David. "The more any son of man approaches the incarnate Son of God in position, or office, or individual spiritual experience, the more directly may his holy breathings in the power of Christ's Spirit be taken as utterances of Christ Himself. Of all men, the prophesying of Israel resembled and foreshadowed Him the most." [ALFORD.] a body hast thou prepared me—Greek, "thou didst fit for me a body." "In thy counsels thou didst determine to make for me a body, to be given up to death as a sacrificial victim." [WAHL.] In the Hebrew, Psalm 40. 6, it is "mine ears hast thou opened," or "dug." Perhaps this alludes to the custom of boring the ear of a slave who volunteers to remain under his master when he might be free. Christ's assuming a human body, in obedience to the Father's will, in order to die the death of a slave (ch. 2. 14), was virtually the same act of voluntary submission to service as that of a slave suffering his ear to be bored by his master. His willing obedience to the Father's will is what is dwelt on as giving especial virtue to His sacrifice (v. 7, 9, 10). The preparing, or fitting of a body for Him, is not with a view to His mere incarnation, but to His expiatory sacrifice (v. 10), as the contrast to "sacrifice and offering" requires; cf. also Romans 7. 4; Ephesians 2. 16;

Colossians 1. 22. More probably "opened mine ears," means opened mine inward ear, so as to be attentively obedient to what God wills me to do, viz., to assume the body He has prepared for me for my sacrifice, so Job, Margin, 33. 16; 38. 10 (doubtless the boring of a slave's ear was the symbol of such willing obedience); Isaiah 50. 5, "The Lord God hath opened mine ear," i. e., made me obediently attentive as a slave to his master. Others somewhat similarly explain, "Mine ears hast thou digged," or "fashioned," not with allusion to Exodus 21. 6, but to the true office of the ear—a willing, submissive attention to the voice of God (Isalah 50. 4, 5). The forming of the ear implies the preparation of the body, i. e., the incarnation; this secondary idea, really in the Hebrew, though less prominent, is the one which Paul uses for his argument. In either explanation the idea of Christ taking on Him the form, and becoming obedient as a servant, is implied. As He assumed a body in which to make His self-sacrifice, so ought we present our bodies a living sacrifice (Romans 12. 1). 6. burnt offerings—Greek, "whole burnt offerings." thou hast had no pleasure—as if these could in themselves atone for sin: God had pleasure in (Greek, "approved," or "was well pleased with") them, in so far as they were an act of obedience to His positive command under the Old Testament, but not as having an intrinsic efficacy such as Christ's sacrifice had. Contrast Matthew 3. 17. 7. I come—rather, "I am come" (Note, v. 5). "Here we have the creed, as it were, of Jesus: 'I am come to fulfil the law, Matthew 5. 17; to preach, Mark 1. 38; to call sinners to repentance, Luke 5. 32; to send a sword, and to set men at variance, Matthew 10. 34, 35; I came down from heaven to do the will of Him that sent me, John 6. 38, 39 (so here, Psalm 40. 7, 8); I am sent to the lost sheep of the house of Israel, Matthew 15. 24; I am come into this world for judgment, John 9. 39; I am come that they might have life, and might have it more abundantly, John 10. 10; to save what had been lost, Matthew 18. 11 to seek and to save that which was lost, Luke 19. 10; cf. 1 Timothy 1. 15; to save men's lives, Luke 9. 56; to send fire on the earth, Luke 12. 49; to minister, Matthew 20. 28; as 'the Light,' John 1. 9; to bear witness upon the truth John 18. 37.' See, reader, that thy Saviour obtain what He aimed at in thy case. Moreover, do thou for thy part say, why thou art come here? Dost thou, then, also, do the will of God? From what time? and in what way?" [BENGEL.] When the two goats on the day of atonement were presented before the Lord, that goat was to be offered as a sin offering on which the lot of the Lord should fall; and that lot was lifted up on high in the hand of the high priest, and then laid upon the head of the goat which was to die; so the hand of God determined all that was done to Christ. Besides the covenant of God with man through Christ's blood, there was another covenant made by the Father with the Son from eternity. The condition was, "If He shall make His soul an offering for sin, He shall see His seed," &c. (Isalah 53. 10). The Son accepted the condition, "Lo, I come to do thy will, O God." [BISHOP PEARSON.] Oblation, intercession, and benediction, are His three priestly offices. In the volume, &c.—lit., "the roll:" the parchment MS. being wrapped around a cylinder headed with knobs. Here, the Scripture "volume" meant is the 40th Psalm. "By this very passage 'written of me,' I undertake to do thy will [viz., that I should die for the sins of the world, in order that all who believe may be saved, not by animal sacrifices, v. 6, but by my death]." This is the written contract of Messiah (cf. Nehemiah 9. 38), whereby He engaged to be our surety. So complete is the inspiration of all that is written, so great the authority of the Psalms, that what David says is really what Christ then and there said. 8. he—Christ, sacrifice, &c.—The oldest MSS. read, "sacrifices and offerings" (plural). This verse combines the two clauses previously quoted distinctly, v. 5, 6, in contrast to the sacrifice of Christ with which God was well pleased. 9. Then said he—"At that time (viz., when speaking by David's mouth in the 40th Psalm) He hath said." The rejection of the legal sacrifices involves, as its concomitant, the voluntary offer of Jesus to make the self-sacrifice with which God is well pleased (for, indeed, it was God's own "will" that He came to do in offering it: so that this sacrifice could not but be well pleasing to God). I come—"I am come." taketh away—"sets aside the first," viz., "the legal system of sacrifices" which God wills not. the second—"the will of God" (v. 7, 9) that Christ should redeem us by His self-sacrifice. 10. By—Greek, "IN." So "in," and "through," occur in the same sentence, 1 Peter 1. 22, "Ye have purified your souls IN obeying the truth through the Spirit." Also, 1 Peter 1. 5, in the Greek. The "IN (fulfilment of) which will" (cf. the use of IN, Ephesians 1. 6, "wherein [in which grace] He hath made us accepted in the Beloved"), expresses the originating cause; "THROUGH the offering . . . of Christ," the instrumental or mediatory cause. The whole work of redemption flows from "the will" of God the Father, as the First Cause, who decreed redemption from before the foundation of the world. The "will" here (boulema) is His absolute sovereign will. His "good will" (eudokia) is a particular aspect of it. are sanctified—once for all, and as our permanent state (so the Greek). It is the finished work of Christ in having sanctified us (i. e., having translated us from a state of unholy alienation into a state of consecration to God, having "no more conscience of sin," v. 2) once for all and permanently, not the process of gradual sanctification, which is here referred to. the body—"prepared" for Him by the Father (v. 5). As the atonement, or reconciliation, is by the blood of Christ (Leviticus 17. 11), so our sanctification (consecration to God, holiness and eternal bliss) is by the body of Christ (Colossians 1. 22). ALFORD quotes the Book of Common Prayer Communion Service, "that our sinful bodies may be made clean by His body, and our souls washed through His most precious blood." once for all—(Ch. 7. 27; 9. 12, 26, 28; 10. 12, 14.) 11. And—A new point of contrast; the frequent repetition of the sacrifices. priest—The oldest MSS. read, "high priest." Though he did not in person stand "daily" offering sacrifices, he did so by the subordinate priests of whom, as well as of all Israel, he was the representative head. So "daily" is applied to the high priests (ch. 7. 27). standeth—the attitude of one ministering; in contrast to "sat down on the right hand of God," v. 12, said of Christ; the posture of one being ministered to as a king. which—Greek, "the which," i. e., of such a kind as. take away—utterly; lit., strip off all round. Legal sacrifices might, in part, produce the sense of forgiveness, yet scarcely even that (Note, v. 4); but entirely to strip off one's guilt they never could. 12. this man—Emphatic (ch. 3. 3). for ever—joined in English Version with "offered one sacrifice;" offered one sacrifice, the efficacy of which endures for ever; lit., continuously (cf. v. 14). "The offering of Christ, once for all made, will continue the one and only oblation for ever; no other will supersede it." [BENGEL.] The mass, which professes to be the frequent repetition of one and the same sacrifice of Christ's body, is hence disproved. For not only is Christ's body one, but also His offering is one, and that inseparable from His suffering (ch. 9. 26). The mass would be much the same as the Jewish sacrifices which Paul sets aside as abrogated, for they were anticipations of the one sacrifice, just as Rome makes masses continuations of it, in opposition to Paul's argument. A repetition would imply that the former once-for-all offering of the one sacrifice was imperfect, and so would be dishonouring to it (v. 2, 18). Verse 14, on the contrary, says, "He hath PERFECTED FOR EVER them that are sanctified." If Christ offered Himself at the last supper, then He offered Himself again on the cross, and there would be two offerings; but Paul says there was only one, once for all. Cf. Note, ch. 9. 26. English Version is favoured by the usage in this Epistle, of putting the Greek "for ever" after that which it qualifies. Also, "one-sacrifice for ever," stands in contrast to "the same sacrifices oftentimes" (v. 11). Also, 1 Corinthians 15. 25, 28, agrees with v. 12, 13, taken as English Version, not joining, as ALFORD does, "for ever" with "sat down," for Jesus is to give up the mediatorial throne "when all things shall be subdued unto Him," and not to sit on it for ever. 13. expecting—"waiting." Awaiting the execution of His Father's will, that all His foes should be subjected to Him. The Son waits till the Father shall "send Him forth to triumph over all His foes." He is now sitting at rest (v. 12), invisibly reigning, and having His foes virtually, by right of His death, subject to Him. His present sitting on the unseen throne is a necessary preliminary to His coming forth to subject His foes openly. He shall then come forth to a visibly-manifested kingdom and conquest over his foes. Thus He fulfils Psalm 110. 1. This agrees with 1 Corinthians 15. 23-28. He is, by His Spirit and His providence, now subjecting His foes to Him in part (Psalm 110). The subjection of His foes fully shall be at his second advent, and from that time to the general judgment (Revelation 19. and 20.); then comes the subjection of Himself as Head of the Church to the Father (the mediatorial economy ceasing when its end shall have been accomplished), that God may be all in all. Eastern conquerors used to tread on the necks of the vanquished, as Joshua did to the five kings. So Christ's total and absolute conquest at His coming is symbolized. be made his footstool—lit., "be placed (rendered) footstool of His feet." his enemies—Satan and Death, whose strength consists in "sin;" this being taken away (v. 12), the power of the foes is taken away, and their destruction necessarily follows. 14. For—The sacrifice being "for ever" in its efficacy (v. 12) needs no renewal. "For," &c. them that are sanctified—rather as Greek, "them that are being sanctified." The sanctification (consecration to God) of the elect (1 Peter 1. 2) believers is perfect in Christ once for all (Note, v. 10). (Contrast the law, ch. 7. 19; 9. 9; 10. 1.) The development of that sanctification is progressive. 15. The Greek has "moreover," or "now," is a witness—of the truth which I am setting forth. The Father's witness is given ch. 5. 10. The Son's, ch. 10. 5. Now is added that of the Holy Spirit, called accordingly "the Spirit of grace," v. 25. The testimony of all Three leads to the same conclusion (v. 18). for after that he hath said, &c.—The conclusion to the sentence is in v. 17, "After He had said before, This is the covenant that I will make with them (with the house of Israel, ch. 8. 10; here extended to the spiritual Israel, &c., saith the Lord; I will put (lit., giving, referring to the giving of the law; not now as then, giving into the hands, but giving) my laws into their hearts (mind, ch. 8. 10) and in their minds (hearts, ch. 8. 10); I will inscribe (so the Greek) them (here he omits the addition quoted in ch. 8. 10, 11, I will be to them a God, &c., and they shall not teach every man his neighbour, &c.), and (i. e., after He had said the foregoing, HE THEN ADDS) their sins, &c., will I remember no more." The great object of the quotation here is, to prove that, there being in the Gospel covenant "REMISSION of sins" (v. 17), there is no more need of a sacrifice for sins. The object of the same quotation in ch. 8. 8-13 is to show that, there being a "new covenant," the old is antiquated. 16. where remission of these is—as there is under the Gospel covenant (v. 17). "Here ends the finale (ch. 10. 1-18) of the great tripartite arrangement (ch. 7. 1-25; 7. 26 to 9. 12; 9. 13 to 10. 18) of the middle portion of the Epistle. Its great theme was Christ a High Priest for ever after the order of Melchisedec. What it is to be a high priest after the order of Melchisedec is set forth, ch. 7. 1-25, as contrasted with the Aaronic order. That Christ, however, as High Priest, is Aaron's antitype in the true holy place, by virtue of His self-sacrifice here on earth, and Mediator of a better covenant, whose essential character the old only typified, we learn, ch. 7. 26 to 9. 12. And that Christ's self-sacrifice, offered through the Eternal Spirit, is of everlasting power, as contrasted with the unavailing cycle of legal offerings, is established in the third part, ch. 9. 13 to 10. 18; the first half of this last portion [ch. 9. 13-28], showing that both our present possession of salvation, and our future completion of it, are as certain to us as that He is with God, ruling as a Priest and reigning as a King, once more to appear, no more as a bearer of our sins, but in glory as a Judge. The second half, ch. 10. 1-18, reiterating the main position of the whole, the High Priesthood of Christ, grounded on His offering of Himself—its kingly character, its eternal accomplishment of its end, confirmed by Psalm 40 and 110., and Jeremiah 31." [DELITZSCH in ALFORD.] 19. Here begins the third and last division of the Epistle; over duty now whilst waiting for the Lord's second advent. Resumption and expansion of the exhortation (ch. 4. 11-16; cf. v. 22, 23 here) wherewith he closed the first part of the Epistle, preparatory to his great doctrinal argument, beginning ch. 7. 1. boldness—"free confidence," grounded on the consciousness that our sins have been forgiven. to enter—lit., "as regards the entering;" by—Greek, "in;" it is in the blood of Jesus that our boldness to enter is grounded. Cf. Ephesians 3, 12, "In whom we have boldness and access with confidence." It is His having once for all entered as our Forerunner (ch. 6. 20) and High Priest (v. 21), making atonement for us with His blood, which is continually there (ch. 12. 24) before God, that gives us confident access. No priestly caste now mediates between the sinner and his Judge. We may come boldly with loving confidence, not with slavish fear, directly through Christ, the only mediating Priest. The minister is not officially nearer God than the layman; nor can the latter serve God at a distance or by deputy, as the natural man would like. Each must come for himself, and all are accepted when they come by the new and living way opened by Christ. Thus all Christians are, in respect to access directly to God, virtually high priests (Revelation 1. 6). They draw nigh in and through Christ, the only proper High Priest (ch. 7. 25). 20. which—The antecedent in the Greek is "the entering;" not as English Version, "way." Translate, "Which (entering) He has consecrated (not as though it were already existing, but has been the first to open, INAUGURATED as a new thing; Note, ch. 9. 13, where the Greek is the same) for us (as) a new (Greek, recent; recently opened, Romans 16. 25, 26) and living way" (not like the lifeless way through the law offering of the blood of dead victims, but real, vital, and of perpetual efficacy, because the living and life-giving Saviour is that way. It is a living hope that we have, producing not dead, but living, works). Christ, the first-fruits of our nature, has ascended, and the rest is sanctified thereby. "Christ's ascension is our promotion; and whither the glory of the Head hath preceded, thither the hope of the body, too, is called." [LEO.] the veil—As the veil had to be passed through in order to enter the holiest place, so the weak, human suffering flesh (ch. 5. 7) of Christ's humanity (which veiled His Godhead) had to be passed through by Him in entering the heavenly holiest place for us; in putting off His rent flesh, the temple veil, its type, was simultaneously rent from top to bottom (Matthew 27. 51). Not His body, but His weak suffering flesh, was the veil; His body was the temple (John 2. 19). 21. High Priest—As a different Greek term (archiereus) is used always elsewhere in this Epistle for "High Priest," translate as Greek here, "A Great Priest;" one who is at once King and "Priest on His throne" (Zechariah 6. 13); a royal Priest, and a priestly King. house of God—the spiritual house, the Church, made up of believers, whose home is heaven, where Jesus now is (ch. 12. 22, 23). Thus, by "the house of God," over which Jesus is, heaven is included in meaning, as well as the Church, whose home it is. 22. (Ch. 4. 16; 7. 19.) with a true heart—without hypocrisy: "in truth, and with a perfect heart;" a heart thoroughly imbued with "the truth" (v. 26). full assurance—(Ch. 6. 11)—With no doubt as to our acceptance when coming to God by the blood of Christ. As "faith" occurs here, so "hope," and "love," v. 23, 24. sprinkled from—i. e., sprinkled so as to be cleansed from. evil conscience—a consciousness of guilt unatoned for, and uncleansed away (v. 2; ch. 9. 9). Both the hearts and the bodies are cleansed. The legal purifications were with blood of animal victims and with water, and could only cleanse the flesh (ch. 9. 13, 21). Christ's blood purifies the heart and conscience. The Aaronic priest, in entering the holy place, washed with water (ch. 9. 19) in the brazen laver. Believers, as priests to God, are once for all washed in body (as distinguished from "hearts") at baptism. As we have an immaterial, and a material nature, the cleansing of both is expressed by "hearts" and body," the inner and the outer man; so the whole man, material and immaterial. The baptism of the body, however, is not the mere putting away of material filth, nor an act operating by intrinsic efficacy, but the sacramental seal, applied to the outer man, of a spiritual washing (1 Peter 3. 21). "Body" (not merely "flesh," the carnal part, as 2 Corinthians 7. 1) includes the whole material man, which needs cleansing, as being redeemed, as well as the soul. The body, once polluted with sin, is washed, so as to be fitted like Christ's holy body, and by His body, to be spiritually a pure and living offering. On the "pure water," the symbol of consecration and sanctification, cf. John 19. 34; 1 Corinthians 6. 11; 1 John 5. 6; Ezekiel 36. 25. The perfects "having . . . hearts sprinkled . . . body (the Greek is singular) washed," imply a continuing state produced by a once-for-all accomplished act, viz., our justification by faith through Christ's blood, and consecration to God, sealed sacramentally by the baptism of our body. 23. Ch. 3. 6, 14; 4. 14. profession—Greek, "confession." our faith—rather as Greek, "OUR HOPE," which is indeed faith exercised as to the future inheritance. Hope rests on faith, and at the same time quickens faith, and is the ground of our bold confession (1 Peter 3. 15). Hope is similarly (v. 22) connected with purification (1 John 3. 3). without wavering—without declension (ch. 3. 14), "steadfast unto the end." he—God is faithful to his promises (ch. 6. 17, 18; 11. 11; 12. 26, 28; 1 Corinthians 1. 9; 10. 13; 1 Thessalonians 5. 24; 2 Thessalonians 3. 3; see also Christ's promise, John 12. 26), but man is too often unfaithful to his duties. 24. Here, as elsewhere, hope and love follow faith; the Pauline triad of Christian graces. consider—with the mind attentively fixed on "one another" (Note, ch. 3. 1), contemplating with continual consideration the characters and wants of our brethren, so as to render mutual help and counsel. Cf. "consider," Psalm 41. 1, and ch. 12. 15, "(All) looking diligently lest any fall of the grace of God." to provoke—Greek, "with a view to provoking unto love," instead of provoking to hatred, as is too often the case. 25. assembling of ourselves together—The Greek, episunagoge, is only found here and 2 Thessalonians 2. 1 (the gathering together of the elect to Christ at His coming, Matthew 24. 31). The assembling or gathering of ourselves for Christian communion in private and public, is an earnest of our being gathered together to Him at His appearing. Union is strength; continual assemblies together beget and foster love, and give good opportunities for "provoking to good works," by "exhorting one another" (ch. 3. 13). IGNATIUS says, "When ye frequently, and in numbers meet together, the powers of Satan are overthrown, and his mischief is neutralized by your like-mindedness in the faith." To neglect such assemblies together might end in apostasy at last. He avoids the Greek term synagoge, as suggesting the Jewish synagogue meetings (cf. Revelation 2. 9). as the manner of some is—"manner," i. e., habit, custom. This gentle expression proves he is not here as yet speaking of apostasy. the day approaching—This, the shortest designation of the day of the Lord's coming, occurs only in 1 Corinthians 3. 13; a confirmation of the Pauline authorship of this Epistle. The Church being in all ages kept uncertain how soon Christ is coming, the day is, and has been, in each age, practically always near; whence, believers have been called on always to be watching for it as nigh at hand. The Hebrews were now living close upon one of those great types and forestays of it, the destruction of Jerusalem (Matthew 24.), "the bloody and fiery dawn of the great day; that day is the day of days, the ending day of all days, the settling day of all days, the day of the promotion of time into eternity, the day which, for the Church, breaks through and breaks off the night of the present world" [DELITZSCH in ALFORD]. 26. Cf. on this and following verses, ch. 6. 4, &c. There the warning was that if there be not diligence in progressing a falling off will take place, and apostasy may ensue: here it is, that if there be lukewarmness in Christian communion, apostasy may ensue, if we sin—Greek present participle: if we be found sinning, i. e., not isolated acts, but a state of sin. [ALFORD.] A violation not only of the law, but of the whole economy of the New Testament (v. 28, 29). willingly—presumptuously, Greek "willingly." After receiving "full knowledge (so the Greek, cf. 1 Timothy 2. 4) of the truth," by having been "enlightened," and by having

"tasted" a certain measure even of grace of "the Holy Ghost" (the Spirit of truth, John 14. 17; and "the Spirit of grace," v. 29); to fall away (as "slu" here means, ch. 3. 12, 17; cf. ch. 6. 6) and apostatize (ch. 3. 12) to Judaism or infidelity, is not a sin of ignorance, or error ("out of the way," the result) of infirmity, but a deliberate sinning against the Spirit (v. 29; ch. 5. 2): such sinning, where a consciousness of Gospel obligations not only was, but is present: a sinning presumptuously and perseveringly against Christ's redemption for us, and the Spirit of grace in us. "He only who stands high can fall low. A lively reference in the soul to what is good is necessary in order to be thoroughly wicked; hence, man can be more reprobate than the beasts, and the apostate angels than apostate man." [THOLUCK.] remaineth no more sacrifice—For there is but ONE Sacrifice that can atone for sin; they, after having fully known that sacrifice, deliberately reject it. 27. a certain—an extraordinary and indescribable. The indefiniteness, as of something peculiar of its kind, makes the description the more terrible (cf. Greek, James 1. 18). looking for—"expectation:" a later sense of the Greek. ALFORD strangely translates, as the Greek usually means elsewhere, "reception." The transition is easy from "giving a reception to" something or some one, to looking for. Contrast the "expecting" (the very same Greek as here), v. 13, which refutes ALFORD. fiery indignation—lit., "zeal of fire." Fire is personified: glow or ardour of fire, i. e., of Him who is "a consuming fire." devour—continually. 28. Cf. ch. 2. 2, 3; 12. 25. despised—"set at naught." [ALFORD:] utterly and heinously violated, not merely some minor detail, but the whole law and covenant, as ex. gr., by idolatry (Deuteronomy 17. 2-7). So here apostasy answers to such an utter violation of the old covenant. died—Greek, "dies;" the normal punishment of such transgression, then still in force. without mercy—lit., mercies: removal out of the pale of mitigation, or a respite of his doom. under—on the evidence of. 29. sorer—Greek, "worse," viz., "punishment" (lit., vengeance) than any mere temporal punishment of the body. suppose ye—an appeal to the Hebrews' reason and conscience. thought worthy—by God at the judgment. trodden under foot the Son of God—by "wilful" apostasy. So he treads under foot God Himself who "glorified His Son as an high priest" (ch. 5. 5; 6. 6). an unholly thing—lit., "common," as opposed to "sanctified." No better than the blood of a common man, thus involving the consequence that Christ, in claiming to be God, was guilty of blasphemy, and so deserved to die! wherewith he was sanctified—for Christ died even for him. "Sanctified" in the fullest sense, belongs only to the saved elect. But in some sense it belongs also to those who have gone a far way in Christian experience, and yet fall away at last. The higher such a one's past Christian experiences, the deeper his fall. done despite unto—by repelling in fact: as "blasphemy" is despite in words (Mark 3. 29). "Of the Jews who became Christians and relapsed to Judaism, we find from the history of URIEL ACOSTA, that they required a blasphemy against Christ. They applied to Him epithets used against Molech the adulterous branch," &c. [THOLUCK.] the Spirit of grace—the Spirit that confers grace. "He who does not accept the benefit, insults Him who confers it. He hath made thee a son: wilt thou become a slave? He has come to take up His abode with thee; but thou art introducing evil into thyself." [CHRYSOSTOM.] "It is the curse of evil eternally to propagate evil: so, for him who profanes the Christ without him, and blasphemes the Christ within him, there is subjectively no renewal of a change of mind (ch. 6. 6), and objectively no new sacrifice for sins" (ch. 10. 26). [THOLUCK.] 30. him—God, who enters no empty threats. vengeance belongeth unto me—Greek, "To me belongeth vengeance:" exactly according with Paul's quotation, Romans 12. 19, of the same text. Lord shall judge his people—in grace, or else anger, according as each deserves: here, "judge," so as to punish the reprobate apostate; there, "judge," so as to interpose in behalf of, and save His people (Deuteronomy 32. 36). 31. fearful . . . to fall into the hands, &c.—It is good like David to fall into the hands of God, rather than man, when one does so with filial faith in his father's love, though God chastises him. "It is fearful" to fall into His hands as a reprobate and presumptuous sinner doomed to His just vengeance as Judge (v. 27). Living God—therefore able to punish for ever (Matthew 10. 28). 32. As previously he has warned them by the awful end of apostates, so here he stirs them up by the remembrance of their own former faith, patience, and self-sacrificing love. So Revelation 2. 3, 4. call to remembrance—habitually: so the present tense means. illuminated—"enlightened:" come to "the knowledge of the truth" (v. 26) in connection with baptism (Note, ch. 6. 4). In spiritual baptism, Christ, who is "the Light," is put on. "On the one hand, we are not to sever the sign and the grace signified where the sacrifice truly answers its designs; on the other, the glass is not to be mistaken for the liquor, nor the sheath for the sword." [BENGE.] fight of—i. e., consisting of afflictions. 33. The persecutions here referred to seem to have been endured by the Hebrew Christians at their first conversion, not only in Palestine, but also in Rome and elsewhere, the Jews in every city inciting the populace and the Roman authorities against Christians. gazing-stock—as in a theatre (so the Greek): often used as the place of punishment in the presence of the assembled multitudes. Acts 19. 29; 1 Corinthians 4. 9, "Made a theatrical spectacle to the world." ye became—of your own accord: attesting your Christian sympathy with your suffering brethren. companions of—sharers in affliction with. 34. ye had compassion on me in my bonds—The oldest MSS. and versions omit "me," and read, "Ye both sympathized with those in bonds (answering to the last clause of v. 33; cf. ch. 13. 3, 23; 6. 10), and accepted (so the Greek is translated ch. 11. 35) with joy (James 1. 2; joy in tribulations, as exercising faith and other graces, Romans 5. 3; and the pledge of the coming glory, Matthew 5. 12) the plundering of your (own) goods" (answering to the first clause of v. 33). in yourselves—The oldest MSS. omit "in;" translate, "Knowing that ye have for (or to) yourselves," better—a heavenly (ch. 11. 16). enduring—not liable to spoiling. substance—possession: peculiarly our own, if we will not cast away our birth-right. 35-37. Consequent exhortation to confidence and endurance, as Christ is soon coming. Cast not away—Implying that they now have "confidence," and that it will not withdraw of itself, unless they "cast it away" wilfully (cf. ch. 3. 14). which—Greek, "the which:" inasmuch as being such as. hath—present tense: it is as certain as if you had it in your hand (v. 37). It hath in reversion. recompense of reward—of grace, not of debt: a reward of a kind which no mercenary self-seeker would seek: holiness will be its own reward; self-devoting unselfishness for Christ's sake will be its own rich recompense (Note, ch. 2. 2; 11. 26). 36. patience—Greek, "waiting endurance," or "enduring perseverance:" the kindred Greek verb in the LXX., Habakkuk 2. 3, is translated, "Wait for it" (cf. James 5. 7). after ye have done the will of God—"that whereas ye have done the will of God" hitherto (v. 32-35), ye may now show also patient, persevering endurance, and so "receive the promise," i. e., the promised reward: eternal life and bliss commensurate with our work of faith and love (ch. 6. 10-12). We must not only do, but also suffer (1 Peter 4. 19). God first uses the active talents of His servants; then polishes the other side of the stone, making the passive graces shine, patience, meekness, &c. It may be also translated, "That ye may do the will of God, and receive," &c. [ALFORD:] "patience" itself is a further and a persevering doing of "God's will;" otherwise it would be profitless and no real grace (Matthew 7. 21). We should look, not merely for individual bliss now and at death, but for the great and general consummation of bliss of all saints, both in body and soul. 37, 38. Encouragement to patient endurance by consideration of the shortness of the time till Christ shall come, and God's rejection of him that draws back, taken from Habakkuk 2. 3, 4. a little while—(John 16. 16.) he that shall come—lit., "the Comer." In Habakkuk, it is the vision that is said to be about to come. Christ, being the grand and ultimate subject of all prophetic vision, is here made by Paul, under inspiration, the subject of the Spirit's prophecy by Habakkuk, in its final and exhaustive fulfilment, 38. just—The oldest MSS. and Vulgate read, "MY just man." God is the speaker: "He who is just in my sight." BENGEI translates: "The just shall live by MY faith." answering to the Hebrew, Habakkuk 2. 4., lit., "the just shall live by the faith of Him," viz., Christ, the final subject of "the vision," who "will not lie," i. e., disappoint. Here not merely the first beginning, as in Galatians 3. 11, but the continuance, of the spiritual life of the justified man is referred to, as opposed to declension and apostasy. As the justified man receives his first spiritual life by faith, so it is by faith that he shall continue to live (Luke 4. 4). The faith meant here is that fully developed living trust in the unseen (ch. 11. 1) Saviour, which can keep men steadfast amidst persecutions and temptations (v. 34-36). but—Greek, "and," if any man draw back—So the Greek admits: though it might also be translated, as ALFORD approves, "if he (the just man) draw back." Even so, it would not disprove the final perseverance of saints. For "the just man" in this latter clause would mean one seemingly, and in part really, though not savingly, "just" or justified: as in Ezekiel 18. 24, 26. In the Hebrew, this latter half of the verse stands first, and is, "Behold, his soul which is lifted up, is not upright in him." Habakkuk states the cause of drawing back: a soul lifted up, and in self-inflated unbelief setting itself up against God. Paul, by the Spirit, states the effect, it draws back. Also, what in Habakkuk is, "His soul is not upright in him," is in Paul, "My soul shall have no pleasure in him." Habakkuk states the cause, Paul the effect: He who is not right in his own soul, does not stand right with God; God has no pleasure in him. BENGEI translates Habakkuk, "His soul is not upright in respect to him," viz., Christ, the subject of "the vision," i. e., Christ has no pleasure in him (cf. ch. 12. 25). Every flower in spring is not a fruit in autumn. 39. A Pauline elegant turning-off from denunciatory warnings to charitable hopes of his readers (Romans 8. 12). saying of the soul—lit., "acquisition (or obtaining) of the soul." The kindred Greek verb is applied to Christ's acquiring the Church as the purchase of His blood (Acts 20. 28). If we acquire or obtain our soul's salvation, it is through Him who has obtained it for us by his blood-shedding. "The unbelieving man loses his soul: for not being God's, neither is he his own [cf. Matthew 16. 26 with Luke 9. 25]: faith saves the soul by linking it to God." [DELITZSCH in ALFORD.]

CHAPTER XI.

Ver. 1-40. DEFINITION OF THE FAITH JUST SPOKEN OF (ch. 10. 39): EXAMPLES FROM THE OLD COVENANT FOR OUR PERSEVERANCE IN FAITH. 1. Description of the great things which faith (in its widest sense: not here restricted to faith in the Gospel sense) does for us. Not a full definition of faith in its whole nature, but a description of its great characteristics in relation to the subject of Paul's exhortation here, viz., to perseverance. substance, &c.—It substantiates promises of God which we hope for, as future in fulfilment, making them present realities to us. However, the Greek is translated in ch. 3. 14, "confidence;" and it also here may mean "sure confidence." So ALFORD translates. THOMAS MAGISTER supports English Version, "The whole thing that follows is virtually contained in the first principle; now the first commencement of the things hoped for is in us through the assent of faith, which virtually contains all the things hoped for." Cf. Note, ch. 6. 5, "tasted . . . powers of the world to come." Through faith, the future object of Christian hope, in its beginning, is already present. True faith infers the reality of the objects believed in and hoped for (v. 6). HUGO DE ST. VICTOR distinguished faith from hope. By faith alone we are sure of eternal things that they ARE; but by hope we are confident that WE SHALL HAVE them. All hope presupposes faith (Romans 8. 25). evidence—"demonstration:" "convincing proof to the believer; the soul thereby seeing what the eye cannot see.

things not seen—the whole invisible and spiritual world; not merely things future and things pleasant, as the "things hoped for," but also the past and present, and those the reverse of pleasant. "Eternal life is promised to us, but it is when we are dead; we are told of a blessed resurrection, but meanwhile we moulder in the dust; we are declared to be justified, and sin dwells in us; we hear that we are blessed, meantime we are overwhelmed in endless miseries; we are promised abundance of all goods, but we still endure hunger and thirst; God declares He will immediately come to our help, but He seems deaf to our cries. What should we do if we had not faith and hope to lean on, and if our mind did not emerge amidst the darkness above the world by the shining of the Word and Spirit of God?" [CALVIN.] Faith is an assent unto truths credible upon the testimony of God [not on the reasonableness of the thing revealed, though by this we may judge as to whether it be what it professes, a genuine revelation], delivered unto us in the writings of the apostles and prophets. Thus Christ's ascension is the cause, and His absence the crown, of our faith: because He ascended, we the more believe, and because we believe in Him who hath ascended, our faith is the more accepted. [BISHOP PEARSON.] Faith believes what it sees not; for if thou seest there is no faith: the Lord has gone away so as not to be seen: He is hidden that He may be believed; the yearning desire by faith after Him who is unseen is the preparation of a heavenly mansion for us; when He shall be seen it shall be given to us as the reward of faith. [AUGUSTINE.] As Revelation deals with spiritual and invisible things exclusively, faith is the faculty needed by us, since it is the evidence of things not seen. By faith we venture our eternal interests on the bare word of God, and this is altogether reasonable. 2. For—So high a description of faith is not undeserved; for, &c. [ALFORD.] by—Greek, "in:" in respect to . . . in the matter of, "it," or, as Greek more emphatically, "this." the elders—as though still living and giving their powerful testimony to the reasonableness and excellence of faith (ch. 12. 1). Not merely the ancients, as though they were people solely of the past; nay, they belong to the one and the same blessed family as ourselves (v. 39, 40). "The elders," whom we all revere so highly. "Paul shows how we ought to seek in all its fullness, under the veil of history, the essential substance of the doctrine sometimes briefly indicated." [BENGEI.] "The elders," as "the fathers," is a title of honour given on the ground of their bright faith and practice. obtained a good report—Greek, "were testified of," viz., favourably (cf. ch. 7. 8). It is a phrase of Luke, Paul's companion. Not only men, but God, gave testimony to their faith (v. 4, 5, 39). Thus they being testified of themselves have become "witnesses" to all others (ch. 12. 1). The earlier elders had their patience exercised for a long period of life: those later, in sharper afflictions. Many things which they hoped for and did not see, subsequently came to pass and were conspicuously seen, the event confirming faith. [BENGEI.] 3. we understand—we perceive with our spiritual intelligence the fact of the world's creation by God, though we see neither Him nor the act of creation as described, Genesis 1. The natural world could not, without revelation, teach us this truth, though it confirms the truth when apprehended by faith (Romans 1. 20). Adam is passed over in silence here as to his faith, perhaps as being the first who fell and brought sin on us all; though it does not follow that he did not repent and believe the promise. worlds—lit., "ages:" all that exists in time and space, visible and invisible, present and eternal. framed—"fitly formed and consolidated;" including the creation of the single parts and the harmonious organization of the whole, and the continual providence which maintains the whole throughout all ages. As creation is the foundation and a specimen of the whole Divine economy, so faith in creation is the foundation and a specimen of all faith. [BENGEI.] by the word of God—not the personal word (Greek, logos, John 1. 1) here, but the spoken word (Greek, rhema): though by the instrumentality of the personal word (ch. 1. 2).

not made, &c.—translate as Greek, so that not out of things which appear hath that which is seen been made;" not as in the case of all things which we see reproduced from previously existing and visible materials, as, for instance, the plant from the seed, the animal from the parent, &c., has the visible world sprung into being from apparent materials. So also it is implied in the first clause of the verse that the invisible spiritual worlds were framed not from previously existing materials. BENGEL explains it by distinguishing "appear," i. e., begin to be seen (viz., at creation), from that which is seen as already in existence, not merely beginning to be seen; "so that the things seen were not made of the things which appear," i. e., which begin to be seen by us in the act of creation. We were not spectators of creation; it is by faith we perceive it. 4. more excellent sacrifice—because offered in faith. Now faith must have some revelation of God on which it fastens. The revelation in this case was doubtless God's command to sacrifice animals ("the firstlings of the flock") in token of the forfeiture of men's life by sin, and as a type of the promised bruise of the serpent's head (Genesis 3. 15), the one coming sacrifice; this command is implied in God's having made coats of skin for Adam and Eve (Genesis 3. 21); for these skins must have been taken from animals slain in sacrifice, inasmuch as it was not for food they were slain, animal food not being permitted till after the flood; nor for mere clothing, as, were it so, clothes might have been made of the fleeces without the needless cruelty of killing the animal; but a coat of skin put on Adam from a sacrificed animal typified the covering or atonement (the Hebrew for atone means to cover) resulting from Christ's sacrifice. The Greek is more lit. rendered [KENNICOTT] by WICKLIFFE, "a much more sacrifice;" and by Queen Elizabeth's version "a greater sacrifice." A fuller, more ample sacrifice, that which partook more largely and essentially of the true nature and virtue of sacrifice. [ARCHBISHOP MAGEE.] It was not any intrinsic merit in "the firstling of the flock" above "the fruit of the ground." It was God's appointment that gave it all its excellency as a sacrifice; if it had not been so, it would have been a presumptuous act of will-worship (Colossians 2. 23), and taking of a life which man had no right over before the flood (Genesis 9). The sacrifice seems to have been a holocaust, and the sign of the Divine acceptance of it was probably the consumption of it by fire from heaven (Genesis 15. 17). Hence, "to accept" a burnt sacrifice is in Hebrew "to turn it to ashes" (Margin, Psalm 20. 3). A flame seems to have issued from the Shekinah, or flaming cherubim, east of Eden ("the presence of the Lord," Genesis 4. 16), where the first sacrifices were offered. Cain, in unbelieving self-righteousness, presented merely a thank offering, not like Abel feeling his need of the propitiatory sacrifice appointed on account of sin. God "had respect (first) unto Abel, and (then) to his offering" (Genesis 4. 4). Faith causes the believer's person to be accepted, and then his offering. Even an animal sacrifice, though of God's appointment, would not have been accepted, had it not been offered in faith. he obtained witness—God by fire attesting His acceptance of him as "righteous by faith." his gifts—the common term for sacrifices, implying that they must be freely given. by it—by faith exhibited in his animal sacrifice. dead, yet speaketh—His blood crying from the ground to God, shows how precious, because of his "faith," he was still in God's sight, even when dead. So he becomes a witness to us of the blessed effects of faith. 5. Faith was the ground of his pleasing God; and his pleasing God was the ground of his translation. translated—(Genesis 5. 22, 24.) Implying a sudden removal (the same Greek as in Galatians 1. 6) from mortality without death to immortality: such a CHANGE as shall pass over the living at Christ's coming (1 Corinthians 15. 51, 52). had this testimony—viz., of Scripture; the Greek perfect implies that this testimony continues still: "he has been testified of." pleased God—The Scripture testimony virtually expresses that he pleased God, viz., "Enoch walked with God." LXX. translates the Hebrew for "walked with God," Genesis 6. 9, pleased God. 6. without—Greek, "apart from faith:" if one be destitute of faith (cf. Romans 14. 23). to please—translate, as ALFORD does, the Greek aorist, "It is impossible to please God at all" (Romans 8. 8). Natural amiabilities and "works done before the grace of Christ are not pleasant to God, forasmuch as they spring not of faith in Jesus Christ; yea, rather, for that they are not done as God hath willed them to be done, we doubt not but they have the nature of sin." [Article XIII., Book of Common Prayer.] Works not rooted in God are splendid sins. [AUGUSTINE.] he that cometh to God—as a worshipper (ch. 7. 19). must believe—one for all: Greek aorist, that God is—is: is the true self-existing Jehovah (as contrasted with all so-called gods, not gods, Galatians 4. 8), the source of all being, though he sees Him not (v. 1) as being "invisible" (v. 27). So Enoch: this passage implies that he had not been favoured with visible appearances of God, yet he believed in God's being, and in God's moral government, as the Rewarder of His diligent worshippers, in opposition to antediluvian skepticism. Also Moses was not so favoured before he left Egypt the first time, v. 27, still he believed, and is—a different Greek verb from the former "is." Translate, "is eventually:" proves to be; lit., becomes. rewarder—renderer of reward. [ALFORD.] So God proved to be Enoch. The reward is God Himself diligently "sought" and "walked with" in partial communion here, and to be fully enjoyed hereafter. Cf. Genesis 15. 1, "I am thy exceeding great reward." of them—and them only. diligently seek—Greek, "seek out" God. Cf. "seek early," Proverbs 8. 17. Not only "ask" and "seek," but "knock," Matthew 7. 7; cf. ch. 11. 12; Luke 13. 24, "Strive" as in an agony of contest. 7. warned of God—The same Greek, ch. 8. 5, "admonished of God." moved with fear—not mere slavish fear, but as in Note, ch. 5. 7; Greek, reverential fear: opposed to the world's sneering disbelief of the revelation, and self-deceiving security. Join "by faith" with "prepared an ark" (1 Peter 3. 20). by the which—faith. condemned the world—for since he believed and was saved, so might they have believed and been saved, so that their condemnation by God is by his case shown to be just. righteousness which is by faith—Greek, "according to faith." A Pauline thought. Noah is first called "righteous" in Genesis 6. 9. Christ calls Abel so, Matthew 23. 35. Cf. as to Noah's righteousness, Ezekiel 14. 14, 20; 2 Peter 2. 5, "a preacher of righteousness." Paul here makes faith the principle and ground of his righteousness. heir—the consequence of sonship which flows from faith. 8. From the antediluvian saints he passes to the patriarchs of Israel, to whom "the promises" belonged. called—by God (Genesis 12. 1). The oldest MSS. and Vulgate read, "He that was called Abraham," his name being changed from Abram to Abraham, on the occasion of God's making with him and his seed a covenant sealed by circumcision, many years after his call out of Ur. "By faith, he who was (afterwards) called Abraham (father of nations), Genesis 17. 5, in order to become which was the design of God's bringing him out of Ur) obeyed (the command of God; to be understood in this reading), so as to go out," &c. which he should after receive—He had not fully received even this promise when he went out, for it was not explicitly given him till he had reached Canaan (Genesis 12. 1, 6, 7). When the promise of the land was given him the Canaanite was still in the land, and himself a stranger; it is in the new heaven and new earth that he shall receive his personal inheritance promised him; so believers sojourn on earth as strangers, whilst the ungodly and Satan lord it over the earth; but at Christ's coming that same earth which was the scene of the believer's conflict shall be the inheritance of Christ and His saints. 9. sojourned—as a "stranger and pilgrim." in—Greek, "into," i. e., he went into it and sojourned there. as in a strange country—a country not belonging to him, but to others (so the Greek), Acts 7. 5, 6. dwelling in tabernacles—tents: as strangers and sojourners do: moving from place to place, as having no fixed possession of their own. In contrast to the abiding "city" (v. 10). with—Their kind of dwelling being the same is a proof that their faith was the same.

They all alike were content to wait for their good things hereafter (Luke 16. 25). Jacob was fifteen years old at the death of Abraham. heirs with him of the same promise—Isaac did not inherit it from Abraham, nor Jacob from Isaac, but they all inherited it from God directly as "fellow-heirs." In ch. 6. 12, 15, 17, "the promise" means the thing promised as a thing in part already attained; but in this ch. "the promise" is of something still future. See, however, Note, ch. 6. 12. 10. looked for—Greek, "he was expecting;" waiting for with eager expectation (Romans 8. 19). a—Greek, "the city," &c., already alluded to. Worldly Enoch, son of the murderer Cain, was the first to build his city here; the godly patriarchs waited for their city hereafter (v. 16; ch. 12. 22; 13. 14). foundations—Greek, "the foundations" which the tents had not, nor even men's present cities have. whose builder and maker—Greek, "designer" [Ephesians 1. 4, 11] and master-builder," or executor of the design. The city is worthy of its Framers and Builder (cf. v. 16; ch. 8. 2). Cf. "found," Note, ch. 12. 11. also Sara herself—though being the weaker vessel, and though at first she doubted, was delivered of a child—Omitted in the oldest MSS.; then translate, "and that when she was past age" (Romans 4. 19). she judged Him faithful who had promised—after she had ceased to doubt, being instructed by the angel that it was no jest, but a matter in serious earnest. 12. as good as dead—lit., "deadened;" no longer having, as in youth, energetic vital powers. stars . . . sand—(Genesis 22. 17.) 13-16. Summary of the characteristic excellencies of the patriarchs' faith. died in faith—died as believers, waiting for, not actually seeing as yet their good things promised to them. They were true to this principle of faith even unto, and especially in, their dying hour (cf. v. 20). These all—beginning with "Abraham" (v. 8), to whom the promises were made (Galatians 3. 16), and who is alluded to in the end of v. 13 and in v. 15. [BENGEL and ALFORD.] But the "ALL" can hardly but include Abel, Enoch, and Noah. Now as these did not receive the promise of entering literal Canaan, some other promise made in the first ages, and often repeated, must be that meant, viz., the promise of a coming Redeemer made to Adam, viz., "the seed of the woman shall bruise the serpent's head." Thus the promises cannot have been merely temporal, for Abel and Enoch mentioned here received no temporal promise. [ARCHBISHOP MAGEE.] This promise of eternal redemption is the inner essence of the promises made to Abraham (Galatians 3. 16). not having received—It was this that constituted their "faith." If they had "received" THE THING PROMISED (so "the promises" here mean: the plural is used because of the frequent renewal of the promise to the patriarchs: verse 17 says he did receive the promises, but not the thing promised), it would have been sight, not faith. seen them afar off—(John 8. 56.) Christ, as the Word, was preached to the Old Testament believers, and so became the seed of life to their souls, as He is to ours. and were persuaded of them—The oldest MSS. omit this clause. embraced them—as though they were not "afar off," but within reach, so as to draw them to themselves and clasp them in their embrace. TRENCH denies that the Old Testament believers embraced them, for they only saw them afar off: he translates, "saluted them," as the homeward-bound mariner, recognizing from afar the well-known promontories of his native land. ALFORD translates, "greeted them." Jacob's exclamation, "I have waited for thy salvation, O Lord" (Genesis 49. 18), is such a greeting of salvation from afar [DELITZSCH]. confessed . . . were strangers—so Abraham to the children of Heth (Genesis 23. 4); and Jacob to Pharaoh (Genesis 47. 9; Psalm 119. 19). Worldly men hold fast the world; believers sit loose to it. Citizens of the world do not confess themselves "strangers on the earth," pilgrims—Greek, "temporary (lit., by the way) sojourners," on the earth—contrasted with "an heavenly" (v. 16): "our citizenship is in heaven" (Greek: ch. 10. 34; Psalm 119. 54; Philippians 3. 20). "Whosoever professes that he has a Father in heaven, confesses himself a stranger on earth; hence there is in the heart an ardent longing, like that of a child living among strangers, in want and grief, far from his fatherland." [LUTHER.] "Like ships in seas, while in, above the world." 14. For—Proof that "faith" (v. 13) was their actuating principle. declare plainly—make it plainly evident. seek—Greek, "seek after," implying the direction towards which their desires ever tend. a country—rather as Greek, "a fatherland." In confessing themselves strangers here, they evidently imply that they regard not this as their home or fatherland, but seek after another and a better. 15. As Abraham, had he desired to leave his pilgrim life in Canaan, and resume his former fixed habitation in Ur, among the carnal and worldly, had in his long life ample opportunities to have done so; and so spiritually, as to all believers who came out from the world to become God's people, they might, if they had been so minded, have easily gone back. 16. Proving the truth that the old fathers did not, as some assert, "look only for transitory promises" (Article VII., Book of Common Prayer). now—as the case is. is not ashamed—Greek, "is not ashamed of them." Not merely once did God call himself their God, but He is now not ashamed to have Himself called so, they being alive and abiding with Him where He is. For, by the law, God cannot come into contact with anything dead. None remained dead in Christ's presence (Luke 20. 37, 38). He who is Lord and Maker of heaven and earth, and all things therein, when asked, What is thy name? said, omitting all His other titles, "I am the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob." [THEOPHIL.] Not only is He not ashamed, but glories in the name and relation to His people. The "wherefore" does not mean that God's good pleasure is the meritorious, but the gracious, consequence of their obedience (that obedience being the result of His Spirit's work in them in the first instance). He first so "called" Himself, then they so called Him. for—proof of His being "their God," viz., "He hath prepared (in His eternal counsels, Matthew 20. 23; 25. 34, and by the progressive acts of redemption, John 14. 2) for them a city," the city in which He Himself reigns, so that their yearning desires shall not be disappointed (v. 14, 16). a city—on its garniture by God (cf. Revelation 21. 10-27). 17. offered up—lit., "hath offered up," as if the work and its praise were yet enduring. [ALFORD.] As far as His intention was concerned, he did sacrifice Isaac; and in actual fact "he offered him," as far as the presentation of him on the altar as an offering to God is concerned. tried—Greek, "tempted," as in Genesis 22. 1. Put to the proof of his faith. Not that God "tempts" to sin, but God "tempts" in the sense of proving or trying (James 1. 13-15. and—and so. he that had received—rather as Greek, "accepted," i. e., welcomed and embraced by faith, not merely "had the promises," as in ch. 7. 6. This added to the difficulty in the way of his faith, that it was in Isaac's posterity the promises were to be fulfilled; how then could they be fulfilled if Isaac were sacrificed? offered up—rather as Greek, "was offering up;" he was in the act of offering. his only-begotten son—Cf. Genesis 22. 2, "Take now thy son, thine only son." EUSEBIUS, Preparatio Evangelica, 1. 10, and 4. 16, has preserved a fragment of a Greek translation of Sanchoniatho, which mentions a mystical sacrifice of the Phœnicians, wherein a prince in royal robes was the offerer, and his only son was to be the victim: this evidently was a tradition derived from Abraham's offering, and handed down through Esau or Edom, Isaac's son. Isaac was Abraham's "only-begotten son" in respect of Sarah and the promises; he sent away his other sons, by other wives (Genesis 25. 6). Abraham is a type of the Father not sparing His only-begotten Son to fulfil the Divine purpose of love. God nowhere in the Mosaic law allowed human sacrifices, though He claimed the first-born of Israel as His. 18. Of whom—rather as Greek "He (Abraham, not Isaac) to whom it was said." [ALFORD.] BENGEL supports English Version. So ch. 1. 7 uses the same Greek preposition, "unto," for "in respect to," or "of." This verse gives a definition of the "only-begotten Son" (v. 17). in Isaac shall thy seed be called—(Genesis 21. 12.) The posterity of Isaac alone shall be accounted as the seed of Abraham, which is the heir of the promises (Romans 9. 7). 19. Faith answered the objections which reason brought against God's command to Abraham to offer Isaac, by suggesting that what God had promised He both could and would perform, however impossible the performance might seem (Romans 4. 20, 21). able to raise him—rather, in general, “able to raise from the dead.” Cf. Romans 4. 17, “God who quickeneth the dead.” The quickening of Sarah's dead womb suggested the thought of God's power to raise even the dead, though no instance of it had as yet occurred. he received him—“received him back.” [ALFORD.] In a figure—Greek, “in a parable.” ALFORD explains, “Received him back, risen from that death which he had undergone in, under, the figure of the ram.” I prefer with BISHOP PEARSON, ESTIUS, and GREGORY of Nyssa, understanding the figure to be the representation which the whole scene gave to Abraham of Christ in His death (typified by Isaac's offering in intention, and the ram's actual substitution answering to Christ's vicarious death), and in His resurrection (typified by Abraham's receiving him back alive from the jaws of death, cf. 2 Corinthians 1. 9, 10); just as on the day of atonement the slain goat and the scape-goat together formed one joint rite representing Christ's death and resurrection. It was then that Abraham saw Christ's day (John 8. 56): accounting God was able to raise even from the dead: from which state of the dead he received him back as a type of the resurrection in Christ. 20. Jacob is put before Esau, as heir of the chief, viz., the spiritual blessing, concerning things to come—Greek, “even concerning things to come:” not only concerning things present. Isaac, by faith, assigned to his sons things future, as if they were present. 21. both the sons—Greek, “each of the sons” (Genesis 47. 29; 48. 8-20). He knew not Joseph's sons, and could not distinguish them by sight, yet he did distinguish them by faith, transposing his hands intentionally, so as to lay his right hand on the younger, Ephraim, whose posterity was to be greater than that of Manasseh: he also adopted these grandchildren as his own sons, after having transferred the right of primogeniture to Joseph (Genesis 48. 22), and worshipped, &c.—This did not take place in immediate connection with the foregoing, but before it, when Jacob made Joseph swear that he would bury him with his fathers in Canaan, not in Egypt. The assurance that Joseph would do so filled him with pious gratitude to God, which he expressed by raising himself on his bed to an attitude of worship. His faith, as Joseph's (v. 22), consisted in his so confidentially anticipating the fulfilment of God's promise of Canaan to his descendants, as to desire to be buried there as his proper possession, leaning upon the top of his staff—Genesis 47. 31, Hebrew and English Version, “upon the bed's head.” LXX. translate as Paul here. JEROME justly reprobrates the notion of modern Rome, that Jacob worshipped the top of Joseph's staff, having on it an image of Joseph's power, to which Jacob bowed in recognition of the future sovereignty of his son's tribe, the father bowing to the son! The Hebrew, as translated in English Version, sets it aside: the bed is alluded to afterwards (Genesis 48. 2; 49. 33), and it is likely that Jacob turned himself in his bed so as to have his face toward the pillow, Isaiah 38. 2 (there are no bedsteads in the East). Paul by adopting the LXX. version, brings out, under the Spirit, an additional fact, viz., that the aged patriarch used his own (not Joseph's) staff to lean on in worshipping on his bed. The staff, too, was the emblem of his pilgrim state here on his way to his heavenly city (v. 13, 14), wherein God had so wonderfully supported him. Genesis 32. 10, “With my staff I passed over Jordan, and now I am become,” &c. (cf. Exodus 12. 11; Mark 6. 8). In 1 Kings 1. 47, the same thing is said of David's “bowing on his bed,” an act of adoring thanksgiving to God for God's favour to his son before death. He omits the more leading blessing of the twelve sons of Jacob; because “he plucks only the flowers which stand by his way, and leaves the whole meadow fall to his readers.” [DELITZSCH in ALFORD.] 22. when he died—“when dying,” the departing—“the exodus” (Genesis 50. 24, 25). Joseph's eminent position in Egypt did not make him regard it as his home: in faith he looked to God's promise of Canaan being fulfilled, and desired that his bones should rest there; testifying thus (1.) that he had no doubt of his posterity obtaining the promised land, and (2.) that he believed in the resurrection of the body, and the enjoyment in it of the heavenly Canaan. His wish was fulfilled (Joshua 24. 32; Acts 4. 16). 23. parents—So the LXX. have the plural, viz., Amram and Jochebed (Numbers 26. 59); but Exodus 2. 2, the mother alone is mentioned; but doubtless Amram sanctioned all she did, and secrecy being their object, he did not appear prominent in what was done. a proper child—Greek, “a comely child.” Acts 7. 20, “exceeding fair,” Greek, “fair to God.” The “faith” of his parents in saving the child must have had some Divine revelation to rest on (probably at the time of his birth), which marked their “exceeding fair” babe as one whom God designed to do a great work by. His beauty was probably “the sign” appointed by God to assure their faith. the king's commandment—to slay all the males (Exodus 1. 22). 24. So far from faith being opposed to Moses, he was an eminent example of it. [BENGEL.] refused—In believing self-denial, when he might possibly have succeeded at last to the throne of Egypt. Thermutis, Pharaoh's daughter, according to the tradition which Paul under the Spirit sanctions, adopted him, as JOSEPHUS says, with the consent of the king. Josephus states that when a child, he threw on the ground the diadem put on him in jest, a pre-argue of his subsequent formal rejection of Thermutis' adoption of him. Faith made him to prefer the adoption of the King of kings, unseen, and so to choose (v. 25, 26) things, the very last which flesh and blood relish. 25. He balanced the best of the world with the worst of religion, and decidedly chose the latter. “Choosing” implies a deliberate resolution, not a hasty impulse. He was forty years old, a time when the judgment is matured, for a season—If the world has “pleasure” (Greek, “enjoyment”) to offer, it is but for a season; whereas its “pleasures are for evermore.” 26. Esteeming—Inasmuch as he esteemed, the reproach of Christ—i. e., the reproach which falls on the Church, and which Christ regards as His own reproach, He being the Head, and the Church (both of the Old and New Testament) His body. Israel typified Christ; Israel's sufferings were Christ's sufferings (cf. 2 Corinthians 1. 5; Colossians 1. 24). As uncircumcision was Egypt's reproach, so circumcision was the badge of Israel's expectation of Christ, which Moses especially cherished, and which the Gentiles reproached Israel on account of. Christ's people's reproach will ere long be their great glory. had respect unto—Greek, “turning his eyes away from other considerations, he fixed them on the (eternal) recompense” (v. 39, 40). 27. not fearing the wrath of the king—But in Exodus 2. 14 it is said, “Moses feared, and fled from the face of Pharaoh.” He was afraid, and fled from the danger where no duty called him to stay (to have stayed without call of duty would have been to tempt Providence, and to sacrifice his hope of being Israel's future deliverer according to the Divine intimations; his great aim, Note, v. 23). He did not fear the king so as to neglect his duty and not return when God called him. It was in spite of the king's prohibition he left Egypt, not fearing the consequences which were likely to overtake him if he should be caught, after having, in defiance of the king, left Egypt. If he had stayed and resumed his position as adopted son of Pharaoh's daughter, his slaughter of the Egyptian would doubtless have been connived at; but his resolution to take his portion with oppressed Israel, which he could not have done had he stayed, was the motive of his flight, and constituted the “faith” of this act, according to the express statement here. The exodus of Moses with Israel cannot be meant here, for it was made, not in defiance, but by the desire, of the king. Besides, the chronological order would be broken thus, the next particular specified here, viz., the institution of the Passover, having taken place before the exodus. Besides, it is Moses' persona history and faith which are here described. The faith of the people (“they passed”) is not introduced till v. 29. endured—steadfast in faith amidst trials. He had fled, not so much from fear of Pharaoh, as from a revulsion of feeling in finding God's people insensible to their high destiny, and from disappointment at not having been able to inspire them with those hopes for which he had sacrificed all his earthly prospects. This accounts for his strange reluctance and despondency when commissioned by God to go and arouse the people (Exodus 3. 15; 4. 1, 10-12). seeing him . . . invisible—as though he had not to do with men, but only with God, ever before his eyes by faith, though invisible to the bodily eye (Romans 1. 20; 1 Timothy 1. 17; 6. 16). Hence he feared not the wrath of visible man; the characteristic of faith (v. 1; Luke 12. 4, 5). 28. kept—Greek, "hath kept," the Passover being, in Paul's day, still observed. His faith here was his belief in the invisible God's promise that the destroying angel should pass over, and not touch the inmates of the blood-sprinkled houses (Exodus 12. 23). "He acquiesced in the bare word of God where the thing itself was not apparent." [CALVIN.] the first-born—Greek "neuter;" both of man and beast. 29. they—Moses and Israel. Red Sea—called so from its red sea-weed, or rather from Edom (meaning red), whose country adjoined it. which . . . assaying to do—Greek, "of which (Red Sea) the Egyptians having made experiment." Rashness and presumption mistaken by many for faith; with similar rash presumption many rush into eternity. The same thing when done by the believer, and when done by the unbeliever, is not the same thing. [BENGE.] What was faith in Israel, was presumption in the Egyptians. were drowned—Greek, "were swallowed up," or "engulfed." They sank in the sands as much as in the waves of the Red Sea. Cf. Exodus 15. 12, "the earth swallowed them." 30. The soundings of trumpets, though one were to sound for ten thousand years, cannot throw down walls, but faith can do all things. [CHRYSOSTOM.] seven days—whereas sieges often last for years. 31. Rahab showed her "faith" in her confession, Joshua 2. 9, 11, "I know that Jehovah hath given you the land; Jehovah your God, is God in heaven above, and in earth beneath." the harlot—her former life adds to the marvel of her repentance, faith and preservation (Matthew 21. 31, 32). believed not—Greek, "were disobedient," viz., to the will of God manifested by the miracles wrought in behalf of Israel (Joshua 2. 8-11). received—in her house (Joshua 2. 1, 4, 6). with peace—peaceably; so that they had nothing to fear in her house. Thus Paul, quoting the same examples (v. 17, 31) for the power of faith, as James 2. 21, 25; see my notes there) does for justification by works evidently, shows that in maintaining justification by faith alone, he means not a dead faith, but "faith which worketh by love" (Galatians 5. 6). 32. the time—suitable for the length of an Epistle. He accumulates collectively some out of many examples of faith. Gideon—put before Barak, not chronologically, but as being more celebrated. Just as Samson for the same reason is put before Jephthae. The mention of Jephthae as an example of "faith," makes it unlikely he sacrificed the life of his daughter for a rash vow. David, the warrior king and prophet, forms the transition from warrior chiefs to the "prophets," of whom "Samuel" is mentioned as the first. 33. subdued kingdoms—as David did (2 Samuel 8. 1, &c.); so also Gideon subdued Midian (Judges 7). wrought righteousness—as Samuel did (1 Samuel 8. 9; 12. 3-23; 15. 33; and David, 2 Samuel 8. 15). obtained promises—as "the prophets" (v. 32) did; for through them the promises were given (cf. Daniel 9. 21). [BENGE.] Rather, "obtained the fulfilment of promises," which had been previously the object of their faith (Joshua 21. 45; 1 Kings 8. 56). Indeed, Gideon, Barak, &c., also obtained the things which God promised. Not "the promises," which are still future (v. 13, 39). stopped the mouths of lions—Note the words, "because he believed in his God." Also Samson (Judges 14, 6), David (1 Samuel 17. 34-37), Benaiah (2 Samuel 23. 20). 34. Quenched the violence of fire—(Daniel 3. 27.) Not merely "quenched the fire," but "quenched the power (so the Greek) of the fire." Daniel 3. and 6. record the last miracles of the Old Testament. So the martyrs of the Reformation, though not escaping the fire, were delivered from its having power really or lastingly to hurt them.

escaped . . . sword—So Jephthah (Judges 12. 3); and so David escaped Saul's sword (1 Samuel 18. 11; 19. 10, 12); Elijah (1 Kings 19. 1, &c.; 2 Kings 6. 14). out of weakness . . . made strong—Samson (Judges 16. 28; 15. 19), Hezekiah (Isaiah 37. and 38.) Milton says of the martyrs, "They shook the powers of darkness with the irresistible power of weakness." valiant in fight—Barak (Judges 4. 14, 15). And the Maccabees, the sons of Matthias, Judas, Jonathan, and Simon, who delivered the Jews from their cruel oppressor, Antiochus of Syria. armies—lit., camps; referring to Judges 7. 21. But the reference may be to the Maccabees having put to flight the Syrians and other foes. 35. Women received their dead raised—as the widow of Zarephath (1 Kings 17. 17, &c.; 22). The Shunammite (2 Kings 4. 17, &c.; 35). The two oldest MSS. read, "They received women of aliens by raising their dead." 1 Kings 17. 21 shows that the raising of the widow's son by Elijah, led her to the faith, so that he thus took her into fellowship, an alien though she was. Christ, in Luke 4. 26, makes especial mention of the fact that Elijah was sent to an alien from Israel, a woman of Sarepta. Thus Paul may quote this as an instance of Elijah's faith, that at God's command he went to a Gentile city of Sidonia (contrary to Jewish prejudices), and there, as the fruit of faith, not only raised her dead son, but received her as a convert into the family of God, as Vulgate reads. Still, English Version may be the right reading. and—Greek, "but;" in contrast to those raised again to life. tortured—"broken on the wheel." Eleazar (2 Maccabees 6. 18, end; 19. 20, 30). The sufferer was stretched on an instrument like a drum-head, and scourged to death. not accepting deliverance—when offered to them. So the seven brothers, 2 Maccabees 7. 9, 11, 14, 29, 36; and Eleazar, 2 Maccabees 6. 21, 28, 30. "Though I might have been delivered from death, I endure these severe pains, being beaten." a better resurrection—than that of the women's children "raised to life again;" or, than the resurrection which their foes could give them by delivering them from death (Daniel 12. 2; Luke 20. 35; Philippians 3. 11). The fourth of the brethren (referring to Daniel 12. 2) said to King Antiochus, "To be put to death by men, is to be chosen to look onward for the hopes which are of God, to be raised up again by Him; but for thee there is no resurrection to life." The writer of 2 Maccabees expressly disclaims inspiration, which prevents our mistaking Paul's allusion here to it as if it sanctioned the Apocrypha as inspired. In quoting Daniel, he quotes a book claiming inspiration, and so tacitly sanctions that claim. 36. others—of a different class of confessors for the truth (the Greek is different from that for "others," v. 35, alioi, heteroii). trial—testing their faith. imprisonment—as Hanani (2 Chronicles 16. 10), imprisoned by Asa. Micalah, the son of Imlah, by Ahab (1 Kings 22. 26, 27). 37. stoned—as Zechariah, son of Jehoiada (2 Chronicles 24. 20-22; Matthew 23. 35). sawn asunder—as Isaiah was said to have been by Manasseh; but see my Introduction to Isaiah. tempted—by their foes, in the midst of their tortures, to renounce their faith; the most bitter aggravation of them. Or else, by those of their own household, as Job was [ESTIUS]; or by the fiery darts of Satan, as Jesus was in his last trials. [GLASSIUS.] Probably it included all three; they were tempted in every possible way, by friends and foes, by human and satanic agents, by caresses and afflictions, by words and deeds, to forsake God, but in vain, through the power of faith. sword—lit., "they died in the murder of the sword." In v. 34 the contrary is given as an effect of faith, "they escaped the edge of the sword." Both alike are marvelous effects of faith. It both accomplishes great things, and suffers great things, without counting it suffering. [CHRYSOSTOM.] Urijah was so slain by Jehoiakim (Jeremiah 26. 23); and the prophets in Israel (1 Kings 19. 10). in sheep-skins—as Elijah (1 Kings 19. 13, LXX). They were white; as the "goat-skins" were black (cf. Zechariah 13. 4). tortured—Greek, "in evil state. 38. Of whom the world was not worthy—So far from their being unworthy of living in the world, as their exile in deserts, &c., might seem to imply, "the world was not worthy of them." The world, in shutting them out, shut out from itself a source of blessing; such as Joseph proved to Potiphar (Genesis 39, 5), and Jacob to Laban (Genesis 30, 27). In condemning them, the world condemned itself. caves—lit., "chinks." Palestine, from its hilly character, abounds in fissures and caves, affording shelter to the persecuted, as the fifty hid by Obadiah (1 Kings 18, 4, 13) and Elijah (1 Kings 19, 8, 13); and Mattathias and his sons (1 Maccabees 2, 23, 29); and Judas Maccabeus (2 Maccabees 5, 27). 39. having obtained a good report—Greek, "being borne witness of." Though they were so, yet "they received not the promise," i. e., the final completion of "salvation" promised at Christ's coming again (ch. 9, 28); "the eternal inheritance" (ch. 9, 15). Abraham did obtain the very thing promised (ch. 6, 15) in part, viz., blessedness in soul after death, by virtue of faith in Christ about to come; the full blessedness of body and soul shall not be till the full number of the elect shall be accomplished, and all together, no one preceding the other, shall enter on the full glory and bliss. Moreover, in another point of view, "It is probable that some accumulation of blessedness was added to holy souls, when Christ came and fulfilled all things; even as at His burial many rose from the dead, who doubtless ascended to heaven with Him" [FLACIUS in BENJEL] (cf. Note, Ephesians 4, 8). The perfecting of believers in title, and in respect to conscience, took place, once for all, at the death of Christ, by virtue of His being made by death perfect as Saviour. Their perfecting in soul at, and ever after Christ's death, took place, and takes place at their death. But the universal and final perfecting will not take place till Christ's coming. 40. provided—with Divine forethought from eternity (cf. Genesis 22, 8, 14). some better thing for us—(ch. 7, 19)—than they had here. They had not in this world, "apart from us" (so the Greek is for "without us," i. e., they had to wait for us for), the clear revelation of the promised salvation actually accomplished, as we now have it in Christ; in their state beyond the grave their souls also seem to have attained an increase of heavenly bliss on the death and ascension of Christ; and they shall not attain the full and final glory in body and soul (the regeneration of the creature), until the full number of the elect (including us with them) is completed. The Fathers, CHRYSOSTOM, &c., restricted the meaning of v. 39, 40 to this last truth, and I incline to this view. The connection is, "You, Hebrews, may far more easily exercise patience than Old Testament believers; for they had much longer to wait, and are still waiting until the elect are all gathered in; you, on the contrary, have not to wait for them." [ESTIUS.] I think his object in these verses (39, 40) is to warn Hebrew Christians against their tendency to relapse into Judaism. "Though the Old Testament worthies attained such eminence by faith, they are not above us in privileges, but the reverse." It is not we who are perfected with them, but rather they with us. They waited for His coming; we enjoy Him as having come (ch. 1, 1; 2, 3). Christ's death, the means of perfecting what the Jewish law could not perfect, was reserved for our time. Cf. ch. 12, 2, "perfecter (Greek) of our faith." Now that Christ is come, they in soul share our blessedness, being "the spirits of the just made perfect" (ch. 12, 23); so ALFORD; however, see Note there. Ch. 9, 12 shows that the blood of Christ, brought into the heavenly holy place by Him, first opened an entrance into heaven (cf. John 3, 13). Still, the fathers were in blessedness by faith in the Saviour to come, at death (ch. 6, 15; Luke 16, 22).

CHAPTER XII.

VER. 1-29. EXHORTATION TO FOLLOW THE WITNESSES OF FAITH JUST MENTIONED: NOT TO FAINT IN TRIALS: TO REMOVE ALL BITTER ROOTS OF SIN: FOR WE ARE UNDER, NOT A LAW OF TERROR, BUT THE GOSPEL OF GRACE, TO DESPISE WHICH WILL BRING THE HEAVIER PENALTIES, IN PROPORTION TO OUR GREATER PRIVILEGES. 1. we also—as well as those recounted in v. 11. are compassed about—Greek, "have so great a cloud (a numberless multitude above us, like a cloud, 'holy and pellucid,' CLEMENS ALEXANDRINUS) of witnesses surrounding

us." The image is from a "race," an image common even in Palestine from the time of the Græco-Macedonian empire, which introduced such Greek usages as national games. The "witnesses" answer to the spectators pressing round to see the competitors in their contest for the prize (Philippians 3, 14). Those "witnessed of" (Greek, ch. 11, 5, 39) become in their turn "witnesses" in a twofold way: (1.) attesting by their own case the faithfulness of God to His people [ALFORD] (ch. 6, 12), some of them martyrs in the modern sense; (2.) witnessing our struggle of faith; however, this second sense of "witnesses," though agreeing with the image here if it is to be pressed, is not positively, unequivocally, and directly sustained by Scripture. It gives vividness to the image; as the crowd of spectators gave additional spirit to the combatants, so the cloud of witnesses who have themselves been in the same contest, ought to increase our earnestness, testifying, as they do, to God's faithfulness. weight—As corporeal unworldliness was, through a disciplinary diet, laid aside by candidates for the prize in racing; so carnal and worldly lusts, and all, whether from without or within, that would impede the heavenly runner, are the spiritual weight to be laid aside. "Encumbrance," all superfluous weight; the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eye, and the pride of life, and even harmless and otherwise useful things which would positively retard us (Mark 10, 50, the blind man casting away his garment to come to Jesus; 9, 42-48; cf. Ephesians 4, 22; Colossians 3, 9, 10). the sin which doth so easily beset us—Greek, "sin which easily stands around us;" so LUTHER, "which always so clings to us;" "sinful propensity always surrounding us, ever present and ready." [WAHL.] It is not primarily "the sin," &c., but sin in general, with, however, especial reference to "apostasy," against which he had already warned them, as one to which they might gradually be seduced; the besetting sin of the Hebrews, UNBELIEF. with patience—Greek, "in persevering endurance" (ch. 10, 36). On "run" cf. 1 Corinthians 9, 24, 25. 2. Looking unto—lit., "Looking from afar" (Note, ch. 11, 26); fixing the eyes upon Jesus seated on the throne of God. author—"Prince-leader." The same Greek is translated "Captain (of salvation)," ch. 2, 10; "Prince (of life)," Acts 3, 15. Going before us as the Originator of our faith, and the Leader whose matchless example we are to follow always. In this He is distinguished from all those examples of faith in ch. 11. (cf. 1 Corinthians 11, 1). On His "faith" cf. ch. 2, 13; 3, 2. Believers have ever looked to Him (ch. 11, 26; 13, 8). finisher—Greek, "Perfector," referring to ch. 11, 40. of our faith—rather as Greek, "of the faith," including both His faith (as exhibited in what follows) and our faith. He fulfilled the ideal of faith Himself, and so, both as a vicarious offering and an example, He is the object of our faith. for the joy . . . set before him—viz., of presently after sitting down at the right hand of the throne of God; including besides His own personal joy, the joy of sitting there as a Prince and Saviour, to give repentance and remission of sins. The coming joy disarmed of its sting the present pain. cross . . . shame—the great stumbling-block to the Hebrews. "Despised," i. e., disregarded. 3. For—Justifying His exhortation, "Looking unto Jesus," consider—by way of comparison with yourselves, so the Greek. contradiction—unbelief, and every kind of opposition (Acts 28, 19). sinners—Sin assails us. Not sin, but *sinner*s, contradicted Christ. [BENJEL.] be wearied and faint—Greek, "lest ye weary fainting," &c. Cf. Isaiah 49, 4, 5, as a specimen of Jesus not being wearied out by the contradiction and strange unbelief of those among whom He laboured, preaching as never man did, and exhibiting miracles wrought by His inherent power, as none else could do. 4. not yet resisted unto blood—Image from pugilism, as he previously had the image of a race, both being taken from the great national Greek games. Ye have suffered the loss of goods, and been a gazing-stock both by reproaches and afflictions; ye have not shed your blood (Note, ch. 13, 7). "The athlete who hath seen his own blood, and who, though cast down by his opponent, does not let his spirits be cast down, who as often as he hath fallen hath risen the more determined, goes down to the encounter with great hope." [SENECA.] against sin—Sin is personified as an adversary; sin, whether within you, leading you to spare your blood, or in our adversaries, leading them to shed it, if they cannot through your faithfulness even unto blood, induce you to apostatize. 5. forgotten—utterly, so the Greek. Cf. v. 15-17, in which he implies how utterly some of them had forgotten God's word. His exhortation ought to have more effect on you than the cheers and exhortations of the spectators here on the competitors striving in the games. which—Greek, "the which," of which the following is a specimen. [ALFORD.] speaketh unto you—as in a dialogue or discourse, so the Greek, implying God's loving condescension (cf. Isaiah 1. 18). despise not—lit., "Do not hold of little account." Betraying a contumacious spirit of unbelief (ch. 3. 12), as "faint" implies a broken down, weak, and desponding spirit. "Chastening" is to be borne with "subjection" (v. 9); "rebuke" (more severe than chastening) is to be borne with endurance (v. 7). "Some in adversity kick against God's will, others despond; neither is to be done by the Christian, who is peculiarly the child of God. To him such adverse things occur only by the decree of God, and that designed in kindness, viz., to remove the defilements adhering to the believer, and to exercise his patience." [GROTIUS.] 6. (Revelation 3. 19.) and—Greek, "yea and," "and moreover;" bringing out an additional circumstance. scourgeth—which draws forth "blood" (v. 4). receiveth—accepts. Takes to Himself as a son "in whom He delighteth" (Proverbs 3. 12). 7. In v. 7. 8 the need of "chastening" or "discipline" is inculcated; in v. 9, the duty of those to whom it is administered. If—The oldest MSS. read, "With a view to chastening (i. e., since God's chastisement is with a view to your chastening, i. e., disciplinary amelioration) endure patiently;" so Vulgate. ALFORD translates it as indicative, not so well, "It is for chastisement that ye are enduring." dealeth with you—"beareth Himself toward you" in the very act of chastening. what son is he—"What son is there" even in ordinary life? Much more God as to His sons (Isaiah 43. 10; Acts 14. 22). The most eminent of God's saints were the most afflicted. God leads them by a way they know not (Isaiah 42. 16). We too much look at each trial by itself, instead of taking it in connection with the whole plan of our salvation, as if a traveller were to complain of the steepness and roughness of one turn in the path, without considering that it led him into green pastures, on the direct road to the city of habitation. The New Testament alone uses the Greek term for education (paideia), to express "discipline" or correction, as of a child by a wise father. 8. if ye be without—excluded from participation in chastisement, and wishing to be so. all—all sons: all the worthies enumerated in ch. 11.: all the witnesses (v. 1). are—Greek, "have been made partakers." then are ye bastards—of whom their fathers take no care whether they are educated or not; whereas every right-minded father is concerned for the moral well-being of his legitimate son. "Since then not to be chastised is a mark of bastardy, we ought [not to refuse, but] rejoice in chastisement, as a mark of our genuine sonship." [CHRYSOSTOM.] 9. fathers . . . which corrected us—rather as Greek, "We had the fathers of our flesh as correctors." subjection—See the punishment of insubordination, Deuteronomy 21. 18. Father of spirits—contrasted with the fathers of our flesh. "Generation by men is carnal, by God is spiritual." [BENGEL.] As "Father of spirits," He is both the Originator, and the Providential, and Gracious Sustainer, at once of animal and spiritual life. Cf. "and LIVE," viz., spiritually; also v. 10, "that we might be partakers of His holiness" (2 Peter 1. 4). God is a spirit Himself, and the Creator of spirits like Himself, in contrast to men who are flesh, and the progenitors of flesh (John 3. 6). Jesus our pattern "learned obedience" experimentally by suffering (ch. 5. 8). and live—and so, thereby live spiritually and eternally. 10. Showing wherein the chastisement of our heavenly Father is preferable to that of earthly fathers. for a few days—i. e., with a view to our well-being in the few days of our earthly life: so the Greek. after their own pleasure—Greek, "according to what seemed fit to themselves." Their rule of chastening is what may seem fit to their own often erring judgment, temper, or caprice. The two defects of human education are (1.) the prevalence in it of a view to the interests of our short earthly term of days; (2.) the absence in parents of the unerring wisdom of our heavenly Father. "They err much at one time in severity, at another in indulgence [1 Samuel 3. 13; Ephesians 6. 4], and do not so much chasten as THINK they chasten." [BENGEL.] that we might be partakers of his holiness—Becoming holy as He is holy (John 15. 2). To become holy like God is tantamount to being educated for passing eternity with God (v. 14; 2 Peter 1. 4). So this "partaking of God's holiness" stands in contrast to the "few days" of this life, with a view to which earthly fathers generally educate their sons. 11. joyous . . . grievous—Greek, "matter of joy . . . matter of grief." The objection that chastening is grievous is here anticipated and answered. It only seems so to those being chastened, whose judgments are confused by the present pain. Its ultimate fruit amply compensates for any temporary pain. The real object of the fathers in chastening is not that they find pleasure in the children's pain. Gratified wishes, our Father himself, would often be our real courses. fruit of righteousness—righteousness (in practice, springing from faith) is the fruit which chastening, the tree, yields (Philippians 1. 11). "Peaceable" (cf. Isaiah 32. 17): in contrast to the ordeal of conflict by which it has been won. "Fruit of righteousness to be enjoyed in peace after the conflict." [THOULOCK.] As the olive garland, the emblem of peace as well as victory, was put on the victor's brow in the games. exercised thereby—as athletes exercised in training for a contest. Chastisement is the exercise to give experience, and make the spiritual combatant irresistibly victorious (Romans 5. 3). "Oh happy the servant for whose improvement his Lord is earnest, with whom he deigns to be angry, whom He does not deceive by dissembling admonition" [withholding admonition, and so leading the man to think he needs it not! TERTULLIAN, de Pat., c. 11. Observe the "afterwards:" that is the time often when God works. 12. He addresses them as runners in a race, and pugilists, and warriors. [CHRYSOSTOM.] The "wherefore" is resumed from v. 1. lift up—In Isaiah 25. 3, from which Paul here quotes, it is, "Strengthen ye the weak hands." The hand is the symbol of one's strength. ALFORD translates, "Put straight again the relaxed hands." English Version expresses the sense well. feeble—lit., "paralyzed;" a word used only by Luke in the New Testament, Paul's companion. The exhortation has three parts: the first relates to ourselves, v. 12, 13; the second, to others, v. 14, "Peace with all men," the third, to God, "Holiness, without which," &c.; and the first is referred to in v. 15, "Lest any man fail of the grace of God;" the second in the words, "Lest any root of bitterness," &c.; the third in v. 16, "Lest there be any fornicator or profane person," &c. This threefold relation often occurs in Paul's Epistles. Cf. Note, Titus 2. 12, "soberly, righteously, and godly." The Greek active verb, not the middle or reflexive, requires the sense to be, Lift up not only your own hands and knees, but also those of your brethren (cf. v. 15; Isaiah 35. 4). 13. Quoted from Proverbs 4. 26, LXX., "Make straight paths for thy feet." Straight, i. e., leading by a straight road to joy and grace (v. 1. 2, 15). Cease to "halt" between Judaism and Christianity. [BENGEL.] "Paths," lit., wheel-tracks. Let your walk be so firm and so unanimous in the right direction, that a plain track and "highway" may be thereby established for those who accompany and follow you, to perceive and walk in (Isaiah 35. 8). [ALFORD.] that which is lame—those "weak in the faith" (Romans 14. 1), having still Judaizing prejudices. be turned out of the way—(Proverbs 4. 27)—and so missing the way, lose the prize of "the race" (v. 1). rather be healed—Proper exercise of itself contributes to health: the habit of walking straight onward in the right way tends to healing. 14. follow peace with all men—with the brethren especially (Romans 14. 19), that so the "lame" among them be not "turned out of the way" (v. 13), and that no one of them "fall of the grace of God" (v. 15). holiness—a distinct Greek word from God's "holiness" (v. 10). Translate here "sanctification." His is absolute holiness: our part is to put on His holiness, becoming "holy as He is holy," by sanctification. Whilst "following peace with all men," we are not so to seek to please them, as to make God's will and our sanctification a secondary object; this latter must be our first aim (Galatians 1, 10). without which—Greek, "apart from which," no man shall see the Lord—no man as a son; in heavenly glory (Revelations 22, 3, 4). In the East, none but the greatest favourites are admitted to the honour of seeing the king (cf. 2 Samuel 14, 24). The Lord being pure and holy, none but the pure and holy shall see Him (Matthew 5, 8). Without holiness in them, they could not enjoy Him who is holiness itself (Zechariah 14, 20). The connection of purity with seeing the Lord, appears in 1 John 3, 2, 3; Ephesians 5, 5. Contrast v. 16 (cf. 1 Thessalonians 4, 8). In Matthew 24, 30; Revelation 1, 7, it is said that all shall see the Lord; but, that shall be as a Judge, not as their lasting portion and God, which is meant here. The Greek verb does not denote the mere act of seeing, but the seer's state of mind to which the object is presented; so in Matthew 5, 8 they shall truly comprehend God. [TITTMANN.] None but the holy could appreciate the holy God, none else therefore shall abide in His presence. "The bad shall only see Him in His form as Son of man [cf. Revelation 1, 13, with 7; and Matthew 24, 30; Acts 1, 11; 17, 31]; still it will be in the glory in which He shall judge, not in the lowliness in which He was judged. His form as God, wherein He is equal to the Father, without doubt the ungodly shall not see; for it is only 'the pure in heart who shall see God.'" [AUGUSTINE.] "He shall come to judge, who stood before a judge. He shall come in the form in which He was judged, that they may see Him whom they pierced: He who was before hidden shall come manifested in power: He, as Judge, shall condemn the real culprits, who was Himself falsely made a culprit." 15. lest any . . . fail—Greek, "lest any (viz., through sloth in running) fail," or "falling short of the grace of God . . . trouble you." The image is taken from a company of travellers, one of whom lags behind, and so never reaches the end of the long and laborious journey. [CHRYSOSTOM.] root of bitterness—not merely a "bitter root," which might possibly bring forth sweet fruits; this, a root whose essence is "bitterness," never could. Paul here refers to Deuteronomy 29, 18, "Lest there should be among you a root that beareth gall and wormwood" (cf. Acts 8, 23). Root of bitterness comprehends every person (cf. v. 16) and every principle of doctrine or practice so radically corrupt as to spread corruption all around. The only safety is in rooting out such a root of bitterness, many—rather, "the many," i. e., the whole congregation. So long as it is hidden under the earth it cannot be remedied, but when it "springs up," it must be dealt with boldly. Still remember the caution (Matthew 13, 26-30) as to rooting out persons. No such danger can arise in rooting out bad principles. 16. fornicator—(Ch. 13, 4; 1 Corinthians 10, 8.) or profane—Fornication is nearly akin to gluttony, Esau's sin. He profanely cast away his spiritual privilege for the gratification of his palate. Genesis 25, 34 graphically portrays him. An example well fitted to strike needful horror into the Hebrews, whosever of them, like Esau, were only sons of Isaac according to the flesh. [BENGE.] for one morsel—the smallness of the inducement only aggravates the guilt of casting away eternity for such a trifle, so far is it from being a claim for mercy (cf. Genesis 3, 6). One single act has often the greatest power either for good or for evil. So in the cases of Reuben and Saul, for evil (Genesis 49, 4; 1 Chronicles 5, 1; 1 Samuel 13, 12-11); and, on the other hand, for good, Abraham and Phinehas (Genesis 12, 1, &c.; 15, 5, 6; Numbers 25, 6-15). his birth-right—Greek, "his own (so the oldest MSS. read, intensifying the suicidal folly and sin of the act) rights of primogeniture," involving the high spiritual privilege of being ancestor of the promised seed, and heir of the promises in Him. The Hebrews whom Paul addressed, had, as Christians, the spiritual rights of primogeniture

(cf. v. 23): he intimates that they must exercise holy self-control, if they wish not, like Esau, to forfeit them. 17. afterwards—Greek, "even afterward." He despised his birth-right, accordingly also he was despised and rejected when he wished to have the blessing. As in the believer's case, so in the unbeliever's, there is an "afterwards" coming, when the believer shall look on his past griefs, and the unbeliever on his past joys, in a very different light from that in which they were respectively viewed at the time. Cf. "Nevertheless afterward," &c., v. 11, with the "afterward" here. Cf. "the cool of the day," Genesis 3, 8, with 6. when he would—when he wished to have. "He that will not when he may, when he will, shall have nay" (Proverbs 1, 21-30; Luke 13, 34, 35; 19, 42). he was rejected—not as to every blessing, but only that which would have followed the primogeniture. he found no place for repentance—The cause is here put for the effect, "repentance" for the object which Esau aimed at in his so-called repentance, viz., the change of his father's determination to give the chief blessing to Jacob. Had he sought real repentance with tears he would have found it (Matthew 7, 7). But he did not find it, because this was not what he sought. What proves his tears were not those of one seeking true repentance is, immediately after he was foiled in his desire, he resolved to murder Jacob! He shed tears, not for his sin, but for his suffering the penalty of his sin. His were tears of vain regret and remorse, not of repentance. "Before, he might have had the blessing without tears; afterwards, however many tears he shed, he was rejected. Let us use the time" (Luke 18, 27)! [BENGE.] ALFORD explains "repentance" here, a chance, by repenting, to repair (i. e., to regain the lost blessing). I agree with him that the translation, instead of "repentance," "no place for changing HIS FATHER'S mind," is forced; though doubtless this is what was the true aim of the "repentance" which he sought. The language is framed to apply to profane despisers who wilfully cast away grace and seek repentance (i. e., not real; but escape from the penalty of their sin), but in vain. Cf. "afterward," Matthew 25, 11, 12. Tears are no proof of real repentance (1 Samuel 24, 16, 17; contrast Psalm 56, 8). It—the blessing, which was the real object of Esau, though ostensibly seeking "repentance." 18. For—The fact that we are not under the law, but under a higher, and that the last dispensation, the Gospel, with its glorious privileges, is the reason why especially the Hebrew Christians should "look diligently," &c. (v. 15, 16). are not come—Greek, "have not come near to." Alluding to Deuteronomy 4, 11, "Ye came near and stood under the mountain; and the mountain burned with fire . . . with darkness, clouds, and thick darkness." "In your coming near unto God, it has not been to," &c. the mount—The oldest MSS. and Vulgate omit "the mount." But still, "the mount" must be supplied from v. 22. that might be touched—palpable and material. Not that any save Moses was allowed to touch it (Exodus 19, 12, 13). The Hebrews drew near to the material Mount Sinai with material bodies; we, to the spiritual mount in the spirit. The "darkness" was that formed by the clouds hanging round the mount; the "tempest" accompanied the thunder. 19. trumpet—to rouse attention, and herald God's approach (Exodus 19, 16). intentioned that the word should not be spoken—lit., "that speech should not be added to them;" not that they refused to hear the word of God, but they wished that God should not Himself speak, but employ Moses as His mediating spokesman. "The voice of words" was the Decalogue, spoken by God himself, a voice issuing forth, without any form being seen; after which "He added no more" (Deuteronomy 5, 22). 20. that which was commanded—"the interdiction." [TITTMANN.] A stern interdictory mandate is meant. And—rather, "Even if a beast (much more a man) touch," &c. or thrust through with a dart—Omitted in the oldest MSS. The full interdict in Exodus 10, 12, 13 is abbreviated here; the beast alone, being put for "whether man or beast;" the stoning, which applies to the human offender, alone being specified, the beast's punishment, viz., the being thrust through with a dart, being left to be understood. 21. the sight—the vision of God's majesty. quake—Greek, "I am in trembling;" "fear" affected his mind; "trembling," his body. Moses is not recorded in Exodus to have used these words. But Paul, by Inspiration, supplies (cf. Acts 20. 35; 2 Timothy 3. 8) this detail. We read in Deuteronomy 9. 19, LXX., of somewhat like words used by Moses after breaking the two tables, through fear of God's anger at the people's sin in making the golden calves. He doubtless similarly "feared" in hearing the ten commandments spoken by the voice of Jehovah. 22. are come—Greek, "have come near unto" (cf. Deuteronomy 4. 11). Not merely, ye shall come, but, ye have already come. Mount Sion—antitypical Sion, the heavenly Jerusalem, of which the spiritual invisible Church (of which the first foundation was laid in literal Zion, John 12. 15; 1 Peter 2. 6) is now the earnest; and of which the restored literal Jerusalem hereafter shall be the earthly representative, to be succeeded by the everlasting and "new Jerusalem, coming down from God out of heaven" (Revelation 21. 2-27; cf. ch. 11. 10). 22, 23. to an innumerable company of angels, to the general assembly and Church—The city of God having been mentioned, the mention of its citizens follows. Believers being like the angels (Job 1. 6; 33. 7), "sons of God," are so their "equals" (Luke 20. 36); and, being reconciled through Christ, are adopted into God's great and blessed family. For the full completion of this we pray (Matthew 6. 10). English Version arrangement is opposed (1.) by "and" always beginning each new member of the whole sentence; (2.) "general assembly and Church," form a kind of tautology; (3.) "general assembly," or rather, "festal full assembly," "the jubilant full company" (such as were the Olympic games, celebrated with joyous singing, dancing, &c.), applies better to the angels above, ever hymning God's praises, than to the Church, of which a considerable part is now militant on earth. Translate therefore, "To myriads (ten thousands, cf. Deuteronomy 33. 2; Psalm 68. 17; Daniel 7. 10; Jude 14; namely), the full festal assembly of angels, and the Church of the first-born." Angels and saints together constitute the ten thousands. Cf. "all angels, all nations" Matthew 25. 31, 32. Messiah is pre-eminently "the First-born," or "First-begotten" (ch. 1. 6), and all believers become so by adoption. Cf. the type, Leviticus 3. 12, 45, 50; 1 Peter 1. 18. As the kingly and priestly succession was in the first-born, and as Israel was God's "first-born" (Exodus 4. 22; cf. 13. 2), and a "kingdom of priests" to God (Exodus 19. 6), so believers (Revelation 1. 6), written in heaven—enrolled as citizens there. All those who at the coming of "God the Judge of all" (which clause therefore naturally follows), shall be found "written in heaven," i. e., in the Lamb's book of life. Though still fighting the good fight on earth, still, in respect to your destiny, and present life of faith which substantiates things hoped for, ye are already members of the heavenly citizenship. "We are one citizenship with angels; to which it is said in the psalm, Glorious things are spoken of thee, thou city of God." [AUGUSTINE.] I think ALFORD wrong in restricting "the Church of the first-born written in heaven," to those militant on earth; it is rather, all those who at the Judge's coming shall be found written in heaven (the true patent of heavenly nobility; contrast "written in the earth," Jeremiah 17. 13, and Esau's profane sale of his birth-right, v. 16); these all, from the beginning to the end of the world, forming one Church to which every believer is already come. The first-born of Israel were "written" in a roll (Numbers 3. 40). the spirits of just men made perfect—at the resurrection, when the "JUDGE" shall appear, and believers' bliss shall be consummated by the union of the glorified body with the spirit; the great hope of the New Testament (Romans 8. 20-23; 1 Thessalonians 4. 16). The place of this clause after "the JUDGE of ALL," is my objection to BENGEL and ALFORD's explanation, the souls of the just in their separate state perfected. Cf. (Note) ch. 11. 39, 40, to which he refers here, and which I think confirms my view; those heretofore spirits, but now to be perfected by being clothed upon with the body. Still the phrase, "spirits of just men made perfect," not merely "just men made perfect," may favour the reference to the happy spirits in their separate state. The Greek is not "the perfected spirits," but 'the spirits of the perfected just.' In no other passage are the just said to be perfected before the resurrection, and the completion of the full number of the elect (Revelation 6. 11); I think, therefore, "spirits of the just," may here be used to express the just whose predominant element in their perfected state shall be spirit. So spirit and spirits are used of a man or men in the body, under the influence of the spirit, the opposite of flesh (John 3. 6). The resurrection bodies of the saints shall be bodies in which the spirit shall altogether preponderate over the animal soul (Note, 1 Corinthians 15. 44). 24. new—Not the usual term (kaine) applied to the Christian covenant (ch. 9. 15), which would mean new as different from, and superseding the old; but Greek new, recent, lately established, having the freshness of youth, as opposed to age. The mention of Jesus, the Perfector of our faith (v. 2), and Himself perfected through sufferings and death, in His resurrection and ascension (ch. 2. 10; 5. 9), is naturally suggested by the mention of "the just made perfect" at their resurrection (cf. ch. 7. 22). Paul uses "Jesus," dwelling here on Him as the Person realized as our loving friend, not merely in His official character as the Christ, and to the blood of sprinkling—here enumerated as distinct from "Jesus." BENGEL reasonably argues as follows: His blood was entirely "poured out" of His body by the various ways in which it was shed, His bloody sweat, the crown of thorns, the scourging, the nails, and after death the spear, just as the blood was entirely poured out and extravasated from the animal sacrifices of the law. It was incorruptible (1 Peter 1. 18, 19). No Scripture states it was again put into the Lord's body. At His ascension, as our great High Priest, He entered the heavenly holiest place "by His own blood" (not after shedding His blood, nor with the blood in His body, but), carrying it separately from his body (cf. the type, ch. 9. 7, 12, 25; 13. 11). Paul does not say, By the efficacy of His blood, but, "By His own proper blood" (ch. 9. 12); not MATERIAL blood, but "the blood of Him who, through the eternal Spirit, offered Himself without spot unto God" (ch. 9. 14). So in ch. 10. 20, the Son of God and the blood of the covenant wherewith (the professor) was sanctified, are mentioned separately. Also in ch. 13. 12, 20; also cf. ch. 10. 19, with 21. So in the Lord's Supper (1 Corinthians 10. 16; 11. 24-26), the body and blood are separately represented. The blood itself, therefore, continues still in heaven before God, the perpetual ransom-price of "the eternal covenant" (ch. 13. 20). Once for all Christ sprinkled the blood peculiarly for us at His ascension (ch. 9. 12). But it is called "the blood of sprinkling," on account also of its continued use in heaven, and in the consciences of the saints on earth (ch. 9. 14; 10. 22; Isaiah 52. 15). This sprinkling is analogous to the sprinkled blood of the Passover. Cf. Revelation 5. 6, "In the midst of the throne, a Lamb as it had been slain." His glorified body does not require meat, nor the circulation of the blood. His blood introduced into heaven took away the dragon's right to accuse. Thus Rome's theory of concomitancy of the blood with the body, the excuse for giving only the bread to the laity, falls to the ground. The mention of "the blood of sprinkling" naturally follows the mention of the "covenant," which could not be consecrated without blood (ch. 9. 18, 22). speaketh better things than that of Abel—viz., than the sprinkling (the best MSS. read the article masculine, which refers to "sprinkling," not to "blood," which last is neuter) of blood by Abel in his sacrifice spake. This comparison between two things of the same kind (viz., Christ's sacrifice, and Abel's sacrifice) is more natural, than between two things different in kind and in results (viz., Christ's sacrifice, and Abel's own blood [ALFORD], which was not a sacrifice at all), cf. ch. 11. 4; Genesis 4. 4. This accords with the whole tenor of the Epistle, and of this passage in particular (v. 18-22), which is to show the superiority of Christ's sacrifice and the new covenant, to the Old Testament sacrifices (of which Abel's is the first recorded; it, moreover, was testified to by God as acceptable to Him above Cain's), cf. ch. 9. and 10. The word "better" implies superiority to something that is good; but Abel's own blood was not at all good for the purpose for which Christ's blood was efficacious; nay, it cried for vengeance. So ARCHBISHOP MAGEE, HAMMOND, and KNATCHBULL. BENGEI takes "the blood of Abel" as put for all the blood shed on earth crying for vengeance, and greatly increasing the other cries raised by sin in the world; counteracted by the blood of Christ calmly speaking in heaven for us, and from heaven to us. I prefer MAGEE'S view. Be this as it may, to deny that Christ's atonement is truly a propitiation, overthrows Christ's priesthood, makes the sacrifices of Moses' law an unmeaning mummery, and represents Calm's sacrifice as good as that of Abel. 25. refuse not—through unbelief. him that speaketh—God in Christ. As the blood of sprinkling is represented as speaking to God for us, v. 24; so here God is represented as speaking to us (ch. 1. 1, 2). His word now is the prelude of the last "shaking" of all things (v. 27). The same word which is heard in the Gospel from heaven, will shake heaven and earth (v. 26). who refused him—Greek, "refusing as they did." Their seemingly submissive entreaty that the word should not be spoken to them by God any more (v. 19), covered over refractory hearts, as their subsequent deeds showed (ch. 3. 16). that spake—revealing with oracular warnings His Divine will: so the Greek. if we turn away—Greek, "we who turn away." The word implies greater refractoriness than "refused," or "declined." Him that speaketh from heaven—God, by His Son in the Gospel, speaking from His heavenly throne. Hence, in Christ's preaching frequent mention is made of "the kingdom of the heavens" (Greek, Matthew 3. 2). In the giving of the law God spake on earth (viz., Mount Sinai) by angels (ch. 2. 2; cf. ch. 1. 2). In Exodus 20. 22, when God says, "I talked with you from heaven," this passage in Hebrews shows that not the highest heavens, but the visible heavens, the clouds and darkness, are meant, out of which God by angels proclaimed the law on Sinai. 26. they shook—when He gave the law on Sinai. now—under the Gospel. promised—the announcement of His coming to break up the present order of things, is to the ungodly a terror, to the godly a promise, the fulfilment of which they look for with joyful hope. Yet once more—Cf. my Notes, Haggai 2. 6, 21, 22, both which passages are condensed into one here. The shaking began at the first coming of Messiah; it will be completed at His second coming, prodigies in the world of nature accompanying the overthrow of all kingdoms that oppose Messiah. The Hebrew is little, "it is yet one little," i. e., a single brief space till the series of movements begins ending in the advent of Messiah. Not merely the earth, as at the establishment of the Sinaitic covenant, but heaven also is to be shaken. The two advents of Messiah are regarded as one, the complete shaking belonging to the second advent, of which the presage was given in the shakings at the first advent: the convulsions connected with the overthrow of Jerusalem shadowing forth those about to be at the overthrow of all the God-opposed kingdoms by the coming Messiah. 27. this word, Yet once more—So Paul, by the Spirit, sanctions the LXX. rendering of Haggai 2. 6, giving an additional feature to the prophecy in the Hebrew, as rendered in English Version, not merely that it shall be in a little while, but that it is to be "once more" as the final act. The stress of his argument is on the "ONCE." Once for all: once and for ever. "In saying 'once more,' the Spirit implies that something has already passed, and something else shall be which is to remain, and is no more to be changed to something else; for the once is exclusive, i. e., not many times." [ESTIUS.] those things that are shaken—the heaven and the earth. As the shaking is to be total, so shall the removal be, making way for the better things that are unremovable. Cf. the Jewish economy (the type of the whole present order of things) giving way to the new and abiding covenant: the forerunner of the everlasting state of bliss. as of things . . . made—viz., of this present visible creation: cf. 2 Corinthians 5. 1; and ch. 9. 11, "made with hands . . . of this creation," i. e., things so made at creation that they would not remain of themselves, but be removed. The new abiding heaven and earth are also made by God, but they are of a higher nature than the material creation, being made to partake of the Divine nature of Him who is not made: so in this relation, as one with the uncreated God, they are regarded as not of the same class as the things made. The things made in the former sense do not remain; the things of the new heaven and earth, like the uncreated God, "shall REMAIN before God" (Isaiah 66. 22). The Spirit, the seed of the new and heavenly being, not only of the believer's soul, but also of the future body, is an uncreated and immortal principle. 28. receiving—as we do, in prospect and sure hope, also in the possession of the Spirit the first-fruits. This is our privilege as Christians. let us have grace—"let us have thankfulness." [ALFORD after CHRYSOSTOM.] But (1.) this translation is according to classical Greek, not Paul's phraseology for "to be thankful." (2.) "To God" would have been in that case added. (3.) "Whereby we may serve God," suits the English Version "grace" (i. e., Gospel grace, the work of the Spirit, producing faith exhibited in erving God), but does not suit "thankfulness." acceptably—Greek, "well-pleasingly." reverence and godly fear—The oldest MSS. read, "reverent caution and fear." Reverent caution (same Greek as in ch. 5. 7; see Note there) lest we should offend God, who is of purer eyes than to behold iniquity. Fear lest we should bring destruction on ourselves. 29. Greek, "For even:" "for also:" introducing an additional solemn incentive to diligence. Quoted from Deuteronomy 4. 24. our God—In whom we hope, is also to be feared. He is love; yet there is another side of his character, God has wrath against sin (ch. 10. 27, 31).

CHAPTER XIII.

Ver. 1-25. EXHORTATION TO VARIOUS GRACES, ESPECIALLY CONSTANCY IN FAITH, FOLLOWING JESUS AMIDST REPROACHES. CONCLUSION, WITH PIECES OF INTELLIGENCE AND SALUTATIONS. 1. brotherly love—a distinct special manifestation of "charity" or "love" (2 Peter 1. 7). The Church of Jerusalem, to which in part this Epistle was addressed, was distinguished by this grace, we know from Acts (cf. ch. 6. 10; 10. 32-34; 12. 12, 13). continue charity will itself continue. See that it continue with you. 2. Two manifestations of "brotherly love," hospitality, and care for those in bonds. Be not forgetful—Implying it was a duty which they all recognized, but which they might forget to act on (v. 3, 7, 16). The enemies of Christianity themselves have noticed the practice of this virtue among Christians. [JULIAN, Ep. 49.] entertained angels unawares—Abraham and Lot did so (Genesis 18. 2; 19. 1). To obviate the natural distrust felt of strangers, Paul says, an unknown guest may be better than he looks: he may be unexpectedly found to be as much a messenger of God for good, as the angels (whose name means messenger) are; nay more, if a Christian, he represents Christ Himself. There is a play on the same Greek word, Be not forgetful and unaware; let not the duty of hospitality to strangers escape you; for, by entertaining strangers, it has escaped the entertainers that they were entertaining angels. Not unconscious and forgetful of the duty, they have unconsciously brought on themselves the blessing. 3. Remember—In prayers and acts of kindness. bound with them—by virtue of the unity of the members in the body under one Head, Christ (1 Corinthians 12. 26). suffer adversity—Greek, "are in evil state," being yourselves also in the body—and so liable to the adversities incident to the natural body, which ought to dispose you the more to sympathize with them, not knowing how soon your own turn of suffering may come. "One experiences adversity almost his whole life, as Jacob; another in youth, as Joseph; another in manhood, as Job; another in old age." [BENGEI.] 4. is—translate, "Let marriage be treated as honourable;" as v. 5 also is an exhortation. In all—"In the case of all men;" "among all." "To avoid fornication let EVERY MAN have his own wife" (1 Corinthians 7. 2). Judaism and Gnosticism combined were soon about to throw discredit on marriage. The venerable Paphnutius, in the Council of Nice, quoted

this verse for the justification of the married state. If one does not himself marry, he should not prevent others from doing so. Others, especially Romanists, translate, "In all things," as in v. 18. But the warning being against lasciviousness, the contrast to "whoremongers and adulterers" in the parallel clause, requires the "in all" in this clause to refer to persons. the bed undefiled—translate, as Greek requires "undefiled" to be a predicate, not an epithet, "And let the bed be undefiled." God will judge—Most whoremongers escape the notice of human tribunals; but God takes particular cognizance of those whom man does not punish. Gay immoralities will then be regarded in a very different light from what they are now. 5. conversation—"manner of life." The love of filthy lust and the love of filthy lucre follow one another as closely akin, both alienating the heart from the Creator to the creature, such things as ye have—lit., "present things" (Philippians 4. 11). I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee—A promise tantamount to this was given to Jacob (Genesis 28. 15), to Israel (Deuteronomy 31. 6, 8), to Joshua (Joshua 1. 5), to Solomon (1 Chronicles 28. 20). It is therefore like a Divine adage. What was said to them, extends also to us. He will neither withdraw His presence ("never leave thee") nor His help ("nor forsake thee"). [BENGEL.] 6. may—rather as Greek, expressing confidence actually realized, "So that we boldly (confidently) say" (Psalm 56. 4. 11; 118. 6). Punctuate as both the Hebrew and the Greek require, "And (so) I will not fear: what (then) shall man do unto me?" 7. Remember—so as to imitate; not to invoke in prayer, as Rome teaches. have the rule—rather, "who have had the rule over you;" your spiritual leaders. who—Greek, "the which;" such persons as. who have spoken unto you—"spake" (so the Greek aorist means) during their lifetime. This Epistle was among those later written, when many of the heads of the Jerusalem Church had passed away. whose faith—even unto death; probably death by martyrdom, as in the case of the instances of faith in ch. 11. 35. Stephen, James the brother of our Lord and bishop of Jerusalem, as well as James the brother of John (Acts 12. 2), in the Palestinian Church, which Paul addresses, suffered martyrdom. considering—Greek, "looking up to," "diligently contemplating all over," as an artist would a model. the end—the termination, at death. The Greek is used of decease (Luke 9. 31; 2 Peter 1. 15). of their conversation—"manner of life;" "religious walk" (Galatians 1. 13; Ephesians 4. 22; 1 Timothy 4. 12; James 3. 13). Considering how they manifested the soundness of their faith by their holy walk, which they maintained even to the end of that walk (their death by martyrdom). 9. This verse is not, as some read it, in apposition with "the end of their conversation" (v. 8), but forms the transition. "Jesus Christ, yesterday and to-day (i. e.) the same, and (shall be the same) unto the ages" (i. e., unto all ages). The Jesus Christ (the full name being given, to mark with affectionate solemnity both His person and His office) who supported your spiritual rulers through life even unto their end "yesterday" (in times past), being at once "the Author and the Finisher of their faith" (ch. 12. 2), remains still the same Jesus Christ "to-day," ready to help you also, if like them you walk by "faith" in Him. Cf. "this same Jesus," Acts 1. 11. He who yesterday (proverbial for the past time) suffered and died, is to-day in glory (Revelation 1. 18). "As night comes between yesterday and to-day, and yet night itself is swallowed up by yesterday and to-day, so the suffering did not so interrupt the glory of Jesus Christ which was of yesterday, and that which is to-day, as not to continue to be the same. He is the same yesterday, before He came into the world, and to-day, in heaven. Yesterday in the time of our predecessors, and to-day in our age." [BENGEL.] So the doctrine is the same, not variable: this verse thus forms the transition between v. 7 and 9. He is always "the same" (ch. 1. 12). The same in the Old and in New Testament. 9. about—rather, as oldest MSS. read, "carried aside;" viz., cf. Ephesians 4. 14. divers—differing from the one faith in the one and the same Jesus Christ, as taught by them who had the rule over you (v. 7). strange—foreign to the truth.

doctrines—"teachings," established with grace; not with meats—not with observances of Jewish distinctions between clean and unclean meats, to which ascetic Judaizers added in Christian times the rejection of some meats, and the use of others: noticed also by Paul in 1 Corinthians 8. 8, 13; 6. 13. Romans 14. 17, an exact parallel to this verse: these are some of the "divers and strange doctrines" of the previous sentence. Christ's body offered once for all for us, is our true spiritual "meat" to "eat" (v. 10), "the stay and the staff of bread" (Isaiah 3. 1), the mean of all "grace." which have not profited—Greek, "in which they who walked were not profited;" viz., in respect to justification, perfect cleansing of the conscience, and sanctification. Cf. on "walked," Acts 21. 21; viz., with superstitious scrupulosity, as though the worship of God in itself consisted in such legal observances. 10. Christianity and Judaism are so totally distinct, that "they who serve the (Jewish) tabernacle," have no right to eat our spiritual Gospel meat, viz., the Jewish priests, and those who follow their guidance in serving the ceremonial ordinance. He says, "Serve the tabernacle," not "serve IN the tabernacle." Contrast with this servile worship ours. an altar—the cross of Christ, whereon His body was offered. The Lord's table represents this altar, the cross; as the bread and wine represent the sacrifice offered on it. Our meat, which we by faith spiritually eat, is the flesh of Christ, in contrast to the typical ceremonial meats. The two cannot be combined (Galatians 5. 2). That not a literal eating of the sacrifice of Christ is meant in the Lord's Supper, but a spiritual is meant, appears from comparing v. 9 with 10, "with GRACE, NOT with MEATS." 11, 12. For just as "the bodies of those beasts whose blood is brought into the sanctuary by, &c., are burned without the camp," so "Jesus also that, &c., suffered without the gate" of ceremonial Judaism, of which His crucifixion outside the gate of Jerusalem is a type. for—reason why they who serve the tabernacle, are excluded from share in Christ; because His sacrifice is not like one of those sacrifices in which they had a share, but answers to one which was "wholly burned" outside (the Greek is "burnt completely," "consumed by burning"), and which consequently they could not eat of. Leviticus 6. 30, gives the general rule, "No sin offering whereof any of the blood is brought into the tabernacle of the congregation to reconcile withal in the holy place, shall be eaten; it shall be burnt in the fire." The sin offerings are twofold, the outward, whose blood was sprinkled on the outward altar, and of whose bodies the priests might eat, and the inward, the reverse. the sanctuary—here the Holy of holies, into which the blood of the sin offering was brought on the day of atonement. without the camp—in which were the tabernacle and Levitical priests and legal worshippers, during Israel's journey through the wilderness; replaced afterwards by Jerusalem (containing the temple), outside of whose walls Jesus was crucified. 12. Wherefore Jesus—In order that the Antitype might fulfil the type. sanctify—Though not brought into the temple "sanctuary" (v. 11), His blood has been brought into the heavenly sanctuary, and "sanctifies the people" (ch. 2. 11, 17), by cleansing them from sin, and consecrating them to God. his own—not blood of animals. without the gate—of Jerusalem; as if unworthy of the society of the covenant people. The fiery ordeal of His suffering on the cross, answers to the burning of the victims; thereby His mere fleshy life was completely destroyed, as their bodies were; the second part of His offering was His carrying His blood into the heavenly holiest before God at His ascension, that it should be a perpetual atonement for the world's sin. 13. therefore—this "therefore" breathes the deliberate fortitude of believers. [BENGEL.] without the camp—"outside the legal polity" [THEODORE] of Judaism (cf. v. 11). "Faith considers Jerusalem itself as a camp, not a city." [BENGEL.] He contrasts with the Jews, who serve an earthly sanctuary, the Christians to whom the altar in heaven stands open, whilst it is closed against the Jews. As Jesus suffered without the gate, so spiritually must those who desire to belong to Him, withdraw from the earthly Jerusalem and its sanctuary, as from this world in general. There is a reference to Exodus 33.7, when the tabernacle was moved without the camp, which had become polluted by the people's idolatry of the golden calves; so that "every one who sought the Lord went out unto the tabernacle of the congregation (as Moses called the tabernacle outside the camp), which was without the camp;" a lively type of what the Hebrews should do, viz., come out of the carnal worship of the earthly Jerusalem to worship God in Christ in spirit, and of what we all ought to do, viz., come out from all carnalism, worldly formalism, and mere sensuous worship, and know Jesus in His spiritual power apart from worldliness, seeing that "we have no continuing city" (v. 14). bearing—as Simon of Cyrene did. his reproach—the reproach which He bore, and which all His people bear with Him. 14. here—on earth. Those Hebrews who clung to the earthly sanctuary are representatives of all who cling to this earth. The earthly Jerusalem proved to be no "abiding city," having been destroyed shortly after this Epistle was written, and with it fell the Jewish civil and religious polity; a type of the whole of our present earthly order of things soon to perish. one to come—(Ch. 2. 5; 11. 10, 14, 16; 12. 22; Philippians 3. 20.) 15. As the "altar" was mentioned in v. 10, so the "sacrifices" here (cf. 1 Peter 2. 5, viz., praise and doing good, v. 16). Cf. Psalm 119. 108; Romans 12. 1. By him—as the Mediator of our prayers and praises (John 14. 13, 14); not by Jewish observances (Psalm 50. 14, 23; 69. 30, 31; 107. 22; 116. 17). It was an old saying of the rabbis, "At a future time all sacrifices shall cease, but praises shall not cease." praise—for salvation. continually—not merely at fixed seasons, as those on which the legal sacrifices were offered, but throughout all our lives. fruit of our lips—(Isaiah 57. 19; Hosea 14. 2.) giving thanks—Greek, "confessing." BEN-GEL remarks, the Hebrew, Todah, is beautifully emphatic. It literally means acknowledgment or confession. In praising a creature, we may easily exceed the truth; but in praising God we have only to go on confessing what He really is to us. Hence it is impossible to exceed the truth, and here is genuine praise. 16. But—But the sacrifice of praise with the lips (v. 15) is not enough; there must be also doing good (beneficence) and communicating (i. e., imparting a share of your means, Galatians 6. 6) to the needy. with such—and not mere ritualistic sacrifices. 17. Obey them that have the rule over you—(Cf. v. 7, 24.) This threefold mention of the rulers is peculiar to this Epistle. In other Epistles Paul includes the rulers in his exhortations. But here the address is limited to the general body of the Church, in contrast to the rulers to whom they are charged to yield reverent submission. Now this is just what might be expected when the apostle of the Gentiles was writing to the Palestine Christians, among whom James and the eleven apostles had exercised a more immediate authority. It was important he should not seem to set himself in opposition to their guides, but rather strengthen their hands; he claims no authority directly or indirectly over these rulers themselves. [BRKS.] "Remember" your deceased rulers (v. 7): "Obey" your living rulers; nay, more, not only obey in cases where no sacrifice of self is required, and where you are persuaded they are right (so the Greek, for "obey"), but "submit yourselves" as a matter of dutiful yielding, when your judgment and natural will incline you in an opposite direction, they—on their part; so the Greek. As they do their part, so do you yours. So Paul exhorts, 1 Thessalonians 5. 12, 13. watch—"are vigilant" (Greek). for—Greek, "in behalf of," must give account—The strongest stimulus to watchfulness (Mark 13. 34-37). CHRYSOSTOM was deeply struck with these words, as he tells us, De Sacerdotio, B. 6, "The fear of this threat continually agitates my soul." do it—"watch for your soul's eternal salvation." It is a perilous responsibility for a man to have to give account for others' deeds, who is not sufficient for his own. [ESRUS, from AQUINAS.] I wonder whether it be possible that any of the rulers should be saved. [CHRYSOSTOM.] Cf. Paul's address to the elders, Acts 20. 28; 1 Corinthians 4. 1-5, where also he connects ministers' responsibility with the account to be hereafter given (cf. 1 Peter 5. 4). with joy—at your obedience; anticipating, too, that you shall be their "joy" in the day of giving account (Philippians 4. 1). not with grief—at your disobedience; apprehending also that in the day of account you may be among the lost, instead of being their crown of rejoicing. In giving account, the stewards are liable to blame if aught be lost to the Master. "Mitigate their toil by every office of attention and respect, that with alacrity, rather than with grief, they may fulfil their duty, arduous enough in itself, even though no unpleasantness be added on your part." [GROTIUS.] that—Grief in your pastors is unprofitable for you, for it weakens their spiritual power; nay, more, "the groans (so the Greek for 'grief') of other creatures are heard; how much more of pastors!" [BENGE] so God will be provoked to avenge on you their "groaning" (Greek). If they must render God an account of their negligence, so must you for your ingratitude to them. [GROTIUS.] 18. Pray for us—Paul usually requests the Church's intercessions for him in closing his Epistles, just as he begins with assuring them of his having them at heart in his prayers (but in this Epistle not till v. 20, 21), Romans 15. 30. "Us," includes both himself and his companions; he passes to himself alone, v. 19. we trust we have a good conscience—in spite of your former jealousies, and the charges of my Jewish enemies at Jerusalem, which have been the occasion of my imprisonment at Rome. In refutation of the Jews' aspersions, he asserts in the same language as here his own conscientiousness before God and man, Acts 23. 1-3; 24. 16, 20, 21 (wherein he virtually implies, that his reply to Ananias was not sinful impatience; for, indeed, it was a prophecy which he was inspired at the moment to utter, and which was fulfilled soon after). we trust—Greek, "we are persuaded," in the oldest MSS. Good conscience produces confidence, where the Holy Spirit rules the conscience (Romans 9. 1). honestly—"in a good way." The same Greek word as "good conscience." Lit., rightly, becomingly. 19. the rather—Greek, "I the more abundantly beseech you." to do this—to pray for me, that I may be restored to you—(Philemon 22.) It is here first in the letter he mentions himself, in a way so unobtrusive, as not to prejudice his Hebrew readers against him, which would have been the result had he commenced this as his other Epistles, with authoritatively announcing his name and apostolic commission. 20. Concluding prayer. God of peace—So Paul, Romans 15. 33; 16. 20; 2 Corinthians 13. 11; Philippians 4. 9; 1 Thessalonians 5. 23; 2 Thessalonians 3. 16. The Judaizing of the Hebrews was calculated to sow seeds of discord among them, of disobedience to their pastors (v. 17), and of alienation towards Paul. The God of peace by giving unity of true doctrine, will unite them in mutual love. brought again from the dead—Greek, "brought up," &c.: God brought the Shepherd; the Shepherd shall bring the flock. Here only in the Epistle he mentions the resurrection. He would not conclude without mentioning the connecting link between the two truths mainly discussed; the one perfect sacrifice and the continual priestly intercession—the depth of His humiliation and the height of His glory—the "altar" of the cross and the ascension to the heavenly Holy of holies great—(Ch. 4. 14.) Shepherd of the sheep—A title familiar to his Hebrew readers, from their Old Testament (Isaiah 63. 11; LXX.); primarily Moses, antitypically Christ; already compared together, ch. 3. 2-7. The transition is natural from their earthly pastors (v. 17), to the Chief Pastor, as in 1 Peter 5. 1-4. Cf. Ezekiel 34. 23 and Jesus' own words, John 10. 2, 11, 14. through the blood—Greek, "in," in virtue of the blood (ch. 2. 9); it was because of His bloody death for us, that the Father raised and crowned Him with glory. The "blood" was the seal of the everlasting covenant entered into between the Father and Son; in virtue of the Son's blood, first Christ was raised, then Christ's people shall be so (Zechariah 9. 11, seemingly referred to here; Acts 20. 28). everlasting—the everlastingness of the covenant necessitated the resurrection. This clause, "the blood of the everlasting covenant," is a summary retrospect of the Epistle (cf. ch. 9. 12). Lord Jesus—the title marking His person and His Lordship over us. But v. 21, "through Jesus Christ." His office, as the Anointed of the Spirit, making Him the medium of communicating the Spirit to us, the holy unction flowing down from the Head on the members (cf. Acts 2. 36). 21. Make you perfect—properly said of healing a rent; join you together in perfect harmony. [BENGEL.] to do his will, working in you—(Ch. 10. 36)—rather as Greek, "doing in you." Whatever good we do, God does in us. well-pleasing in his sight—(Isalah 53. 10; Ephesians 5. 10.) through Jesus Christ—"God doing (working) in you that, &c., through Jesus Christ" (Philippians 1. 11). to whom—to Christ. He closes as he began (ch. 1.), with giving glory to Christ. 22. suffer the word—The Hebrews not being the section of the Church assigned to Paul (but the Gentiles), he uses gentle entreaty, rather than authoritative command. few words—compared with what might be said on so important a subject. Few, in an Epistle which is more of a treatise than an Epistle (cf. 1 Peter 5. 12). On the seeming inconsistency with Galatians 6. 11, cf. Note there. 23. our brother Timothy—So Paul, 1 Corinthians 4. 17; 2 Corinthians 1. 1; Colossians 1. 1; 1 Thessalonians 3. 2. is set at liberty—from prison. So Aristarchus was imprisoned with Paul. BIRKS translates, "dismissed," "sent away," viz., on a mission to Greece, as Paul promised (Phillip-plans 2. 19). However, some kind of previous detention is implied before his being let go to Philippi. Paul, though now at large, was still in Italy, whence he sends the salutations of Italian Christians (v. 24), waiting for Timothy to join him, so as to start for Jerusalem: we know from 1 Timothy 1. 3, he and Timothy were together at Ephesus after his departing from Italy eastward. He probably left Timothy there and went to Philippi as he had promised. Paul implies that if Timothy shall not come shortly, he will start on his journey to the Hebrews at once. 24. all—The Scriptures are intended for all, young and old, not merely for ministers. Cf. the different classes addressed, "wives," Ephesians 5. 22; little children, 1 John 2. 18; "all," 1 Peter 3. 8; 5. 5. He says here "all," for the Hebrews whom he addresses were not all in one place, though the Jerusalem Hebrews are chiefly addressed. They of Italy—not merely the brethren at Rome, but of other places in Italy. 25. Paul's characteristic salutation in every one of his other thirteen Epistles, as he says himself, 1 Corinthians 16. 21, 23; Colossians 4. 13; 2 Thessalonians 3. 17. It is found in no Epistle written by any other apostle in Paul's lifetime. It is used in Revelation 22. 21, written subsequently, and in CLEMENT OF ROME. Being known to be his badge, it is not used by others in his lifetime. The Greek here is, "The grace (viz., of our Lord Jesus Christ) be with you all."

JAMES.

INTRODUCTION.

THIS is called by EUSEBIUS (Ecclesiastical History, 2. 23, about the year A. D. 330) the first of the Catholic Epistles, i. e., the Epistles intended for general circulation, as distinguished from St. Paul's Epistles, which were addressed to particular churches or individuals. In the oldest MSS. of the New Testament extant, they stand before the Epistles of St. Paul. Of them, two only are mentioned by EUSEBIUS as universally acknowledged ("Homologoumena"), viz., the First Epistle of St. Peter, and the First Epistle of St. John. All, however, are found in every existing MS. of the whole New Testament.

It is not to be wondered at that Epistles not addressed to particular churches (and particularly one like that of St. James, addressed to the Israelite believers scattered abroad) should be for a time less known. The first mention of St. James' Epistle by name occurs early in the third century, in ORIGEN (Comment. on John 1. 19. 4. 306, who was born about 185, and died 251 A. D.). CLEMENS ROMANUS (First Epistle to the Corinthians, ch. 10., cf. James 2. 21, 23; ch. 11., cf. James 2. 25; Hebrews 11. 31) quotes it. So also the Shepherd of Hermas quotes ch. 4. 7. IRENEUS (Hereses, 4. 16. 2) is thought to refer to ch. 2. 23. CLEMENS ALEXANDRINUS commented on it, according to CASSIODORUS. EPHREM SYRUS (Opp. Græc. 3. 51) quotes ch. 5. 1. An especially strong proof of its authenticity is afforded by its forming part of the old Syriac version, which contains no other of the disputed books ("Antilegomena," EUSEBIUS, 3. 25), except the Epistle to the Hebrews. None of the Latin fathers before the fourth century quote it; but soon after the Council of Nice it was admitted as canonical both by the East and West churches, and specified as such in the Councils of Hippo and Carthage (A. D. 397). This is just what we might expect; a writing known only partially at first, when subsequently it obtained a wider circulation, and the proofs were better known of its having been recognized in apostolic churches, having in them men endowed with the discernment of spirits, which qualified them for discriminating between inspired and uninspired writings, was universally accepted. Though doubted for a time, at last the disputed books (St. James, 2 Peter, 2 and 3 John, Jude, and Revelation) were universally and undoubtingly accepted, so that no argument for the Old Testament Apocrypha can be drawn from their case: as to it the Jewish Church had no doubt; it was known not to be inspired.

Luther's objection to it ("an Epistle of straw, and destitute of an evangelic character") was due to his mistaken idea that it (ch. 2.) opposes the doctrine of justification by faith, and not by works, taught by St. Paul. But the two apostles, whilst looking at justification from distinct stand-points, perfectly harmonize and mutually complement the definitions of one another. Faith precedes love and the works of love; but without them it is dead. St. Paul regards faith in the justification of the sinner before God; St. James, in the justification of the believer evidently before men. The error which James meets was the Jewish notion that their possession and knowledge of the law of God would justify them, even though they disobeyed it (cf. ch. 1. 22 with Romans 2. 17-25). Ch. 1. 3 and 4. 1, 12 seem plainly to allude to Romans 5. 3; 6. 13; 7. 23; 14. 4. Also the tenor of ch. 2., on "justification," seems to allude to St. Paul's teaching, so as to correct false Jewish notions of a different kind from those which he combated, though not unnoticed by him also (Romans 2. 17, &c.).

St. Paul (Galatians 2. 9) arranges the names "James, Cephas, John," in the order in which their Epistles stand. The St. James who wrote this Epistle (according to most ancient writers) is called (Galatians 1. 19), "the Lord's brother." He was son of Alphaeus or Cleopas (Luke 24. 13-18) and Mary, sister of the Virgin Mary. Cf. Mark 15. 40 with John 19. 25, which seems to identify the mother of James the Less with the wife of Cleopas, not with the Virgin Mary Cleopas' wife's sister. Cleopas is the Hebrew, Alphaeus the Greek mode of writing the same name. Many, however, as HEGESIPPUS [EUSEBIUS, Ecclesiastical History], distinguish "the Lord's brother" from the son of Alphaeus. But the Gospel according to the Hebrews, quoted by JEROME, represents James, the Lord's brother, as present at the institution of the Eucharist, and therefore identical with the apostle James. So the Apocryphal Gospel of James. In Acts, James who is put foremost in Jerusalem after the death of James, the son of Zebedee, is not distinguished from James, the son of Alphaeus. He is not mentioned as one of the Lord's brethren in Acts 1.14; but as one of the "apostles" (Galatians 1.19). He is called "the Less" (lit., the little, Mark 15.40), to distinguish him from James, the son of Zebedee. ALFORD considers James, the brother of the Lord, the author of the Epistle, to have been the eldest of the sons of Joseph and Mary, after Jesus (cf. Matthew 13.55), and that James the son of Alphaeus is distinguished from him by the latter being called "the Less," i. e., junior. His arguments against the Lord's brother, the bishop of Jerusalem, being the apostle, are, (1.) The Lord's brethren did not believe on Jesus at a time when the apostles had been already called (John 7.3, 5), therefore none of the Lord's brethren could be among the apostles (but it does not follow from John 7.3 that no one of them believed); (2.) the apostles' commission was to preach the Gospel everywhere, not to be bishops in a particular locality (but it is unlikely that one not an apostle should be bishop of Jerusalem, to whom even apostles yield deference, Acts 15.13, 19; Galatians 1.19; 2.9, 12. The Saviour's last command to the apostles collectively to preach the Gospel everywhere, is not inconsistent with each having a particular sphere of labour in which he should be a missionary bishop, as Peter is said to have been at Antioch).

He was surnamed "the Just." It needed peculiar wisdom so to preach the Gospel as not to disparage the law. As bishop of Jerusalem writing to the twelve tribes, he sets forth the Gospel in its aspect of relation to the law, which the Jews so revered. As St. Paul's Epistles are a commentary on the doctrines flowing from the death and resurrection of Christ, so St. James' Epistle has a close connection with His teaching during His life on earth, especially His Sermon on the Mount. In both, the law is represented as fulfilled in love: the very language is palpably similar (cf. ch. 1.2 with Matthew 5.12; ch. 1.4 with Matthew 5.48; ch. 1.5; 5.15 with Matthew 7.7-11; ch. 6.13 with Matthew 5.7, and 6.14, 15; ch. 2.10 with Matthew 5.19; ch. 4.4 with Matthew 6.24; ch. 4.11 with Matthew 7.1, 2; ch. 5.2 with Matthew 6.19). The whole spirit of this Epistle breathes the same Gospel-righteousness which the Sermon on the Mount inculcates as the highest realization of the law. St. James' own character as "the Just," or legally righteous, disposed him to this coincidence (cf. ch. 1.20; 2.10; 3.18 with Matthew 5.20). It also fitted him for presiding over a Church still zealous for the law (Acts 21.13-24; Galatians 2.12). If any could win the Jews to the Gospel, he was most likely who presented a pattern of Old Testament righteousness, combined with evangelical faith (cf. also ch. 2.8 with Matthew 5.44, 48). Practice, not profession, is the test of obedience (cf. ch. 2.17; 4.17 with Matthew 7.21-23). Sins of the tongue, however lightly regarded by the world, are an offence against the law of love (cf. ch. 1.26; 3.2-13 with Matthew 5.22; also any swearing, ch. 5.12; cf. Matthew 5.33-37).

The absence of the apostolic benediction in this Epistle is probably due to its being addressed, not merely to the believing, but also indirectly to unbelieving, Israelites. To the former he commends humility, patience, and prayer; to the latter he addresses awful warnings (ch. 5.7-11; 4.9; 5.1-6).

St. James was martyred at the Passover. This Epistle was probably written just before it. The destruction of Jerusalem foretold in it (ch. 5.1, &c.), ensued a year after his martyrdom, 69 A. D. HEGESIPPUS (quoted in EUSEBIUS, 2.23) narrates that he was set on a pinnacle of the temple by the scribes and Pharisees, who begged him to restrain the people who were in large numbers embracing Christianity. "Tell us," said they in the presence of the people gathered at the feast, "which is the door of Jesus?" St. James replied with a loud voice, "Why ask ye me concerning Jesus the Son of man? He sitteth at the right hand of power, and will come again on the clouds of heaven." Many thereupon cried, Hosanna to the Son of David. But St. James was cast down headlong by the Pharisees; and praying, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do," he was stoned and beaten to death with a fuller's club. The Jews, we know from Acts, were exasperated at St. Paul's rescue from their hands, and therefore determined to wreak their vengeance on St. James. The publication of his Epistle to the dispersed Israelites, to whom it was probably carried by those who came up to the periodical feasts, made him obnoxious to them, especially to the higher classes, because it foretold the woes soon about to fall on them and their country. Their taunting question, "Which is the door of Jesus?" (i. e., by what door will He come when He returns?), alludes to his prophecy, "the coming of the Lord draweth nigh . . . behold the Judge standeth over the door" (ch. 5.8, 9). Hebrews 13.7 probably refers to the martyrdom of James, who had been so long bishop over the Jewish Christians at Jerusalem, "Remember them which have (rather, 'had') the rule (spiritually) over you, who have spoken unto you the word of God; whose faith follow, considering the end of their conversation."

His inspiration as an apostle is expressly referred to in Acts 15.19, 25, "My sentence is," &c.: "It seemed good to the Holy Ghost and to us," &c. His episcopal authority is implied in the deference paid to him by St. Peter and St. Paul (Acts 12.17; 21.18; Galatians 1.19; 2.9). The Lord had appeared specially to him after the resurrection (1 Corinthians 15.7). St. Peter in his First Epistle (universally from the first received as canonical) tacitly confirms the inspiration of St. James' Epistle, by incorporating with his own inspired writings no less than ten passages from St. James. The "apostle of the circumcision," St. Peter, and the first bishop of Jerusalem, would naturally have much in common. Cf. ch. 1.1 with 1 Peter 1.1; ch. 1.2 with 1 Peter 1.6; 4.12, 13; ch. 1.11 with 1 Peter 1.24; ch. 1.13 with 1 Peter 1.3; ch. 2.7 with 1 Peter 4.14; ch. 3.13 with 1 Peter 2.12; ch. 4.1 with 1 Peter 2.11; ch. 4.6 with 1 Peter 5.5, 6; ch. 4.7 with 1 Peter 5.6, 9; ch. 4.10 with 1 Peter 5.6; ch. 5.20 with 1 Peter 4.6. Its being written in the pure Greek shows it was intended not only for the Jews at Jerusalem, but also for the Hellenists, i. e., Greek-speaking, Jews.

The style is close, curt, and sententious, gnome following after gnome. An Hebraic character pervades the Epistle, as appears in the occasional poetic parallelisms (ch. 3.1-12). Cf. ch. 2.2, "Assemble," Margin, synagogue. The images are analogical arguments, combining at once logic and poetry. Eloquence and persuasiveness are prominent characteristics.

The similarity to Matthew, the most Hebrew of the Gospels, is just what we might expect from the bishop of Jerusalem writing to Israelites. In it the higher spirit of Christianity is seen putting the Jewish law in its proper place. The law is enforced in its everlasting spirit, not in the letter for which the Jews were so zealous. The doctrines of grace, the distinguishing features of St. Paul's teaching to the Hellenists and Gentiles, are less prominent as being already taught by that apostle. St. James complements Paul's teaching, and shows to the Jewish Christians who still kept the legal ordinances down to the fall of Jerusalem, the spiritual principle of the law, viz., love manifested in obedience. To sketch "the perfect man" continuing in the Gospel law of liberty, is his theme.

CHAPTER I.

Ver. 1-27. INSCRIPTION: EXHORTATION ON HEARING, SPEAKING, AND WRATH. The last subject is discussed in ch. 3, 13 to 4, 17. 1. James—an apostle of the circumcision, with Peter and John; James in Jerusalem, Palestine, and Syria; Peter in Babylon and the East; John in Ephesus and Asia Minor. St. Peter addresses the dispersed Jews of Pontus, Galatia, and Cappadocia; St. James, the Israelites of the twelve tribes scattered abroad. servant of God—not that he was not an apostle; for Paul, an apostle, also calls himself so; but as addressing the Israelites generally, including even indirectly the unbelieving, he in humility omits the title “apostle;” so Paul in writing to the Hebrews; similarly Jude, an apostle, in his General Epistle. Jesus Christ—not mentioned again save in ch. 2, 1; not at all in his speeches (Acts 15, 14, 15, and 21, 20, 21), lest his introducing the name of Jesus oftener should seem to arise from vanity, as being “the Lord’s brother.” [BENGE.] His teaching being practical, rather than doctrinal, required less frequent mention of Christ’s name. scattered abroad—lit., which are in the dispersion. The dispersion of the Israelites, and their connection with Jerusalem as a centre of religion, was a divinely-ordered means of propagating Christianity. The pilgrim troops of the law became caravans of the Gospel. [WORDS-WORTH.] greeting—found in no other Christian letter, but in James and the Jerusalem Synod’s Epistle to the Gentile churches; an undesigned coincidence and mark of genuineness. In the original Greek (chairein) for “greeting,” there is a connection with the “joy” to which they are exhorted amidst their existing distresses from poverty and consequent oppression. Cf. Romans 15, 26, which alludes to their poverty. 2. My brethren—a phrase often found in St. James, marking community of nation and of faith. all joy—cause for the highest joy. [GROTIUS.] Nothing but joy. [PISCATOR.] Count all “divers temptations” to be each matter of joy. [BENGE.] fall into—unexpectedly, so as to be encompassed by them (so the original Greek). temptations—not in the limited sense of allurements to sin, but trials or distresses of any kind which try and purify the Christian character. Cf. “tempt,” i. e., try, Genesis 22, 1. Some of those to whom St. James writes were “sick,” or otherwise “afflicted” (ch. 5, 13). Every possible trial to the child of God is a masterpiece of strategy of the Captain of his salvation for his good. 3. the trying—the testing or proving of your faith, viz., by “divers temptations.” Cf. Romans 5, 3, “tribulation” worketh patience, and patience experience (in the original dokime, akin to dokimion, “trying,” here; there it is experience; here the “trying” or testing, whence experience flows). patience—the original implies more; persevering endurance and continuance (cf. Luke 8, 15). 4. Let endurance have a perfect work (taken out of the previous “worketh patience” or endurance, i. e., have its full effect, by showing the most perfect degree of endurance, viz., “joy in bearing the cross” [MENOCHUS], and enduring to the end (Matthew 10, 22). [CALVIN.] ye may be perfectly developed in all the attributes of a Christian character. For this there is required “joy” [BENGE], as part of the “perfect work” of probation. The work of God in a man is the man. If God’s teachings by patience have had a perfect work in you, you are perfect. [ALFORD.] entire—that which has all its parts complete, wanting no integral part; 1 Thessalonians 5, 23, “your whole (lit., ‘entire’) spirit, soul, and body;” as “perfect” implies without a blemish in its parts. 5. English Version omits “But,” which the Greek has, and which is important. “But (as this perfect entireness wanting nothing is no easy attainment) if any,” &c. lack—rather, as the Greek word is repeated after St. James’ manner, from v. 4, “wanting nothing,” translate, “If any of you want wisdom,” viz., the wisdom whereby ye may “count it all joy when ye fall into divers temptations,” and “let patience have her perfect work.” This “wisdom” is shown in its effects in detail, ch. 3, 17. The highest wisdom, which governs patience alike in poverty and riches, is described v. 9, 10. ask—(Ch. 4, 2.) liberally—So the Greek is rendered by English Version. It is rendered with simplicity. Romans 12, 8. God gives without adding aught which may take off from the graciousness of the gift. [ALFORD.] God requires the same “simplicity” in His children (“eye . . . single,” Matthew 6, 22, lit., simple). upbraided not—an illustration of God’s giving simply. He gives to the humble suppliant without upbraiding him with his past sin and ingratitude, or his future abuse of God’s goodness. The Jews pray, “Let me not have need of the gifts of men, whose gifts are few, but their upbraidings manifold; but give me out of thy large and full hand.” Cf. Solomon’s prayer for “wisdom,” and God’s gift above what he asked, though God foresaw his future abuse of His goodness would deserve very differently. St. James has before his eye the Sermon on the Mount (see my Introduction). God hears every true prayer, and grants either the thing asked, or else something better than it; as a good physician consults for his patient’s good better by denying something which the latter asks not for his good, than by conceding a temporary gratification to his hurt. 6. ask in faith—i. e., the persuasion that God can and will give. St. James begins and ends with faith. In the middle of the Epistle he removes the hindrances to faith, and shows its true character. [BENGE.] wavering—between belief and unbelief. Cf. the case of the Israelites, who seemed to partly believe in God’s power, but learnt more to unbelief by “limiting” it. On the other hand, cf. Acts 10, 20; Romans 4, 20 (“staggered not . . . through unbelief,” lit., as here, “wavered not”); 1 Timothy 2, 8. like a wave of the sea—Isaiah 57, 20; Ephesians 4, 14, where the same Greek word occurs for “tossed to and fro,” as is here translated, “driven with the wind.” driven with the wind—from without. tossed—from within, by its own instability. [BENGE.] At one time cast on the shore of faith and hope, at another rolled back into the abyss of unbelief; at one time raised to the height of worldly pride, at another tossed in the sands of despair and affliction. [WIESINGER.] 7. For—Resumed from “for” in v. 6. that man—such a wavering self-deceiver. think—Real faith is something more than a mere thinking or surmise. anything—viz., of the things that he prays for: he does receive many things from God, food, raiment, &c., but these are the general gifts of His providence; of the things specially granted in answer to prayer, the waverer shall not receive “anything,” much less wisdom. 8. double-minded—lit., double-souled, the one soul directed towards God, the other to something else. The Greek favours ALFORD’S translation, “He (the waverer, v. 6) is a man double-minded, unstable,” &c.; or better, BEZA’S. The words in this v. 8 are in apposition with “that man,” v. 7; thus the “is,” which is not in the original, will not need to be supplied, “A man double-minded, unstable in all his ways!” The word for “double-minded” is found here and ch. 4, 8, for the first time in Greek literature. It is not a hyponocrite that is meant, but a fickle, “wavering” man, as the context shows. It is opposed to the single eye (Matthew 6, 22). 9, 10. Translate, “But let the brother,” &c., i. e., the best remedy against double-mindedness is that Christian simplicity of spirit whereby the “brother,” low in outward circumstances, may “rejoice” (answering to v. 2) “in that he is exalted,” viz., by being accounted a son and heir of God, his very sufferings being a pledge of his coming glory and crown (v. 12), and the rich may rejoice “in that he is made low,” by being stripped of his goods for Christ’s sake [MENOCHUS]; or in that he is made, by sanctified trials, lowly in spirit, which is true matter for rejoicing. [GOMARUS.] The design of the Epistle is to reduce all things to an equable footing (ch. 2, 1; 5, 13). The “low,” rather than the “rich,” is here called “the brother.” [BENGE.] So far as one is merely “rich” in worldly goods, “he shall pass away;” in so far as his predominant character is that of a “brother,” he “abideth for ever” (1 John 2, 17). This view meets all ALFORD’S objections to regarding “the rich” here as a “brother” at all. To avoid making the rich a brother, he translates, “But the rich glories in his humiliation,” viz., in that which is really his debasement (his rich state, Philipians 3, 19), just as the low is told to rejoice in what is really his exaltation

(his lowly state). 11. Taken from Isaiah 40, 6-8. heat—rather, “the hot wind” from the (east or) south, which scorches vegetation (Luke 12, 55). The “burning heat” of the sun is not at its rising, but rather at noon; whereas the scorching Kadim wind is often at sunrise (Jonah 4, 8). [MIDDLETON, Greek Article.] Matthew 20, 12 uses the Greek word for “heat.” Isaiah 40, 7, “Bloweth upon it,” seems to answer to “the hot wind” here. grace of the fashion—i. e., of the external appearance. in his ways—referring to the burdensome extent of the rich man’s devices. [BENGEL.] Cf. “his ways,” i. e., his course of life, v. 8. 12. Blessed—Cf. the beatitudes in the Sermon on the Mount, Matthew 5, 4, 10, 11. endureth temptation—not the “falling into divers temptations” (v. 2) is the matter for “joy,” but the enduring of temptation “unto the end.” Cf. Job 5, 17. when he is tried—lit., when he has become tested or approved, when he has passed through the “trying” (v. 3), his “faith” having finally gained the victory. the crown—not in allusion to the crown or garland given to winners in the games; for this, though a natural allusion for St. Paul in writing to the heathen, among whom such games existed, would be less appropriate for St. James in addressing the Jewish Christians, who regarded Gentile usages with aversion. of life—“life” constitutes the crown, lit., the life, the only true life, the highest and eternal life. The crown implies a kingdom (Psalm 21, 3). the Lord—not found in the best MSS. and versions. The believer’s heart fills up the omission, without the name needing to be mentioned. The “faithful One who promised” (Hebrews 10, 23). to them that love him—In 2 Timothy 4, 8, “the crown of righteousness to them that love His appearing.” Love produces patient endurance: none attend their love more than they who suffer for Him. 13. when . . . tempted—tried by solicitation to evil. Herebefore the “temptation” meant was that of probation by afflictions. Let no one fancy that God lays upon him an inevitable necessity of sinning. God does not send trials on you in order to make you worse, but to make you better (v. 16, 17). Therefore do not sink under the pressure of evils (1 Corinthians 10, 13). of God—by agency proceeding from God. The Greek is not “tempted by,” but, “from God,” implying indirect agency. cannot be tempted with evil, &c.—“Neither do any of our sins tempt God to entice us to worse things, nor does He tempt any of His own accord” (lit., of Himself: cf. the antithesis, v. 18, “Of His own will He begat us” to holiness, so far is He from tempting us of His own will). [BENGEL.] God is said in Genesis 22, 1 to have “tempted Abraham;” but there the tempting meant is that of trying or proving, not that of seducement. ALFORD translates according to the ordinary sense of the Greek, “God is unversed in evil.” But as this gives a less likely sense, English Version probably gives the true sense; for ecclesiastical Greek often uses words in new senses, as the exigencies of the new truths to be taught required. 14. Every man, when tempted, is so through being drawn away of (again here, as in v. 13, the Greek for “of” expresses the actual source, rather than the agent of temptation) his own lust. The cause of sin is in ourselves. Even Satan’s suggestions do not endanger us before they are made our own. Each one has his own peculiar (so the Greek) lust, arising from his own temperament and habit. Lust flows from the original birth-sin in man, inherited from Adam. drawn away—the beginning step in temptation: drawn away from truth and virtue. enticed—lit., taken with a bait, as fish are. The further progress: the man allowing himself (as the Greek middle voice implies) to be enticed to evil. [BENGEL.] “Lust” is here personified as the harlot that allures the man. 15. The guilty union is committed by the will embracing the temptress, “Lust,” the harlot, then, “brings forth sin,” viz., of that kind to which the temptation inclines. Then the particular sin (so the Greek implies), “when it is completed, brings forth death,” with which it was all along pregnant. [ALFORD.] This “death” stands in striking contrast to the “crown of life” (v. 12) which “patience” or endurance ends in, when it has its “perfect work” (v. 4). He who will fight Satan with Satan’s own weapons, must not wonder if he finds himself overmatched. Nip sin in the bud of lust. 16. Do not err in attributing to God temptation to evil; nay (as he proceeds to show), “every good,” all that is good on earth, comes from God. 17. gift . . . gift—Not the same words in Greek: the first, the act of giving, or the gift in its initiatory stage; the second, the thing given, the boon, when perfected. As the “good gift” stands in contrast to “sin” in its initiatory stage (v. 15), so the “perfect boon” is in contrast to “sin when it is finished,” bringing forth death (2 Peter 1, 3). from above—(Cf. ch. 3, 15.) Father of lights—Creator of the lights in heaven (cf. Job 38, 23 [ALFORD]; Genesis 4, 20, 21; Hebrews 12, 9). This accords with the reference to the changes in the light of the heavenly bodies alluded to in the end of the verse. Also, Father of the spiritual lights in the kingdom of grace and glory. [BENGEL.] These were typified by the supernatural lights on the breastplate of the high priest, the Urim. As “God is light, and in Him is no darkness at all” (1 John 1, 5), He cannot in any way be the Author of sin (v. 13), which is darkness (John 3, 19). no variableness . . . shadow of turning—(Malachi 3, 6.) None of the alternations of light and shadow which the physical “lights” undergo, and which even the spiritual lights are liable to, as compared with God. “Shadow of turning,” lit., the dark shadow-mark cast from one of the heavenly bodies, arising from its turning or revolution, e. g., when the moon is eclipsed by the shadow of the earth, and the sun by the body of the moon. BENGEL makes a climax, “no variation—not even the shadow of a turning:” the former denoting a change in the understanding; the latter, in the will. 18. (John 1, 13.) The believer’s regeneration is the highest example of nothing but good proceeding from God. Of his own will—Of his own good pleasure (which shows that it is God’s essential nature to do good, not evil), not induced by any external cause. begat he us—spiritually: a once-for-all accomplished act (1 Peter 1, 3, 23). In contrast to “lust when it hath conceived, bringeth forth sin, and sin . . . death” (v. 15). Life follows naturally in connection with light (v. 17). word of truth—the Gospel. The objective mean, as faith is the appropriating mean of regeneration by the Holy Spirit as the efficient agent, a kind of first-fruits—Christ is, in respect to the resurrection, “the first-fruits” (1 Corinthians 15, 20, 23); believers, in respect to regeneration, are, as it were, first-fruits (image from the consecration of the first-born of man, cattle, and fruits to God; familiar to the Jews addressed), i. e., they are the first of God’s regenerated creatures, and the pledge of the ultimate regeneration of the creation. Romans 8, 19, 23, where also the Spirit, the Divine agent of the believer’s regeneration, is termed “the first-fruits,” i. e., the earnest that the regeneration now begun in the soul, shall at last extend to the body too, and to the lower parts of creation. Of all God’s visible creatures, believers are the noblest part, and like the legal “first-fruits,” sanctify the rest; for this reason they are much tried now. 19. Wherefore—as your evil is of yourselves, but your good from God. However, the oldest MSS. and versions read thus: “YE KNOW IT (so Ephesians 5, 5; Hebrews 12, 17), my beloved brethren; BUT (consequently) let every man be swift to hear,” i. e., docile in receiving “the word of truth” (v. 18, 21). The true method of hearing is treated of v. 21-27, and ch. 2. slow to speak—(Proverbs 10, 19; 17, 27, 28; Ecclesiastes 5, 2.) A good way of escaping one kind of temptation arising from ourselves (v. 13). Slow to speak authoritatively as a master or teacher of others (cf. ch. 3, 1); a common Jewish fault: slow also to speak such hasty things of God, as in v. 13. Two ears are given to us, the rabbis observe, but only one tongue: the ears are open and exposed, whereas the tongue is walled in behind the teeth. slow to wrath—(Ch. 3, 13, 14; 4, 5.) Slow in becoming heated by debate: another Jewish fault (Romans 2, 8), to which much speaking tends. TITMANN thinks not so much “wrath” is meant, as an indignant feeling of fretfulness under the calamities to which the whole of human life is exposed: this accords with the “divers temptations” in v. 2. Hastiness of temper hinders hearing God’s word; so Naaman, 2 Kings 5, 11; Luke 4, 28. 20. Man’s angry zeal in debating, as if jealous for the honour of God's righteousness, is far from working that which is really righteousness in God's sight. True "righteousness is sown in peace," not in wrath (ch. 3. 18). The oldest and best reading means "worketh," i. e., practiseth not: the received reading is "worketh," produceth not. 21. lay apart—once for all (so the Greek): as a filthy garment. Cf. Joshua's filthy garments, Zechariah 3. 3, 5; Revelation 7. 14. "Filthiness" is cleansed away by hearing the word (John 15. 3). superfluity of naughtiness—excess (for instance, the intemperate spirit implied in "wrath," v. 19, 20), which arises from malice (our natural, evil disposition towards one another). 1 Peter 2. 1 has the very same words in the Greek. So "malice" is the translation, Ephesians 4. 31; Colossians 3. 8. "Faulty excess" [BENGE] is not strong enough. Superfluous excess in speaking is also reprobated as "coming of evil" (the Greek is akin to the word for naughtiness here) in the Sermon on the Mount (Matthew 5. 37), with which St. James' Epistles is so connected. with meekness—in mildness towards one another [ALFORD], the opposite to "wrath" (v. 20): answering to "as new-born babes" (1 Peter 2. 2). Meekness, I think, includes also a childlike, docile, humble, as well as an uncontentious spirit (Psalm 25. 9; 45. 4; Isaiah 66. 2; Matthew 5. 5; 11. 28-30; 18. 3, 4; contrast Romans 2. 8). On "receive," applied to ground receiving seed, cf. Mark 4. 20. Contrast Acts 17. 11; 1 Thessalonians 1. 6 with 2 Thessalonians 2. 10. engrafted word—The Gospel word, whose proper attribute is to be engrafted by the Holy Spirit, so as to be livingly incorporated with the believer, as the fruitful shoot is with the wild natural stock on which it is engrafted. The law came to man only from without, and admonished him of his duty. The Gospel is engrafted inwardly, and so fulfils the ultimate design of the law (Deuteronomy 6. 6; 11. 18; Psalm 119. 11). ALFORD translates, "The implanted word," referring to the parable of the sower (Matthew 13). I prefer English Version. able to save—a strong incentive to correct our dulness in hearing the word: that word which we hear so carelessly, is able (instrumentally) to save us. [CALVIN.] souls—your true selves, for the "body" is now liable to sickness and death; but the soul being now saved, both soul and body at last shall be so (ch. 5. 15, 20). 22. Qualification of the precept, "Be swift to hear:" "Be ye doers . . . not hearers only:" not merely "Do the word," but "Be doers" systematically and continually, as if this was your regular business. St. James here again refers to the Sermon on the Mount (Matthew 7. 21-29). deceiving your own selves—by the logical fallacy (the Greek implies this) that the mere hearing is all that is needed. 23. For—the logical self-deceit (v. 22) illustrated. not a doer—more *lit., "a not-doer." [ALFORD.] The true disciple, say the rabbis, learns in order that he may do, not in order that he may merely know or teach. his natural face—*lit., the countenance of his birth: the face he was born with. As a man may behold his natural face in a mirror, so the hearer may perceive his moral visage in God's word. This faithful portraiture of man's soul in Scripture, is the strongest proof of the truth of the latter. In it, too, we see mirrored God's glory, as well as our natural vileness. 24. beholdeth—more *lit., "he contemplated himself and hath gone his way," i. e., no sooner has he contemplated his image than he is gone his way (v. 11). "Contemplate" answers to hearing the word: "goeth his way," to relaxing the attention after hearing—letting the mind go elsewhere, and the interest of the thing heard pass away: then forgetfulness follows [ALFORD] (cf. Ezekiel 33. 31). "Contemplate" here, and v. 23, implies that, though cursory, yet some knowledge of one's self, at least for the time, is imparted in hearing the word (1 Corinthians 14. 24). and . . . and—the repetition expresses hastiness joined with levity. [BENGE.] forgetteth what manner of man he was—in the mirror. Forgetfulness is no excuse (v. 25; 2 Peter 1. 9). 25. looketh into—*lit., stoopeth down to take a close look into. Peers into: stronger than "beholdeth," or "contemplated," v. 24. A blessed curiosity if it be efficacious in bearing fruit. [BENGE.] perfect law of liberty—the Gospel-fruit of life, perfect and perfecting (as shown in the Sermon on the Mount, Matthew 5. 48), and making us truly walk at liberty (Psalm 119. 32, Church of England Prayer Book Version). Christians are to aim at a higher standard of holiness than was generally understood under the law. The principle of love takes the place of the letter of the law, so that by the Spirit they are free from the yoke of sin, and free to obey by spontaneous instinct (ch. 2. 8, 10, 12; John 8. 31-38; 15. 14, 15; cf. 1 Corinthians 7. 22; Galatians 5. 1, 13; 1 Peter 2. 16). The law is thus not made void, but fulfilled. continueth therein—contrasted with "goeth his way," v. 24: continues both looking into the mirror of God's word, and doing its precepts. doer of the work—rather, "a doer of work" [ALFORD], an actual worker. blessed in his deed—rather, "in his doing;" in the very doing there is blessedness (Psalm 109. 11). 26, 27. An example of doing work. religious . . . religion—the *Greek expresses the external service or exercise of religion, "godliness" being the internal soul of it. "If any man think himself to be (so the Greek) religious, i. e., observant of the offices of religion, let him know these consist not so much in outward observances, as in such acts of mercy and humble piety (Micah 6. 7, 8) as visiting the fatherless, &c., and keeping one's self unspotted from the world" (Matthew 23. 23). St. James does not mean that these offices are the great essentials, or sum total of religion; but that, whereas the law-service was merely ceremonial, the very services of the Gospel consist in acts of mercy and holiness, and it has light for its garment, its very robe being righteousness. [TRENCH.] The Greek word is only found in Acts 26. 5, "After the strictest sect of our religion I lived a Pharisee." Colossians 2. 18, "Worshipping of angels." bridleth not . . . tongue—Discretion in speech is better than fluency of speech (cf. ch. 3. 2, 3). Cf. Psalm 39. 1. God alone can enable us to do so. St. James, in treating of the law, naturally notices this sin. For they who are free from grosser sins, and even bear the outward show of sanctity, will often exalt themselves by detracting others under the pretence of zeal, whilst their real motive is love of evil-speaking. [CALVIN.] heart—it and the tongue act and react on one another. 27. Pure . . . and undefiled—"Pure" is that love which has in it no foreign admixture, as self-deceit and hypocrisy. "Undefiled" is the means of its being "pure." [ITTMANN.] "Pure" expresses the positive, "undefiled" the negative side of religious service; just as visiting the fatherless and widow is the active, keeping himself unspotted from the world, the passive side of religious duty. This is the nobler shape that our religious exercises take, instead of the ceremonial offices of the law. before God and the Father—*lit., "before Him who is (our) God and Father." God is so called to imply that if we would be like our Father, it is not by fasting, &c., for He does none of these things, but in being "merciful as our Father is merciful." [CHRYSOSTOM.] visit—in sympathy and kind offices to alleviate their distresses. the fatherless—whose "Father" is God (Psalm 68. 5); peculiarly helpless. and—not in the Greek; so close is the connection between active works of mercy to others, and the maintenance of personal unworldliness of spirit, word, and deed; no copula therefore is needed. Religion in its rise interests us about ourselves; in its progress, about our fellow-creatures; in its highest stage, about the honour of God. keep himself—with jealous watchfulness, at the same time praying and depending on God as alone able to keep us (John 17. 15; Jude 24).

CHAPTER II.

Ver. 1-26. THE SIN OF RESPECT OF PERSONS: DEAD, UNWORKING FAITH SAVES NO MAN. 1-13. St. James illustrates "the perfect law of liberty" (ch. 1. 25) in one particular instance of a sin against it, concluding with a reference again to that law (v. 12, 13). 1. brethren—the equality of all Christians as "brethren," forms the groundwork of the admonition. the faith of . . . Christ—*i. e., the Christian faith. St. James grounds Christian practice on Christian faith. the Lord of glory—So 1 Corinthians 2. 8. As all believers, alike rich and poor, derive all their glory from their union with Him, "the Lord of glory," not from external advantages of worldly fortune, the sin in question is peculiarly inconsistent with His "faith." BENGEL, making no ellipsis of the Lord, explains "glory" as in apposition with Christ who is THE GLORY (Luke 2. 32); the true Shekinah glory of the temple (Romans 9. 4). English Version is simpler. The glory of Christ resting on the poor believer should make him be regarded as highly by "brethren" as his richer brother; nay, more so, if the poor believer has more of Christ's spirit than the rich brother, with respect of persons—lit., "in respectings of persons;" in the practice of partial preferences of persons in various ways and on various occasions. 2. assembly—lit., synagogue; this, the latest honourable use, and the only Christian use of the term in the New Testament, occurs in St. James' Epistle, the apostle who maintained to the latest possible moment the bonds between the Jewish synagogue and the Christian Church. Soon the continued resistance of the truth by the Jews led Christians to leave the term to them exclusively (Revelation 3. 9). The "synagogue" implies a mere assembly or congregation not necessarily united by any common tie. "Church," a people bound together by mutual ties and laws, though often it may happen that the members are not assembled. [TRENCH and VITRINGA.] Partly from St. James' Hebrew tendencies, partly from the Jewish Christian churches retaining most of the Jewish forms, this term "synagogue" is used here instead of the Christian term "Church" (ecclesia, derived from a root, "called out," implying the union of its members in spiritual bonds, independent of space, and called out into separation from the world); an undesigned coincidence and mark of truth. The people in the Jewish synagogue sat according to their rank, those of the same trade together. The introduction of this custom into Jewish Christian places of worship is here reprobated by St. James. Christian churches were built like the synagogues, the holy table in the east end of the former, as the ark was in the latter; the desk and pulpit were the chief articles of furniture in both alike. This shows the error of comparing the Church to the temple, and the ministry to the priesthood; the temple is represented by the whole body of worshippers; the church building was formed on the model of the synagogue. See VITRINGA, Synagogue. 2, 3. "If there chance to have come." [ALFORD.] goodly apparel . . . gay clothing—As the Greek is the same in both, translate both alike, "gay," or "splendid clothing," have respect to him, &c.—though ye know not who he is, when perhaps he may be a heathen. It was the office of the deacons to direct to a seat the members of the congregation. [CLEMENT, Constitut. 2. 57, 58.] unto him—Not in the best MSS. Thus "thou" becomes more demonstratively emphatic. here—near the speaker. there—at a distance from where the good seats are. under my footstool—not literally so; but on the ground, down by my footstool. The poor man must either stand, or if he sits, sit in a degrading position. The speaker has a footstool as well as a good seat. 4. Are ye not . . . partial—lit., Have ye not made distinctions or differences (so as to prefer one to another)? So in Jude 22. in yourselves—in your minds, i. e., according to your carnal inclination. [GROTIUS.] are become judges of evil thoughts—The Greek words for "judges" and for "partial," are akin in sound and meaning. A similar translation ought therefore to be given to both. Thus, either for "judges," &c., translate, "distinguishers of (i. e., according to your) evil thoughts;" or, do ye not partially judge between men, and are become evilly-thinking judges (Mark 7. 21)? The "evil thoughts" are in the judges themselves; as in Luke 18. 6, the Greek, "judge of injustice," is translated, "unjust judge." ALFORD and WAHL translate, "Did ye not doubt?" (respecting your faith, which is inconsistent with the distinctions made by you between rich and poor)? For the Greek constantly means doubt in all the New Testament. So in ch. 1. 6, "wavering," Matthew 21. 21; Acts 10. 20; Romans 4. 20, "staggered not." The same play on the same kindred words occurs in the Greek of Romans 14. 10, 23, judge . . . doubteth. The same blame of being a judge, when one ought to be an obeyer, of the law is found ch. 4. 11. 5. Hearken—St. James brings to trial the self-constituted "judges" (v. 4). poor of this world—The best MSS. read, "those poor in respect to the world." In contrast to "the rich in this world" (1 Timothy 6. 17). Not of course all the poor; but the poor, as a class, furnish more believers than the rich as a class. The rich, if a believer, renounces riches as his portion; the poor, if an unbeliever, neglects that which is the peculiar advantage of poverty (Matthew 5. 3; 1 Corinthians 1. 26, 27, 28). rich in faith—their riches consist in faith. Luke 12. 21, "Rich toward God." 1 Timothy 6. 18, "Rich in good works" (Revelation 2. 9; cf. 2 Corinthians 8. 9). Christ's poverty is the source of the believer's riches. kingdom . . . promised—(Luke 12. 32; 1 Corinthians 2. 9; 2 Timothy 4. 8.) 6. The world's judgment of the poor contrasted with God's. ye—Christians, from whom better things might have been expected; there is no marvel that men of the world do so. despised—lit., dishonoured. To dishonour the poor is to dishonour those whom God honours, and so to invert the order of God. [CALVIN.] rich—as a class. oppress—lit., abuse their power against you. draw you—translate, "is it not they (those very persons whom ye partially prefer, v. 1-4) that drag you" (viz., with violence). [ALFORD.] before . . . judgment-seats—Instituting persecutions for religion, as well as oppressive lawsuits, against you. 7. "Is it not they that blaspheme?" &c., as in v. 6. [ALFORD.] Rich heathen must here chiefly be meant; for none others would directly blaspheme the name of Christ. Only indirectly rich Christians can be meant, who, by their inconsistency, caused His name to be blasphemed; so Ezekiel 36. 21, 22; Romans 2. 24. Besides, there were few rich Jewish Christians at Jerusalem (Romans 15. 26). They who dishonour God's name by wilful and habitual sin, "take (or bear) the Lord's name in vain" (cf. Proverbs 30. 9, with Exodus 20. 7). that worthy name—which is "good before the Lord's saints" (Psalm 52. 9; 54. 6); which ye pray may be "hallowed" (Matthew 6. 9), and "by which ye are called," lit., which was invoked (or called upon) by you (cf. Genesis 48. 16; Isaiah 4. 1, Margin; Acts 15. 17), so that at your baptism "into the name" (so the Greek, Matthew 28. 19) of Christ, ye became Christ's people (1 Corinthians 3. 23). 8. The Greek may be translated, "If, however, ye fulfil," &c., i. e., as ALFORD, after ESTIUS, explains, "Still I do not say, hate the rich (for their oppressions) and drive them from your assemblies; if you choose to observe the royal law, &c., well and good; but respect of persons is a breach of that law." I think the translation is, "If in very deed (or indeed on the one hand) ye fulfil the royal law, &c., ye do well, but if (on the other hand) ye respect persons, ye practise sin." The Jewish Christians boasted of, and rested in, the "law" (Acts 15. 1; 21. 18-24; Romans 2. 17; Galatians 2. 12). To this the "indeed" alludes. "Ye rest in the law; If indeed (then) ye fulfil it, ye do well; but if, &c. royal—the law that is king of all laws, being the sum and essence of the ten commandments. The great King, God, is love; His law is the royal law of love, and that law, like Himself, reigns supreme. He "is no respecter of persons;" therefore to respect persons is at variance with Him and His royal law, which is at once a law of love and of liberty (v. 12). The law is the "whole;" "the (particular) Scripture" (Leviticus 19. 18) quoted is a part. To break a part is to break the whole (v. 10). ye do well—being "blessed in your deed" ("doing," Margin) as a doer, not a forgetful hearer of the law (ch. 1. 25). 9. Respect of persons violates the command to love all alike "as thyself," ye commit sin—lit., "ye work sin," Matthew 7. 23, to which the reference here is probably, as in ch. 1. 22. Your works are sin, whatever boast of the law ye make in words (Note, v. 8). convicted—Old English for "convicted," as transgressors—not merely of this or that particular command, but of the whole absolutely. 10. The best MSS. read, "Whosoever shall have kept the whole law, and yet shall have offended (lit., stumbled; not so strong as 'fall,' Romans 11. 11) in one (point; here, the respecting of persons), is (hereby) become guilty of all." The law is one seamless garment which is rent if you but rend a part; or a musical harmony which is spoiled if there be one discordant note [TIRINUS]; or a golden chain whose completeness is broken if you break one link. [GATAKER.] You thus break the whole law, though not the whole of the law, because you offend against love, which is the fulfilling of the law. If any part of a man be leprous, the whole man is judged to be a leper. God requires perfect, not partial, obedience. We are not to choose out parts of the law to keep, which suit our whim, whilst we neglect others. 11. He is One who gave the whole law; therefore, they who violate His will in one point, violate it all. [BENGEI.] The law and its Author alike have a complete unity. kill . . . adultery—selected as being the most glaring cases of violation of duty towards one's neighbour. 12. Summing up of the previous reasonings. speak—Referring back to ch. 1. 19, 26; the fuller discussion of the topic is given ch. 3. judged by the law of liberty—(ch. 1. 25)—i. e., the Gospel law of love, which is not a law of external constraint, but of internal, free, instinctive inclination. The law of liberty, through God's mercy, frees us from the curse of the law, that henceforth we should be free to love and obey willingly. If we will not in turn practice the law of love to our neighbour, that law of grace condemns us still more heavily than the old law, which spake nothing but wrath to him who offended in the least particular (v. 13). Cf. Matthew 18. 32-35; John 12. 48; Revelation 6. 16, "Wrath of the merciful Lamb." 13. The converse of "Blessed are the merciful, for they shall obtain mercy" (Matthew 5. 7). Translate, "The judgment (which is coming on all of us) shall be without mercy to him who hath showed no mercy." It shall be such toward every one as every one shall have been. [BENGEI.] "Mercy" here corresponds to "love," v. 8. mercy rejoiceth against judgment—Mercy, so far from fearing judgment in the case of its followers, actually glorifieth against it, knowing that it cannot condemn them. Not that their mercy is the ground of their acquittal, but the mercy of God in Christ towards them, producing mercy on their part towards their fellow-men, makes them to triumph over judgment, which all in themselves otherwise deserve. 14. St. James here, passing from the particular case of "mercy" or "love" violated by "respect of persons," notwithstanding profession of the "faith of our Lord Jesus" (v. 1), combats the Jewish tendency (transplanted into their Christianity) to substitute a lifeless, inoperative acquaintance with the letter of the law, for change of heart to practical holiness, as if justification could be thereby attained (Romans 2. 3, 13, 23). It seems hardly likely but that St. James had seen St. Paul's Epistles, considering that he uses the same phrases and examples (cf. v. 21, 23, 25, with Romans 4. 3; Hebrews 11. 17, 31; and v. 14, 24, with Romans 3. 28; Galatians 2. 16). Whether St. James individually designed it or not, the Holy Spirit by him combats not St. Paul, but those who abuse St. Paul's doctrine. The teaching of both alike is inspired, and is therefore to be received without wresting of words; but each has a different class to deal with; St. Paul, self-justiciaries; St. James, Antinomian advocates of a mere notional faith. St. Paul urged as strongly as St. James the need of works as evidences of faith, especially in the later Epistles, when many were abusing the doctrine of faith (Titus 2. 14; 3. 8). "Believing and doing are blood relatives." [RUTHERFORD.] What doth it profit—lit., "What is the profit?" though a man say—St. James' expression is not "If a man have faith," but "If a man say he hath faith," referring to a mere profession of faith, such as was usually made at baptism. Simon Magus so "believed and was baptized," and yet had "neither part nor lot in this matter," for his "heart," as his words and works evinced, was not right in the sight of God. ALFORD wrongly denies that "say" is emphatic. The illustration, v. 16, proves it is: "If one of you say" to a naked brother, "Be ye warmed, notwithstanding ye give not those things needful." The inoperative profession of sympathy answering to the inoperative profession of faith. can faith save him—rather, "can such a faith (lit., the faith) save him?" the faith you pretend to; the empty name of boasted faith, contrasted with true fruit-producing faith. So that which selfdeceivers claim is called "wisdom," though not true wisdom, ch. 3. 15. The "him" also in the Greek is emphatic; the particular man who professes faith without having the works which evidence its vitality. 15. The Greek is, "But if," &c.; the "but" taking up the argument against such a one as "said he had faith, and yet had not works," which are its fruits. a brother, &c.—a fellow-Christian, to whom we are specially bound to give help, independent of our general obligation to help all our fellow-creatures. be—The Greek implies, "be found, on your access to them." 16. The habit of receiving passively sentimental impressions from sights of woe without carrying them out into active habits only hardens the heart. one of you—St. James brings home the case to his hearers individually. Depart in peace—as if all their wants were satisfied by the mere words addressed to them. The same words in the mouth of Christ, whose faith they said they had, were accompanied by efficient deeds of love. be . . . warmed—with clothing, instead of being as heretofore "naked" (v. 15; Job 31. 20). filled—instead of being "destitute of food" (Matthew 15. 37). what doth it profit—concluding with the same question as at the beginning, v. 14. Just retribution: kind professions unaccompanied with corresponding acts, as they are of no "profit" to the needy object of them, so are of no profit to the professor himself. So faith consisting in mere profession is unacceptable to God, the object of faith, and profitless to the possessor. 17. faith . . . being alone—ALFORD joins "is dead in itself." So BENGEI, "If the works which living faith produces have no existence, it is a proof that faith itself (lit., in respect to itself) has no existence, i. e., that what one boasts of as faith, is dead." "Faith" is said to be "dead in itself," because when it has works it is alive, and it is discerned to be so, not in respect to its works, but in respect to itself. English Version, if retained, must not be understood to mean that faith can exist "alone" (i. e., severed from works), but thus: Even so presumed faith, if it have not works, is dead, being by itself "alone," i. e., severed from works of charity; just as the body would be "dead" if alone, i. e., severed from the spirit (v. 26). So ESTIUS. 18. "But some one will say:" so the Greek. This verse continues the argument from v. 14, 16. One may say he has faith though he have not works. Suppose one were to say to a naked brother, "Be warmed," without giving him needful clothing. "But some one (entertaining right views of the need of faith having works joined to it) will say" (in opposition to the "say" of the professor), &c. show me thy faith without thy works—if thou canst; but thou canst not show, i. e., manifest or evidence thy alleged (v. 14, "say") faith without works. "Show" does not mean here to prove to me, but exhibit to me. Faith is unseen save by God. To show faith to man, works in some form or other are needed: we are justified judicially by God (Romans 8. 33); meritoriously, by Christ (Isaiah 53. 11); mediately, by faith (Romans 5. 1); evidentially, by works. The question here is not as to the ground on which believers are justified, but about the demonstration of their faith: so in the case of Abraham. In Genesis 22. 1 it is written, God did tempt Abraham, i. e., put to the test of demonstration the reality of his faith, not for the satisfaction of God, who already knew it well, but to demonstrate it before men. The offering of Isaac at that time, quoted here, v. 21, formed no part of the ground of his justification, for he was justified previously on his simply believing in the promise of spiritual heirs, i. e., believers, numerous as the stars. He was then justified: that justification was showed or manifested by his offering Isaac forty years after. That work of faith demonstrated, but did not contribute to his justification. The tree shows its life by its fruits, but it was alive before either fruits or even leaves appeared. 19. Thou—emphatic. Thou self-deceiving claimant to faith without works. that there is one God—rather, "that God is one:" God's existence, however, is also asserted. The fundamental article of the creed of Jews and Christians alike, and the point of faith on which especially the former boasted themselves, as distinguishing them from the

Gentiles, and hence adduced by St. James here. thou doest well—so far good. But unless thy faith goes farther than an assent to this truth, “the evil spirits (lit., demons: ‘Devil’ is the term restricted to Satan, their head) believe” so far in common with thee, “and (so far from being saved by such a faith) shudder” (so the Greek), Matthew 8, 29; Luke 4, 34; 2 Peter 2, 4; Jude 6; Revelation 20, 10. Their faith only adds to their torment at the thought of having to meet Him who is to consign them to their just doom: so thine (Hebrews 10, 26, 27, it is not the faith of love, but of fear, that hath torment, 1 John 4, 18). 20. wilt thou know—“Vain” men are not willing to know, since they have no wish to do the will of God. St. James beseeches such a one to lay aside his perverse unwillingness to know what is palpable to all who are willing to do. vain—who deceivest thyself with a delusive hope, resting on an unreal faith. without works—The Greek implies separate from the works [ALFORD] which ought to flow from it if it were real. is dead—Some of the best MSS. read, “Is idle,” i. e., unavailing to effect what you hope, viz., to save you. 21. Abraham . . . justified by works—evidentially, and before men (see Note, v. 18). In v. 23, St. James, like St. Paul, recognizes the Scripture truth, that it was his faith that was counted to Abraham for righteousness in his justification before God. when he had offered—rather, “when he offered” [ALFORD], i. e., brought as an offering at the altar; not implying that he actually offered him. 22. Or, “thou seest.” how—rather, that. In the two clauses which follow, emphasize “faith” in the former, and “works” in the latter, to see the sense. [BENGE.] faith wrought with his works—for it was by faith he offered his son. Lit., “was working (at the time) with his works.” by works was faith made perfect—not was vivified, but attained its fully-consummated development, and is shown to be real. So “my strength is made perfect in weakness,” i. e., exerts itself most perfectly, shows how great it is [CAMERON]; so 1 John 4, 17; Hebrews 2, 10; 5, 9. The germ really, from the first, contains in it the full-grown tree, but its perfection is not attained till it is matured fully. So ch. 1, 4, “Let patience have her perfect work,” i. e., have its full effect by showing the most perfect degree of endurance, “that ye may be perfect,” i. e., fully developed in the exhibition of the Christian character. ALFORD explains, “Received its realization, was entirely exemplified and filled up.” So St. Paul, Philippians 2, 12, “Work out your own salvation:” the salvation was already in germ theirs in their free justification through faith. It needed to be worked out still to fully-developed perfection in their life. 23. Scripture was fulfilled—Genesis 15, 6, quoted by St. Paul, as realized in Abraham’s justification by faith; but by St. James, as realized subsequently in Abraham’s work of offering Isaac, which, he says, justified him. Plainly, then, St. James must mean by works the same thing as St. Paul means by faith, only that he speaks of faith at its manifested development, whereas St. Paul speaks of it in its germ. Abraham’s offering of Isaac was not a mere act of obedience, but an act of faith. Isaac was the subject of the promises of God, that in him Abraham’s seed should be called. The same God calls on Abraham to slay the subject of His own promise, when as yet there was no seed in whom those predictions could be realized. Hence St. James’ saying that Abraham was justified by such a work, is equivalent to saying, as St. Paul does, that he was justified by faith itself; for it was in fact faith expressed in action, as in other cases saying faith is expressed in words. So St. Paul states as the mean of salvation faith expressed. The “Scripture” would not be “fulfilled,” as St. James says it was, but contradicted by any interpretation which makes man’s works justify him before God: for that Scripture makes no mention of works at all, but says that Abraham’s belief was counted to him for righteousness. God, in the first instance, “justifies the ungodly” through faith; subsequently the believer is justified before the world as righteous through faith manifested in words and works (cf. Matthew 25, 85-87 “the righteous,” 40). The best authorities read, “But Abraham believed,” &c. and he was called the Friend of God—He was not so called in his lifetime, though he was so even then from the time of his justification; but he was called so, being recognized as such by all on the ground of his works of faith. “He was the friend (in an active sense), the lover of God, in reference to his works; and (in a passive sense) loved by God in reference to his justification by works. Both senses are united in John 15, 14, 15.” [BENGE.] 24. not justified by faith only—i. e., by “faith without (separated from: severed from) works,” its proper fruits (Note, v. 20). Faith to justify must, from the first, include obedience in germ (to be developed subsequently), though the former alone is the ground of justification. The scion must be grafted on the stock that it may live; it must bring forth fruit to prove that it does live. 25. It is clear from the nature of Rahab’s act, that it is not quoted to prove justification by works as such. She believed assuredly what her other countrymen disbelieved, and this in the face of every improbability that an unwarlike few would conquer well-armed numbers. In this belief she hid the spies at the risk of her life. Hence, Hebrews 11, 31 names this as an example of faith, rather than of obedience. “By faith the harlot Rahab perished not with them that believed not.” If an instance of obedience were wanting, St. Paul and St. James would hardly have quoted a woman of previously bad character, rather than the many moral and pious patriarchs. But as an example of free grace justifying men through an operative, as opposed to a mere verbal faith, none could be more suitable than a saved “harlot.” As Abraham was an instance of an illustrious man and the father of the Jews, so Rahab is quoted as a woman, and one of abandoned character, and a Gentile, showing that justifying faith has been manifested in those of every class. The nature of the works alleged is such as to prove that St. James uses them only as evidences of faith, as contrasted with a mere verbal profession: not works of charity and piety, but works the value of which consisted solely in their being proofs of faith: they were faith expressed in act, synonymous with faith itself. messengers—spies. had received . . . had sent—rather, “received . . . thrust them forth” (in haste and fear). [ALFORD.] by another way—from that whereby they entered her house, viz., through the window of her house on the wall, and thence to the mountain. 26. Faith is a spiritual thing: works are material. Hence we might expect faith to answer to the spirit, works to the body. But St. James reverses this. He therefore does not mean that faith in all cases answers to the body; but the form of faith without the working reality answers to the body without the animating spirit. It does not follow that living faith derives its life from works, as the body derives its life from the animating spirit.

CHAPTER III.

Ver. 1-18. DANGER OF EAGERNESS TO TEACH, AND OF AN UNBRIDLED TONGUE: TRUE WISDOM SHOWN BY UNCONTENTIOUS MEEKNESS. 1. be not—lit., become not: taking the office too hastily, and of your own accord. many—The office is a noble one; but few are fit for it. Few govern the tongue well (v. 2), and only such as can govern it are fit for the office; therefore, “teachers” ought not to be many. masters—rather, “teachers.” The Jews were especially prone to this presumption. The idea that faith (so called) without works (ch. 2.) was all that is required, prompted “many” to set up as “teachers,” as has been the case in all ages of the Church. At first all were allowed to teach in turns. Even their inspired gifts did not prevent liability to abuse, as St. James here implies: much more is this so when self-constituted teachers have no such miraculous gifts. knowing—as all might know. we . . . greater condemnation—St. James in a humble, conciliatory spirit, includes himself: if we teachers abuse the office, we shall receive greater condemnation than those who are mere hearers (cf. Luke 12, 42-46). CALVIN, like English Version, translates, “Masters,” i. e., self-constituted censors and reprovers of others. Ch. 4, 12 accords with this view. 2. all—The Greek implies

'all without exception:" even the apostles. offend not—lit., stumbleth not: is void of offence or slip in word: in which respect one is especially tried who sets up to be a "teacher." 3. Behold—The best authorities read, "but it," i. e., Now whensoever (In the case) of horses (such is the emphatic position of "horses" in the Greek) we put the bits (so lit., the customary bits) into their mouths that they may obey us, we turn about also their whole body. This is to illustrate now man turns about his whole body with the little tongue. "The same applies to the pen, which is the substitute for the tongue among the absent." [BEN-
GEL.] 4. Not only animals, but even ships. the governor listeth—lit., the impulse of the steersman pleaseth. The feeling which moves the tongue corresponds with this. 5. boasteth great things—There is great moment in what the careless think "little" things. [BEN-GEL.] Cf. "a world," "the course of nature," "hell," v. 6, which illustrate how the little tongue's great words produce great mischief. how great a matter a little fire kindleth—The best MSS. read, "how little a fire kindleth how great a," &c. ALFORD, for "matter," translates, "forest." But GROTIUS translates as English Version, "material for burning:" a pile of fuel. 6. Translate, "The tongue, that world of iniquity, is a fire." As man's little world is an image of the greater world, the universe, so the tongue is an image of the former. [BEN-
GEL.] so—Omitted in the oldest authorities, is—lit., is constituted. "The tongue is (constituted), among the members, the one which defileth," &c. (viz., as fire defiles with its smoke). course of nature—"the orb (cycle) of creation." setteth on fire . . . is set on fire—habitually and continually. Whilst a man inflames others, he passes out of his own power, being consumed in the flame himself. of hell—i. e., of the devil. Greek, "Gehenna;" found here only and in Matthew 5.22. St. James has much in common with the Sermon on the Mount (Proverbs 16.27). 7. every kind—rather, "every nature" (i. e., natural disposition and characteristic power). of beasts—i. e., quadrupeds of every disposition; as distinguished from the three other classes of creation, "birds, creeping things (the Greek includes not merely 'serpents,' as English Version), and things in the sea." is tamed, and hath been—is continually being tamed, and hath been so long ago. of mankind—rather, "by the nature of man;" man's characteristic power taming that of the inferior animals. The dative in the Greek may imply, "Hath suffered itself to be brought into tame subjection to the nature of men." So it shall be in the millennial world; even now man, by gentle firmness, may tame the inferior animal, and even elevate its nature. 8. no man—lit., no one of men: neither can a man control his neighbours, nor even his own tongue. Hence the truth of v. 2 appears, unruly evil—The Greek implies that it is at once restless and incapable of restraint. Nay, though nature has hedged it in with a double barrier of the lips and teeth, it bursts from its barriers to assail and ruin men. [ESTRUS.] deadly—lit., death-bearing. 9. God—The oldest authorities read, "Lord." "Him who is Lord and Father." The uncommonness of the application of "Lord" to the Father, doubtless caused the change in modern texts to "God" (ch. 1.27). But as Messiah is called "Father," Isaiah 9.6, so God the Father is called by the Son's title, "Lord;" showing the unity of the Godhead. "Father" implies His paternal love; "Lord," His dominion. men, which—not "men who;" for what is meant is not particular men, but men generically. [AL-FORD.] are made after . . . similitude of God—Though in a great measure man has lost the likeness of God in which he was originally made, yet enough of it still remains to show what once it was, and what in regenerated and restored man it shall be. We ought to reverence this remnant and earnest of what man shall be in ourselves and in others. "Absalom has fallen from his father's favour, but the people still recognize him to be the king's son." [BEN-GEL.] Man resembles in humanity the Son of man, "the express image of His person" (Hebrews 1.3), cf. Genesis 1.26; 1 John 4.20. In the passage, Genesis 1.26, "image" and "likeness" are distinct: "image," according to the Alexandrians, was something in which men were created, being common to all, and continuing to man after the fall, while the "likeness" was something toward which man was created, to strive after and attain it: the former marks man's physical and intellectual, the latter his moral pre-eminence. 10. The tongue, says Æsop, is at once the best and the worst of things. So in a fable, a man with the same breath blows hot and cold. "Life and death are in the power of the tongue" (cf. Psalm 62.4). brethren—an appeal to their consciences by their brotherhood in Christ. ought not so to be—a mild appeal, leaving it to themselves to understand that such conduct deserves the most severe reprobation. 11. fountain—an image of the heart: as the aperture (so the Greek for "place" is lit.) of the fountain is an image of man's mouth. The image here is appropriate to the scene of the Epistle, Palestine, wherein salt and bitter springs are found. Though "sweet" springs are sometimes found near, yet "sweet and bitter" (water) do not flow "at the same place" (aperture). Grace can make the same mouth that "sent forth the bitter" once, send forth the sweet for the time to come: as the wood (typical of Christ's cross) changed Marah's bitter water into sweet. 12. Transition from the mouth to the heart. Can the fig tree, &c.—Implying that it is an impossibility: as before in v. 10 he had said it "ought not so to be." St. James does not, as Matthew 7.16, 17, make the question, "Do men gather figs of thistles?" His argument is, No tree "can" bring forth fruit inconsistent with its nature, as e. g., the fig tree, olive berries: so if a man speaks bitterly, and afterwards speaks good words, the latter must be so only seemingly, and in hypocrisy, they cannot be real. so can no fountain . . . salt . . . and fresh—The oldest authorities read, "Neither can a salt (water spring) yield fresh." So the mouth that emits cursing, cannot really emit also blessing. 13. Who—(cf. Psalm 34.12, 13.) All wish to appear "wise:" few are so. show—"by works," and not merely by profession, referring to ch. 2.18. out of a good conversation his works—by general "good conduct" manifested in particular "works." "Wisdom" and "knowledge," without these being "shown," are as dead as faith would be without works. [ALFORD.] with meekness of wisdom—with the meekness inseparable from true wisdom. 14. if ye have—as is the case (this is implied in the Greek indicative). bitter—Ephesians 4.31, "bitterness," envying—rather, "emulation," or lit., zeal: kindly, generous emulation, or zeal, is not condemned, but that which is "bitter." [BEN-GEL.] strife—rather, " rivalry," in your hearts—from which flow your words and deeds, as from a fountain. glory not, and lie not against the truth—to boast of your wisdom is virtually a lying against the truth (the gospel), whilst your lives belie your glorying. Ver. 15; ch. 1.18, "The word of truth." Romans 2.17, 23, speaks similarly of the same contentious Jewish Christians. 15. This wisdom—in which ye "glory," as if ye were "wise" (v. 13, 14). descendeth not from above—lit., "is not one descending," &c.: "from the Father of lights" (true illumination and wisdom), ch. 1.17; through "the Spirit of truth," John 15.26. earthly—opposed to heavenly. Distinct from "earthly," 1 Corinthians 15.47. Earthly is what is in the earth; earthly, what is of the earth. sensual—lit., animal-like: the wisdom of the "natural" (the same Greek) man, not born again of God: "not having the Spirit" (Jude 19). devilish—in its origin (from "hell," v. 6; not from God, the Giver of true wisdom, ch. 1.5), and also in its character, which accords with its origin. Earthly, sensual, and devilish, answer to the three spiritual foes of man, the world, the flesh, and the devil. 16. envying—So English Version translates the Greek, which usually means "zeal," "emulation," in Romans 13.13. "The envious man stands in his own light. He thinks his candle cannot shine in the presence of another's sun. He aims directly at men, obliquely at God, who makes men to differ." strife— rivalry. [ALFORD.] confusion—lit., tumultuous anarchy: both in society (translated "commotions," Luke 21.9; "tumults," 2 Corinthians 6.5), and in the individual mind; in contrast to the "peaceable" composure of true "wisdom," v. 17. St. James does not honour such effects of this earthly wisdom with the name

"fruit," as he does in the case of the wisdom from above. Ver. 18; cf. Galatians 5. 19-23, "Works of the flesh . . . fruit of the Spirit." 17. first pure—lit., chaste, sanctified; pure from all that is "earthly, sensual (animal), devilish" (v. 15). This is put, "first of all," before "peaceable," because there is an unholy peace with the world which makes no distinction between clean and unclean. Cf. "undefiled" and "unspotted from the world," ch. 1. 27; 4. 4, 8, "purify . . . hearts;" 1 Peter 1. 22, "purified . . . souls" (the same Greek). Ministers must not preach before a purifying change of heart, "Peace," where there is no peace. Seven (the perfect number) characteristic peculiarities of true wisdom are enumerated. Purity or sanctity is put first, because it has respect both to God and to ourselves; the six that follow regard our fellow-men. Our first concern is to have in ourselves sanctity; our second, to be at peace with men. gentle—"forbearing;" making allowances for others; lenient towards neighbours, as to the DUTIES they owe us. easy to be entreated—lit., easily persuaded, tractable; not harsh as to a neighbour's FAULTS. full of mercy—as to a neighbour's MISERIES. full of . . . good fruits—contrasted with "every evil work," v. 16. without partiality—recurring to the warning against partial "respect to persons," ch. 2. 1, 4, 9. ALFORD translates as the Greek is translated, ch. 1. 6, "waving," "without doubting." But thus there would be an epithet referring to one's self inserted amidst those referring to one's conduct towards others. English Version is therefore better. without hypocrisy—Not as ALFORD explains from ch. 1. 22, 26, "Without deceiving yourselves" with the name without the reality of religion. For it must refer, like the rest of the six epithets, to our relations to others; our peaceableness and mercy towards others must be "without dissimulation." 18. "The peaceable fruit of righteousness." He says righteousness, because it is itself the true wisdom. As in the case of the earthly wisdom, after the characteristic description came its results; so in this verse, in the case of the heavenly wisdom. There the results were present; here, future. fruit . . . sown—Cf. Psalm 97. 11; Isaiah 61. 3, "trees of righteousness." Anticipatory, i. e., the seed whose "fruit," viz., "righteousness," shall be ultimately reaped, is now "sown in peace." "Righteousness," now in germ, when fully developed as "fruit" shall be itself the everlasting reward of the righteous. As "sowing in peace" (cf. "sown in dishonour," 1 Corinthians 15. 43) produces the "fruit of righteousness," so conversely "the work" and "effect of righteousness" is "peace." of them that make peace—"by (implying also that it is for them, and to their good) them that work peace." They, and they alone, are "blessed," "Peacemakers," not merely they who reconcile others, but who work peace. "Cultivate peace." [ESTIUS.] Those truly wise towards God, whilst peaceable and tolerant towards their neighbours, yet make it their chief concern to sow righteousness, not cloaking men's sins, but reproving them with such peaceable moderation as to be the physicians, rather than the executioners, of sinners. [CALVIN.]

CHAPTER IV.

Ver. 1-17. AGAINST FIGHTINGS AND THEIR SOURCE; WORLDLY LUSTS; UNCHARITABLE JUDGMENTS, AND PRESUMPTUOUS RECKONING ON THE FUTURE. 1. whence—The cause of quarrels is often sought in external circumstances, whereas internal lusts are the true origin. wars, &c.—contrasted with the "peace" of heavenly wisdom. "Fightings" are the active carrying on of "wars." The best authorities have a second "whence" before "fightings." Tumults marked the era before the destruction of Jerusalem when St. James wrote. He indirectly alludes to these. The members are the first sent of war; thence it passes to conflict between man and man, nation and nation. come they not, &c.—an appeal to their consciences. lusts—lit., pleasures, i. e., the lusts which prompt you to "desire" (Note, v. 2) pleasures; whence you seek self at the cost of your neighbour, and hence flow "fightings. that war—"campaign, as an army of soldiers encamped within" [ALFORD] the soul; tumultuously war against the interests of your fellow-men, whilst lusting to advance self. But whilst warring thus against others, they (without his knowledge) war against the soul of the man himself, and against the Spirit; therefore they must be "mortified" by the Christian. 2. Ye lust—A different Greek word from that in v. 1. "Ye desire;" lit., ye set your mind or heart on an object. have not—The lust of desire does not ensure the actual possession. Hence "ye kill" (not as Margin, without any old authority, "envy") to ensure possession. Not probably in the case of professing Christians of that day in a literal sense, but "kill and envy" 'as the Greek for "desire to have" should be translated, i. e., harass and oppress through envy. [DRUSTUS.] Cf. Zechariah 11. 5, "slay;" through envy, hate, and desire to get out of your way, and so are "murderers" in God's eyes. [ESTIUS.] If literal murder [ALFORD] were meant, I do not think it would occur so early in the series; nor had Christians then as yet reached so open criminality. In the Spirit's application of the passage to all ages, literal killing is included, flowing from the desire to possess—so David and Ahab. There is a climax: "Ye desire," the individual lust for an object; "ye kill and envy," the feeling and action of individuals against individuals; "ye fight and war," the action of many against many. ye have not, because ye ask not—God promises to those who pray, not to those who fight. The petition of the lustful, murderous, and contentious is not recognized by God as prayer. If ye prayed, there would be no "wars and fightings." Thus this last clause is an answer to the question, v. 1, "Whence come wars and fightings?" 3. Some of them are supposed to say in objection, But we do "ask" (pray), cf. v. 2. St. James replies, It is not enough to ask for good things, but we must ask with a good spirit and intention. "Ye ask amiss, that ye may consume it (your object of prayer) upon (lit., in) your lusts" (lit., pleasures); not that ye may have the things you need for the service of God. Contrast ch. 1. 5 with Matthew 6. 31, 32. If ye prayed aright, all your proper wants would be supplied; the improper cravings which produce "wars and fightings" would then cease. Even believers' prayers are often best answered when their desires are most opposed. 4. The oldest MSS. omit "adulterers and," and read simply, "Ye adulteresses." God is the rightful husband; the men of the world are regarded collectively as one adulteress, and individually as adulteresses. the world—in so far as the men of it and their motives and acts are aliens to God, e. g., its selfish "lusts" (v. 3), and covetous and ambitious "wars and fightings" (v. 1). enmity—not merely "inimical;" a state of enmity, and that enmity itself. Cf. 1 John 2. 15, "love . . . the world . . . the love of the Father." whosoever . . . will be—The Greek is emphatic, "shall be resolved to be." Whether he succeed or not, if his wish be to be the friend of the world, he renders himself, becomes (so the Greek for "is") by the very fact, "the enemy of God." Contrast "Abraham the friend of God." 5. in vain—No word of Scripture can be so. The quotation here, as in Ephesians 5. 14, seems to be not so much from a particular passage as one gathered by St. James under inspiration from the general tenor of such passages in both the Old and New Testaments, as Numbers 14. 29; Proverbs 21. 10; Galatians 5. 17. spirit that dwelleth in us—Other MSS. read, "That God hath made to dwell in us" (viz., at Pentecost). If so translated, "Does the (Holy) Spirit that God hath placed in us lust to (towards) envy" (viz., as ye do in your worldly "wars and fightings"?) Certainly not; ye are therefore walking in the flesh, not in the Spirit, whilst ye thus lust towards, i. e., with envy against one another. The friendship of the world tends to breed envy; the Spirit produces very different fruit. ALFORD attributes the epithet "with envy," in the unwarrantable sense of jealously, to the Holy Spirit: "The Spirit jealously desires us for His own." In English Version the sense is, "the (natural) spirit that hath its dwelling in us lusts with (lit., to, or towards) envy." Ye lust, and because ye have not what ye lust after (v. 1, 2), ye envy your neighbour who has, and so the spirit of envy leads you on to "fight." St. James also here refers to ch. 3. 14, 16. 6. But—Nay, rather. ho—God, giveth more grace—ever-increasing grace; the farther ye depart from "envy," [BENGEI.] he saith—The same God who causes His spirit to dwell in believers (v. 5), by the Spirit also speaks in Scripture. The quotation here is probably from Proverbs 3. 34; as probably Proverbs 21. 10 was generally referred to in v. 5. In Hebrew it is "scorneth the scorners," viz., those who think "Scripture speaketh in vain." resisteth—lit., setteth Himself in array against; even as they, like Pharaoh, set themselves against Him. God repays sinners in their own coin. "Pride" is the mother of "envy" (v. 5); it is peculiarly satanic, for by it Satan fell. the proud—The Greek means in derivation one who shows himself above his fellows, and so lifts himself against God. the humble—the unvenious, uncovetous, and unambitious as to the world. Contrast v. 4. 7. Submit to . . . God—so ye shall be among "the humble," v. 6; also v. 10; 1 Peter 5. 6. Resist . . . devil—Under his banner pride and envy are enlisted in the world; resist his temptations to these. Faith, humble prayers, and heavenly wisdom, are the weapons of resistance. The language is taken from warfare. "Submit" as a good soldier puts himself in complete subjection to his captain. "Resist," stand bravely against. he will flee—translate, "he shall flee." For it is a promise of God, not a mere assurance from man to man. [ALFORD.] He shall flee worsted as he did from Christ. 8. Draw nigh to God—So "cleave unto Him," Deuteronomy 30. 20, viz., by prayerfully (v. 2, 3) "resisting Satan," who would oppose our access to God. he will draw nigh—propitious. Cleanse . . . hands—the outward instruments of action. None but the clean-handed can ascend into the hill of the Lord (justified through Christ, who alone was perfectly so, and as such "ascended" thither). purify . . . hearts—lit., make chaste of your spiritual adultery (v. 4, i. e., worldliness) your hearts. The inward source of all impurity. double-minded—divided between God and the world. The double-minded is at fault in heart; the sinner in his hands likewise. 9. Be afflicted, &c.—lit., Endure misery, i. e., mourn over your wretchedness through sin. Repent with deep sorrow instead of your present laughter. A blessed mourning. Contrast Isaiah 22. 12, 13; Luke 6. 25. St. James does not add here, as in ch. 5. 1, "howl," where he foretells the doom of the impenitent at the coming destruction of Jerusalem. heaviness—lit., falling of the countenance, casting down of the eyes. 10. in the sight of the Lord—as continually in the presence of Him who alone is worthy to be exalted: recognizing His presence in all your ways, the true incentive to humility. The tree, to grow upwards, must strike its roots deep downwards; so man, to be exalted, must have his mind deep-rooted in humility. In 1 Peter 5. 6, it is, Humble yourselves under the mighty hand of God, viz., in his dealings of Providence: a distinct thought from that here. lift you up—in part in this world, fully in the world to come. 11. Having mentioned sins of the tongue (ch. 3.), he shows here that evil-speaking flows from the same spirit of exalting self at the expense of one's neighbour as caused the "fightings" reprobated in this chapter (v. 1). Speak not evil—lit., Speak not against one another. brethren—Implying the inconsistency of such depreciatory speaking of one another in brethren. speaketh evil of the law—for the law in commanding, "Love thy neighbour as thyself" (ch. 2. 8), virtually condemns evil-speaking and judging. [ESTIUS.] Those who superciliously condemn the acts and words of others which do not please themselves, thus aiming at the reputation of sanctity, put their own moroseness in the place of the law, and claim to themselves a power of censuring above the law of God, condemning what the law permits. [CALVIN.] Such a one acts as though the law could not perform its own office of judging, but he must fly upon the office. [BENGEI.] This is the last mention of the law in the New Testament. ALFORD rightly takes the "law" to be the old moral law applied in its comprehensive spiritual fulness by Christ: "the law of liberty." If thou judge the law, thou art not a doer . . . but a judge—Setting aside the Christian brotherhood as all alike called to be doers of the law, in subjection to it, such a one arrogates the office of a judge. 12. There is one lawgiver—The best authorities read in addition, "And judge." Translate, "There is One (alone) who is (at once) Lawgiver and Judge, (namely) He who is able to save and destroy." Implying, God alone is Lawgiver and therefore Judge, since it is He alone who can execute His judgments; our inability in this respect shows our presumption in trying to act as judges, as though we were God. who art thou? &c.—The order in the Greek is emphatic, "But (inserted in oldest MSS.) thou, who art thou that?" &c. How rashly arrogant in judging thy fellows, and wrestling from God the office which belongs to Him over thee and THEM alike! another—The oldest authorities read, "thy neighbour." 13. Go to now—"Come now:" said to excite attention. ye that say—"boasting of the morrow," To-day or to-morrow—as if ye had the free choice of either day as a certainty. Others read, "To-day and to-morrow." such a city—lit., this the city (viz., the one present to the mind of the speaker). This city here, continue . . . a year—rather, "spend one year." Their language implies that when this one year is out, they purpose similarly settling plans for years to come. [BENGEI.] buy and sell—Their plans for the future are all worldly. 14. what—lit., of what nature is your life? i. e., how evanescent it is. It is even—Some oldest authorities read, "For ye are." BENGEI, with other old authorities, reads, "For it shall be," the future referring to the "morrow" (v. 13-15). The former expresses, "Ye yourselves are transitory:" so everything of yours, even your life, must partake of the same transitoriness. Received text has no old authority. and then vanisheth away—"afterwards vanishing as it came;" lit., afterwards (as it appeared) so vanishing. [ALFORD.] 15. Lit., "instead of your saying," &c. This refers to "ye that say" (v. 13). we shall live—The best MSS. read, "We shall both live and do," &c. The boasters spoke as if life, action, and the particular kind of action were in their power, whereas all three depend entirely on the will of the Lord. 16. now—as it is. rejoice in . . . boastings—"ye boast in arrogant presumptions," viz., vain confident fancies that the future is certain to you (v. 13). rejoicing—boasting. [BENGEI.] 17. The general principle illustrated by the particular example just discussed is here stated: knowledge without practice is imputed to a man as great and presumptuous sin. St. James reverts to the principle with which he started. Nothing more injures the soul than wasted impressions. Feelings exhaust themselves and evaporate, if not embodied in practice. As we will not act except we feel, so if we will not act out our feelings, we shall soon cease to feel.

CHAPTER V.

Ver. 1-20. WOES COMING ON THE WICKED RICH: BELIEVERS SHOULD BE PATIENT UNTO THE LORD'S COMING: VARIOUS EXHORTATIONS. 1. Go to now—Come now. A phrase to call solemn attention. ye rich—who have neglected the true enjoyment of riches, which consists in doing good. St. James intends this address to rich Jewish unbelievers, not so much for themselves, as for the saints, that they may bear with patience the violence of the rich (v. 7), knowing that God will speedily avenge them on their oppressors. [BENGEI.] miseries that shall come—lit., "that are coming upon you" unexpectedly and swiftly, viz., at the coming of the Lord (v. 7); primarily, at the destruction of Jerusalem; finally, at His visible coming to judge the world. 2. corrupted—about to be destroyed through God's curse on your oppression, whereby your riches are accumulated (v. 4). CALVIN thinks the sense is, Your riches perish without being of any use either to others or even to yourselves, for instance, your garments which are moth-eaten in your chests. garments . . . moth-eaten—Referring to Matthew 6. 19, 20. 3. is cankered—"rusted through." [ALFORD.] rust . . . witness against you—in the day of judgment, viz., that your riches were of no profit to any, lying unemployed and so contracting rust. shall eat your flesh—The rust which once ate your riches, shall then gnaw your conscience, accompanied with punishment which shall prey upon your bodies for ever. as . . . fire—not with the slow process of rusting, but with the swiftness of consuming fire. for the last days—ye have heaped together, not treasures as ye suppose (cf. Luke 12. 19), but wrath against the last days, viz., the coming judgment of the Lord. ALFORD translates more lit., "In these last days (before the coming judgment) ye laid up (worldly) treasure" to no profit, instead of repenting and seeking salvation (see note, v. 5). 4. Behold—calling attention to their coming doom as no vain threat. labourers—lit., workmen, of you kept back—So English Version rightly. Not as ALFORD, "erleth out from you." The "keeping back of the hire" was, on the part of the rich, virtually an act of "fraud," because the poor labourers were not immediately paid. The phrase is therefore not, "kept back by you," but "of you," the latter implying virtual, rather than overt fraud. St. James refers to Deuteronomy 24. 15, "At this day . . . give his hire, neither shall the sun go down upon it, lest he cry against thee unto the Lord, and it be sin unto thee." Many sins "cry" to heaven for vengeance which men tacitly take no account of, as unchastity and injustice. [BENGEL.] Sins peculiarly offensive to God are said to "cry" to Him. The rich ought to have given freely to the poor; their not doing so was sin. A still greater sin was their not paying their debts. Their greatest sin was not paying them to the poor, whose wages is their all. cries of them—a double cry: both that of the hire abstractly, and that of the labourers hired. the Lord of Sabaoth—Here only in the New Testament. In Romans 9. 29 it is a quotation. It is suited to the Jewish tone of the Epistle. It reminds the rich who think the poor have no protector, that the Lord of the whole hosts in heaven and earth is the guardian and avenger of the latter. He is identical with the "coming Lord" Jesus (v. 7). 5. Translate, "Ye have luxuriated . . . and wanted." The former expresses luxurious effeminacy; the latter, wantonness and prodigality. Their luxury was at the expense of the defrauded poor (v. 4). on the earth—the same earth which has been the scene of your wantonness, shall be the scene of the judgment coming on you: instead of earthly delights ye shall have punishments. nourished . . . hearts—*i. e., glutted your bodies like beasts to the full extent of your hearts' desire; ye live to eat, not eat to live. as in a day of slaughter—The oldest authorities omit "as." Ye are like beasts which eat to their hearts' content on the very day of their approaching slaughter, unconscious it is near. The phrase answers to "the last days," v. 3, which favours ALFORD's translation there, "in," not "for." 6. Ye have condemned . . . the just—The Greek aorist expresses, "Ye are accustomed to condemn, &c., the just." Their condemnation of Christ, "the Just," is foremost in St. James' mind. But all the Innocent blood shed, and to be shed, is included, the Holy Spirit comprehending St. James himself, called "the Just," who was slain in a tumult. See my Introduction. This gives a peculiar appropriateness to the expression in this verse, the same "as the righteous (just) man" (v. 16). The justice or righteousness of Jesus and His people is what peculiarly provoked the ungodly great men of the world. he doth not resist you—The very patience of the Just one is abused by the wicked as an incentive to boldness in violent persecution, as if they may do as they please with impunity: God doth "resist the proud" (ch. 4. 6); but Jesus as man, "as a sheep is dumb before the shearers, so He opened not His mouth:" so His people are meek under persecution. The day will come when God will resist (lit., set Himself in array against) His foes and theirs. 7. Be patient therefore—as judgment is so near (v. 1, 3), ye may well afford to be "patient" after the example of the unresisting Just one (v. 6). brethren—contrasted with the "rich" oppressors, v. 1-3. unto the coming of the Lord—Christ, when the trial of your patience shall cease. husbandman waiteth for—*i. e., patiently bears toils and delays through hope of the harvest at last. Its "preciousness" (cf. Psalm 126. 6, "precious seed") will more than compensate for all the past. Cf. the same image, Galatians 6. 3, 9. hath long patience for it—"over it," in respect to it. until he receive—"until it receive." [ALFORD.] Even if English Version be retained, the receiving of the early and latter rains is not to be understood as the object of his hope, but the harvest for which those rains are the necessary preliminary. The early rain fell at sowing-time, about November or December; the latter rain, about March or April, to mature the grain for harvest. The latter rain that shall precede the coming spiritual harvest, will probably be another Pentecost-like effusion of the Holy Ghost. 8. coming . . . draweth nigh—The Greek expresses present time and a settled state. 1 Peter 4. 7, "Is at hand." We are to live in a continued state of expectancy of the Lord's coming, as an event always nigh. Nothing can more "stabilish the heart" amidst present troubles than the realized expectation of His speedy coming. 9. Grudge not—rather "Murmur not;" "grumble not." The Greek is lit., "groan:" a half-suppressed murmur of impatience and harsh judgment, not uttered aloud or freely. Having exhorted them to patience in bearing wrongs from the wicked, he now exhorts them to a forbearing spirit as to the offences given by brethren. Christians, who bear the former patiently, sometimes are impatient at the latter, though much less grievous. lest . . . condemned—The best MS. authorities read, "judged." St. James refers to Matthew 7. 1, "Judge not lest ye be judged." To "murmur against one another" is virtually to judge, and so to become liable to be judged. Judge . . . before the door—Referring to Matthew 24. 33. The Greek is the same in both passages, and so ought to be translated here as there, "doors," plural. The phrase means "near at hand" (Genesis 4. 7, which in the oldest interpretations [the Targums of Jonathan and Jerusalem] is explained, "thy sin is reserved unto the judgment of the world to come," Cf. "the everlasting doors" (Psalm 24. 7, whence He shall come forth). The Lord's coming to destroy Jerusalem is primarily referred to; and ultimately, His coming again visibly to judgment. 10. example of suffering affliction—rather, simply, "of affliction," lit., "evil treatment." the prophets—who were especially persecuted, and therefore were especially "blessed." 11. count them happy—(Matthew 5. 10.) which endure—The oldest authorities read, "Which have endured," which suits the sense better than English Version: "Those who in past days, like the prophets and Job, have endured trials." Such, not those who "have lived in pleasure and been wanton on the earth" (v. 5), are "happy." patience—rather, "endurance," answering to "endure;" the Greek words similarly corresponding. Distinct from the Greek word for "patience," v. 10. The same word ought to be translated, "endurance," ch. 1. 3. He here reverts to the subject which he began with. Job—this passage shows the history of him is concerning a real, not an imaginary person; otherwise his case could not be quoted as an example at all. Though he showed much of impatience, yet he always returned to this, that he committed himself wholly to God, and at last showed a perfect spirit of enduring submission. and have seen—(with the eyes of your mind.) ALFORD translates from the old and genuine reading, "see also," &c. The old reading is, however, capable of being translated as English Version. the end of the Lord—the end which the Lord gave. If Job had much to "endure," remember also Job's happy "end." Hence, learn, though much tried, to "endure to the end." that—ALFORD, &c., translates, "inasmuch as," "for." pitiful . . . of tender mercy—the former refers to the feeling; the latter, to the act. His piety is shown in not laying on the patient endurer more trials than he is able to bear; His mercy, in His giving a happy "end" to the trials. [BENGEL.] 12. But above all—as swearing is utterly alien to the Christian meek "endurance" just recommended. swear not—through impatience, to which trials may tempt you (v. 10, 11). In contrast to this stands the proper use of the tongue, v. 13. St. James here refers to Matthew 5. 34, &c. let your yea be yea—do not use oaths in your every-day conversation, but let a simple affirmative or denial be deemed enough to establish your word. condemnation—lit., judgment, *viz., of "the Judge" who "standeth before the doors" (v. 9). 13. afflicted—referring to the "suffering affliction" (v. 10).

let him pray—not “swear” in rash impatience, merry—joyous in mind, stung psalms—of praise, St. Paul and Silas sang psalms even in affliction. 14. let him call for the elders—not some one of the elders, as Roman Catholics interpret it, to justify their usage in extreme unction. The prayers of the elders over the sick would be much the same as though the whole Church which they represent should pray. [BENGEL.] anointing him with oil—the usage which Christ committed to His apostles was afterwards continued with laying on of hands, as a token of the highest faculty of medicine in the Church, just as we find in 1 Corinthians 6. 2 the Church’s highest judicial function. Now that the miraculous gift of healing has been withdrawn for the most part, to use the sign where the reality is wanting would be unmeaning superstition. Cf. other apostolic usages now discontinued rightly, 1 Corinthians 11. 4-15; 16. 20. “Let them use oil who can by their prayers obtain recovery for the sick: let those who cannot do this, abstain from using the empty sign.” [WHITAKER.] Romish extreme unction is administered to those whose life is despaired of, to heal the soul, whereas St. James’ unction was to heal the body. CARDINAL CAJETAN (Commentary) admits that St. James cannot refer to extreme unction. Oil in the East, and especially among the Jews (see the Talmud, Jerusalem and Babylon), was much used as a curative agent. It was also a sign of the Divine grace. Hence it was an appropriate sign in performing miraculous cures. in the name of the Lord—by whom alone the miracle was performed: men were but the instruments. 15. prayer—He does not say the oil shall save: it is but the symbol, save—plainly not as Rome says, “save” the soul, but heal “the sick:” as the words, “the Lord shall raise him up,” prove. So the same Greek is translated, “made (thee) whole,” Matthew 9. 21, 22. and if . . . sins—for not all who are sick are so because of some special sins. Here a case is supposed of one visited with sickness for special sins, have committed—lit., be in a state of having committed sins, i. e., be under the consequences of sins committed, they—rather, it: his having committed sins shall be forgiven him. The connection of sin and sickness is implied in Isaiah 33. 24; Matthew 9. 2-5; John 5. 14. The absolution of the sick, retained in the Church of England, refers to the sins which the sick man confesses (v. 16) and repents of, whereby outward scandal has been given to the Church and the cause of religion; not to sins in their relation to God, the only Judge. 16. The oldest authorities read, “Confess, THEREFORE,” &c. Not only in the particular case of sickness, but universally confess, faults—your falls and offences, in relation to one another. The word is not the same as sins. Matthew 5. 23, 24; Luke 17. 4, illustrate the precept here. one to another—not to the priest, as Rome insists. The Church of England recommends in certain cases. Rome compels confession in all cases. Confession is desirable in the case of (1.) wrong done to a neighbour; (2.) when under a troubled conscience we ask counsel of a godly minister or friend as to how we may obtain God’s forgiveness and strength to sin no more, or when we desire their intercessory prayers for us (“Pray for one another”): “Confession may be made to any one who can pray” [BENGEL.]; (3.) open confession of sin before the Church and the world, in token of penitence. Not auricular confession. that ye may be healed—of your bodily sicknesses. Also that, if your sickness be the punishment of sin, the latter being forgiven on intercessory prayer, “ye may be healed” of the former. Also, that ye may be healed spiritually. effectual—intense and fervent, not “wavering” (ch. 1. 6). [BEZA.] “When energized” by the Spirit, as those were who performed miracles. [HAMMOND.] This suits the collocation of the Greek words and the sense well. A righteous man’s prayer is always heard generally, but his particular request for the healing of another was then likely to be granted when he was one possessing a special charism of the Spirit. ALFORD translates, “A *Avail*eth much in its working.” The “righteous” is one himself careful to avoid “faults,” and showing his faith by works (ch. 2. 24). 17. Elias . . . like passions as we—therefore it cannot be said that he was so raised above us as to afford no example applicable to common mortals like ourselves. prayed earnestly—lit., prayed with prayer: Hebraism for prayed intensely. Cf. Luke 22. 15, “With desire I have desired,” i. e., earnestly desired. ALFORD is wrong in saying, Elias’ prayer that it might not rain “is not even hinted at in the Old Testament history.” In 1 Kings 17. 1 it is plainly implied, “As the Lord God of Israel liveth, before whom I stand, there shall not be dew nor rain these years, but according to my word.” His prophecy of the fact was according to a Divine intimation given to him in answer to prayer. In jealousy for God’s honour (1 Kings 19. 10), and being of one mind with God in his abhorrence of apostasy, he prayed that the national idolatry should be punished with a national judgment, drought; and on Israel’s profession of repentance he prayed for the removal of the visitation, as is implied in 1 Kings 18. 39-42; cf. Luke 4. 25. three years, &c.—Cf. 1 Kings 18. 1, “The third year,” viz., from Elijah’s going to Zarephath; the prophecy (v. 1) was probably about five or six months previously. 18. prayed . . . and—i. e., and so. Mark the connection between the prayer and its accomplishment. her fruit—her usual and due fruit, heretofore withheld on account of sin. Three and a half years is the time also that the two witnesses prophesy who “have power to shut and open heaven that it rain not.” 19. The blessing of reclaiming an erring sinner by the mutual consent and intercessory prayer just recommended. do err—more lit., “be led astray.” the truth—the Gospel doctrine and precepts. one—lit., any; as “any” before. Every one ought to seek the salvation of every one. [BENGEL.] 20. Let him [the converted] know—for his comfort, and the encouragement of others to do likewise. shall save—Future. The salvation of the one so converted shall be manifested hereafter. shall hide a multitude of sins—not his own, but the sins of the converted. The Greek verb in the middle voice requires this. Proverbs 10. 12 refers to charity “covering” the sins of others before men; St. James to one’s effecting by the conversion of another that that other’s sins be covered before God, viz., with Christ’s atonement. He effects this by making the convert partaker in the Christian covenant for the remission of all sins. Though this hiding of sins was included in the previous “shall save,” St. James expresses it to mark in detail the greatness of the blessing conferred on the penitent through the converter’s instrumentality, and to incite others to the same good deed.

THE FIRST EPISTLE GENERAL OF

PETER.

INTRODUCTION.

ITS GENUINENESS is attested by 2 Peter 3. 1: on the authority of 2 Peter, see the Introduction. Also by POLYCARP (in EUSEBIUS, 4. 14), who, in writing to the Philippians, quotes many passages: in ch. 2. he quotes 1 Peter 1. 13, 21, and 8, 9; in ch. 5., 1 Peter 2. 11. EUSEBIUS says of PAPIAS, Ecclesiastical History, 3. 39, that he, too, quotes Peter's First Epistle. IRENEUS (Hæreses, 4. 9. 2) expressly mentions it; and in 4. 16. 5, 1 Peter 2. 16. CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA, Stromata, 1. 3., p. 544, quotes 1 Peter 2. 11, 12, 15, 16; and p. 562, 1 Peter 1. 21, 22; and 4., p. 584, 1 Peter 3. 14-17; and p. 585, 1 Peter 4. 12-14. ORIGEN (in EUSEBIUS, Ecclesiastical History, 6. 25) mentions this Epistle; in Homily 7, on Joshua, vol. ii., p. 63, he mentions both Epistles; and Comment on Psalm 3., and on John, he mentions 1 Peter 3. 18-21. TERTULLIAN, Scorp., c. 12, quotes expressly 1 Peter 2. 20, 21; and ch. 14., 1 Peter 2. 13, 17. EUSEBIUS states it as the opinion of those before him that this was among the universally acknowledged Epistles. The Peschito Syriac Version contains it. The fragment of the canon called MURATORI'S omits it. Excepting this, and the Paulician heretics, who rejected it, all ancient testimony is on its side. The internal evidence is equally strong. The author calls himself the apostle Peter, ch. 1. 1, and "a witness of Christ's sufferings," and an "elder," ch. 5. 1. The energy of the style harmonizes with the warmth of Peter's character; and, as ERASMUS says, this Epistle is full of apostolic dignity and authority, and is worthy of the leader among the apostles.

PETER'S PERSONAL HISTORY.—Simon, or Simcon, was a native of Bethsaida on the Sea of Galilee, son of Jonas or John. With his father and his brother Andrew he carried on trade as a fisherman at Capernaum, his subsequent place of abode. He was a married man, and tradition represents his wife's name as Concordia or Perpetua. CLEMENS ALEXANDRINUS says that she suffered martyrdom, her husband encouraging her to be faithful unto death, "Remember, dear, our Lord." His wife's mother was restored from a fever by Christ. He was brought to Jesus by his brother Andrew, who had been a disciple of John the Baptist, but was pointed to the Saviour as "the Lamb of God" by his master. Jesus, on first beholding him, gave him the name by which chiefly he is known, indicative of his subsequent character and work in the Church, "Peter" (Greek) or "Cephas" (Aramaic, a stone. He did not join our Lord finally until a subsequent period. The leading incidents in his apostolic life are well known: his walking on the troubled waters to meet Jesus, but sinking through doubting; his bold and clear acknowledgment of the Divine person and office of Jesus, notwithstanding the difficulties in the way of such belief, whence he was then also designated as the stone, or rock; but his rebuke of his Lord when announcing what was so unpalatable to carnal prejudices, Christ's coming passion and death; his passing from one extreme to the opposite, in reference to Christ's offer to wash his feet; his self-confident assertion that he would never forsake his Lord, whatever others might do, followed by his base denial of Christ thrice with curses; his deep penitence; Christ's full forgiveness and prophecy of his faithfulness unto death, after he had received from him a profession of "love" as often repeated as his previous denial. These incidents illustrate his character as zealous, pious, and ardently attached to the Lord, but at the same time impulsive in feeling, rather than calmly and continuously steadfast. Prompt in action, and ready to avow his convictions boldly, he was hasty in judgment, precipitate, and too self-confident in the assertion of his own steadfastness; the result was that, though he abounded in animal courage, his moral courage was too easily overcome by fear of man's opinion. A wonderful change was wrought in him by his restoration after his fall, through the grace of his risen Lord. His zeal and ardour became sanctified, being chastened by a spirit of unaffected humility. His love to the Lord was, if possible, increased, whilst his mode of manifesting it now was in doing and suffering for His name, rather than in loud protestations. Thus, when imprisoned and tried before the Sanhedrim for preaching Christ, he boldly avowed his determination to continue to do so. He is well called "the mouth of the apostles." His faithfulness led to his apprehension by Herod Agrippa, with a view to his execution, from which, however, he was delivered by the angel of the Lord.

After the ascension he took the lead in the Church; and on the descent of the Holy Spirit at Pentecost, he exercised the designed power of "the keys" of Christ's kingdom, by opening the door of the Church, in preaching, for the admission of thousands of Israelites; and still more so in opening (in obedience to a special revelation) an entrance to the "devout" (i. e., Jewish proselyte from heathendom) Gentile, Cornelius: the forerunner of the harvest gathered in from idolatrous Gentiles at Antioch. This explains in what sense Christ used as to him the words, "Upon this rock I will build my Church," viz., on the preaching of Christ, the true "Rock," by connection with whom only he was given the designation: a title shared in common on the same grounds by the rest of the apostles, as the first founders of the Church on Christ, "the chief corner-stone." A name is often given in Hebrew, not that the person is actually the thing itself, but has some special relation to it; as Elijah means Mighty Jehovah, so Simon is called Peter "the rock," not that he is so, save by connection with Jesus, the only true Rock (Isaiah 28. 16; 1 Corinthians 3. 11). As subsequently he identified himself with "Satan," and is therefore called so, in the same way, by his clear confession of Christ, the Rock, he became identified with Him, and is accordingly so called. It is certain that there is no instance on record of Peter's having ever claimed or exercised supremacy; on the contrary, he is represented as sent by the apostles at Jerusalem to confirm the Samaritans baptized by Philip the deacon; again at the council of Jerusalem, not he, but James the president, or leading bishop in the Church of that city, pronounced the authoritative decision: Acts 15. 19, "My sentence is," &c. A kind of primacy, doubtless (though certainly not supremacy), was given him on the ground of his age, and prominent earnestness, and boldness in taking the lead on many important occasions. Hence he is called "first" in enumerating the apostles. Hence, too, arise the phrases, "Peter and the Eleven," "Peter and the rest of the apostles;" and Paul, in going up to Jerusalem after his conversion, went to see Peter in particular.

Once only he again betrayed the same spirit of vacillation through fear of man's reproach which had caused his denial of his Lord. Though at the Jerusalem council he advocated the exemption of Gentile converts from the ceremonial observances of the law, yet he, after having associated in closest intercourse with the Gentiles at Antioch, withdrew from them, through dread of the prejudices of his Jewish brethren who came from James, and timidly dissembled his conviction of the religious equality of Jew and Gentile; for this Paul openly withstood and rebuked him; a plain refutation of his alleged supremacy and infallibility (except where specially inspired, as in writing his Epistles). In all other cases he showed himself to be, indeed, as Paul calls him, "a pillar." Subsequently we find him in "Babylon," whence he wrote this First Epistle to the Israelite believers of the dispersion, and the Gentile Christians united in Christ, in Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia.

JEROME (De Scriptorum Ecclesiasticorum, 1.) states that "Peter, after having been bishop of Antioch, and after having preached to the believers of the circumcison in Pontus, &c. (plainly inferred from ch. 1. 1), in the second year of Claudius went to Rome to refute Simon Magus, and for twenty-five years there held the episcopal chair, down to the last year of Nero, i. e., the 14th, by whom he was crucified with his head downwards, declaring himself unworthy to be crucified as his Lord, and was buried in the Vatican, near the triumphal way." EUSEBIUS, Chron. Ann. 3, also asserts his episcopate at Antioch; his assertion that Peter founded that Church contradicts Acts 11. 19-22. His journey to Rome to oppose Simon Magus arose from JUSTIN'S story of the statue found at Rome (really the statue of the Sabine god, Semo Sancus, or Hercules, mistaken as if Simon Magus were worshipped by that name, "Simoni Deo Sancto;" found in the Tiber in 1574, or on an island in the Tiber in 1662), combined with the account, Acts 8. 9-24. The twenty-five years' bishopric is chronologically impossible, as it would make Peter, at the interview with Paul at Antioch, to have been then for some years bishop of Rome! His crucifixion is certain from Christ's prophecy, John 21. 18, 19. DIONYSIUS OF CORINTH (in EUSEBIUS, Ecclesiastical History, 2. 25) asserted in an epistle to the Romans that Paul and Peter planted both the Roman and Corinthian churches, and endured martyrdom in Italy at the same time. So TERTULLIAN, Contra Marcion, 4. 5, and Præscriptio Hæreticorum, c. 36, 38. Also CAIUS, the presbyter of Rome, in EUSEBIUS, Ecclesiastical History, 2. 25, asserts that some memorials of their martyrdom were to be seen at Rome on the road to Ostia. So EUSEBIUS, Ecclesiastical History, 2. 25, and Demonstratio Evangelicæ, 3. 116. So LACTANTIUS, De Mortibus Persecutorum, c. 2. Many of the details are palpably false; whether the whole be so or not is dubious, considering the tendency to concentrate at Rome events of interest. [ALFORD.] What is certain is, that Peter was not there before the writing of the Epistle to the Romans (58 A. D.), otherwise he must have been mentioned in it; nor during Paul's first imprisonment at Rome, otherwise he would have been mentioned in some one of Paul's many other Epistles written from Rome; nor during Paul's second imprisonment, at least when he was writing the Second Epistle to Timothy, just before his martyrdom. He may have gone to Rome after Paul's death, and, as common tradition represents, been imprisoned in the Mamertine dungeon, and crucified on the Janiculum, on the eminence of St. Pietro in Montorio, and his remains deposited under the great altar in the centre of the famous basilica of St. Peter. AMBROSE, Ep. 33, Ed. Paris, 1586, p. 1022, relates that St. Peter, not long before his death, being overcome by the solicitations of his fellow-Christians to save himself, was flying from Rome when he was met by our Lord, and on asking, "Lord, whither goest thou?" received the answer, "I go to be crucified afresh." On this he returned and joyfully went to martyrdom. The church called "Domine quo vadis," on the Applan Way, commemorates the legend. It is not unlikely that the whole tradition is built on the connection which existed between Paul and Peter. As Paul, "the apostle of the uncircumcision," wrote Epistles to Galatia, Ephesus, and Colosse, and to Philemon at Colosse, making the Gentile Christians the persons prominently addressed, and the Jewish Christians subordinately so; so, vice versa, Peter, "the apostle of the circumcision," addressed the same churches, the Jewish Christians in them primarily, and the Gentile Christians also, secondarily.

TO WHOM HE ADDRESSES THIS EPISTLE.—The heading, ch. 1. 1, "to the elect strangers (spiritually pilgrims) of the dispersion" (Greek), clearly marks the Christians of the Jewish dispersion as prominently addressed, but still including also Gentile Christians as grafted into the Christian Jewish stock by adoption and faith, and so being part of the true Israel, ch. 1. 14; 2. 9, 10; 3. 6; and 4. 3, clearly prove this. Thus he, the apostle of the circumcision, sought to unite in one Christ Jew and Gentile, promoting thereby the same work and doctrine as Paul the apostle of the uncircumcision. The provinces are named by Peter in the heading in the order proceeding from north-east to south and west. Pontus was the country of the Christian Jew Aquila. To Galatia Paul paid two visits, founding and confirming churches. Crescens, his companion, went there about the time of Paul's last imprisonment, just before his martyrdom. An-cyra was subsequently its ecclesiastical metropolis. Men of Cappadocia, as well as of "Pontus" and "Asia," were among the hearers of Peter's effective sermon on the Pentecost whereon the Spirit descended on the Church; these probably brought home to their native land the first tidings of the Gospel. Proconsular "Asia" included Mysia, Lydia, Caria, Phrygia, Pisidia, and Lycaonia. In Lycaonia were the churches of Iconium, founded by Paul and Barnabas; of Lystra, Timothy's birth-place, where Paul was stoned at the instigation of the Jews; and of Derbe, the birth-place of Galus, or Gains. In Pisidia was Antioch, where Paul was the instrument of converting many, but was driven out by the Jews. In Caria was Miletus, containing doubtless a Christian Church. In Phrygia, Paul preached both times when visiting Galatia in its neighbourhood, and in it were the churches of Laodicea, Hierapolis, and Colosse, of which last Church Philemon and Onesimus were members, and Archippus and Epaphras leaders. In Lydia was the Philadelphian Church, favourably noticed Revelation 3. 7, &c.; that of Sardis, the capital, and of Thyatira, and of Ephesus, founded by Paul, and a scene of the labours of Aquila and Priscilla and Apollos, and subsequently of more than two whole years' labour of Paul again, and subsequently censured for falling from its first love in Revelation 2. 4. Smyrna of Ionia was in the same quarter, and as one of the seven churches receives unqualified praise. In Mysia was Pergamos. Troas, too, is known as the scene of Paul's preaching and raising Eutyclus to life, and of his subsequently staying for a time with Carpus. Of "Bithynia," no Church is expressly named in Scripture elsewhere. When Paul at an earlier period "assayed to go into Bithynia," the Spirit suffered him not. But afterwards, we infer from ch. 1. 1, the Spirit did impart the Gospel to that country, possibly by Peter's ministry. In government, these several churches, it appears from this Epistle (ch. 5. 1, 2, "feed," &c.), were much in the same state as when Paul addressed the Ephesian "elders" at Miletus (Acts 20. 17, 28, "feed") in very similar language; elders or presbyter-bishops ruled, whilst the apostles exercised the general superintendence. They were exposed to persecutions, though apparently not systematic, but rather annoyances and reproach arising from their not joining their heathen neighbours in riotous living, into which, however, some of them were in danger of falling. The evils which existed among themselves, and which are therefore reprov'd, were ambition and lucre-seeking on the part of the presbyters (ch. 5. 2, 3), evil thoughts and words among the members in general, and a want of sympathy and generosity towards one another.

HIS OBJECT seems to be, by the prospect of their heavenly portion and by Christ's example, to afford consolation to the persecuted, and prepare them for a greater approaching ordeal, and to exhort all, husbands, wives, servants, presbyters, and people, to a due discharge of relative duties, so as to give no handle to the enemy to reproach Christianity, but rather to win them to it, and so to establish them in "the true grace of God wherein they stand" (ch. 5. 12). See, however, note there, on the oldest reading. ALFORD rightly argues, that "exhorting and testifying" there, refer to Peter's exhortations throughout the Epistle grounded on testimony which he bears to the Gospel truth, already well known to his readers by the teaching of Paul in those churches. They were already introduced into (so the Greek, ch. 5. 12) this grace of God as their safe standing-ground. Cf. 1 Corinthians 15. 1, "I declare unto you the Gospel wherein ye stand." Therefore he does not, in this Epistle, set forth a complete statement of this Gospel doctrine of grace, but falls back on it as already known. Cf. ch. 1. 8, 13, "Ye know;" 3. 15; 2 Peter 3. 1. Not that Peter servilely copies the style and mode of teaching of Paul, but as an independent witness in his own style attests the same truths. We may divide the Epistle into (I.) The inscription (ch. 1. 1, 2). (II.) The stirring-up of a pure feeling in believers as born again of God. By the motive of hope to which God has regenerated us (v. 3-12); bringing forth the fruit of faith, considering the costly price paid for our redemption from sin (v. 14-21). Being purified by the Spirit unto love of the brethren as begotten of God's eternal word, as spiritual priest-kings, to whom alone Christ is precious (v. 22, ch. 2, 10); after Christ's example in suffering, maintaining a good conversation in every relation (v. 10, ch. 3, 14), and a good profession of faith as having in view Christ's once-offered sacrifice, and His future coming to judgment (v. 15, ch. 4, 11); and exhibiting patience in adversity, as looking for future glorification with Christ, (1.) in general as Christians, v. 12-19; (2.) each in his own sphere, ch. 5, 1-11. "The title 'Beloved' marks the separation of the second part from the first, ch. 2, 11; and of the third part from the second," ch. 4, 12. [BENGEI.] (III.) The conclusion.

TIME AND PLACE OF WRITING.—It was plainly before the open and systematic persecution of the later years of Nero had begun. That this Epistle was written after Paul's Epistles, even those written during his imprisonment at Rome, ending in A. D. 63, appears from the acquaintance which Peter in this Epistle shows he has with them. Cf. ch. 2, 13 with 1 Timothy 2, 2-4; 2, 18 with Ephesians 6, 5; 1, 2 with Ephesians 1, 4-7; 1, 3 with Ephesians 1, 3; 1, 14 with Romans 12, 2; 2, 6-10 with Romans 9, 32, 33; 2, 13 with Romans 13, 1-4; 2, 16 with Galatians 5, 13; 2, 18 with Ephesians 6, 5; 3, 1 with Ephesians 5, 22; 3, 9 with Romans 12, 17; 4, 9 with Philippians 2, 14 and Romans 12, 13 and Hebrews 13, 2; 4, 10 with Romans 12, 6-8; 5, 1 with Romans 8, 18; 5, 5 with Ephesians 5, 21; Philippians 2, 3, 5-8; 5, 8 with 1 Thessalonians 5, 6; 5, 14 with 1 Corinthians 16, 20. Moreover, in ch. 5, 13, Mark is mentioned as with Peter in Babylon. This must have been after Colossians 4, 10 (A. D. 61-63), when Mark was with Paul at Rome, but intending to go to Asia Minor. Again, in 2 Timothy 4, 11 (A. D. 67 or 68), Mark was in or near Ephesus, in Asia Minor, and Timothy is told to bring him to Rome. So that it is likely it was after this, viz., after Paul's martyrdom, that Mark joined Peter, and consequently that this Epistle was written. It is not likely that Peter would have entrenched on Paul's field of labour, the churches of Asia Minor, during Paul's lifetime. The death of the apostle of the uncircumcision, and the consequent need of some one to follow up his teachings, probably gave occasion to the testimony given by Peter to the same churches, collectively addressed, in behalf of the same truth. The relation in which the Pauline Gentile churches stood towards the apostles at Jerusalem favours this view. Even the Gentile Christians would naturally look to the spiritual fathers of the Church at Jerusalem, the centre whence the Gospel had emanated to them, for counsel wherewith to meet the pretensions of Judaizing Christians and heretics; and Peter, always prominent among the apostles in Jerusalem, would even when elsewhere feel a deep interest in them, especially when they were by death bereft of Paul's guidance. BRKS, Horæ Evangelicæ, suggests that false teachers may have appealed from Paul's doctrine to that of James and Peter. Peter then would naturally write to confirm the doctrines of grace, and tacitly show there was no difference between his teaching and Paul's. BRKS prefers dating the Epistle A. D. 53, after Paul's second visit to Galatia, when Silvanus was with him, and so could not have been with Peter (A. D. 54), and before his imprisonment at Rome, when Mark was with him, and so could not have been with Peter (A. D. 62); perhaps when Paul was detained at Cæsarea, and so debarred from personal intercourse with those churches. I prefer the view previously stated. This sets aside the tradition that Paul and Peter suffered martyrdom together at Rome. ORIGEN and EUSEBIUS' statement that Peter visited the churches of Asia in person seems very probable.

The PLACE of writing was doubtless Babylon on the Euphrates (ch. 5, 13). It is most improbable that in the midst of writing matter-of-fact communications and salutations in a remarkably plain Epistle, the symbolical language of prophecy (viz., "Babylon" for Rome) should be used. JOSEPHUS, Antiquities, 15, 2, 2; 3, 1, states that there was a great multitude of Jews in the Chaldean Babylon; it is therefore likely that "the apostle of the circumcision" would at some time or other visit them. Some have maintained that the Babylon meant was in Egypt, for that Mark preached in and around Alexandria after Peter's death, and therefore it is likely he did so along with that apostle in the same region previously. But no mention elsewhere in Scripture is made of this Egyptian Babylon, but only of the Chaldean one. And though towards the close of Caligula's reign a persecution drove the Jews thence to Seleucia, and a plague five years after still further thinned their numbers, yet this does not preclude their return and multiplication during the twenty years that elapsed between the plague and the writing of the Epistle. Moreover, the order in which the countries are enumerated, from north-east to south and west, is such as would be adopted by one writing from the Oriental Babylon on the Euphrates, not from Egypt or Rome. Indeed, COSMAS INDICOPLEUSTES, in the sixth century, understood the Babylon meant to be outside the Roman empire. Silvanus, Paul's companion, became subsequently Peter's, and was the carrier of this Epistle.

STYLE.—Fervour and practical truth, rather than logical reasoning, are the characteristics of this Epistle, as they were of its energetic, warm-hearted writer. His familiarity with Paul's Epistles shown in the language accords with what we should expect from the fact of Paul's having "communicated the Gospel which he preached among the Gentiles" (as revealed specially to him) to Peter among others "of reputation." Individualities occur, such as baptism, "the answer of a good conscience toward God" (ch. 4, 21); "consciousness of God" (Greek, ch. 2, 19, as a motive for enduring sufferings; "living hope" (ch. 1, 3); "an inheritance incorruptible, undefiled, and that fadeth not away" (ch. 1, 4); "kiss of charity" (ch. 5, 14). Christ is viewed less in relation to His past sufferings than as at present exalted and hereafter to be manifested in all His majesty. Glory and hope are prominent features in this Epistle (ch. 1, 8), so much so that WEISS entitles him "the apostle of hope." The realization of future bliss as near causes him to regard believers as but "strangers" and "sojourners" here. Chastened fervour, deep humility, and ardent love appear, just as we should expect from one who had been so graciously restored after his grievous fall. "Being converted," he truly does "strengthen his brethren." His fervour shows itself in often repeating the same thought in similar words.

In some passages he shows familiarity with the Epistle of James, the apostle of especial weight with the Jewish legalizing party, whose inspiration he thus confirms (cf. ch. 1, 6, 7 with James 1, 2, 3; 1, 24 with James 1, 10; 2, 1 with James 1, 21; 4, 8 with James 5, 20, both quoting Proverbs 10, 12; 5, 5 with James 4, 6, both quoting Proverbs 3, 34). In most of these cases Old Testament quotations are the common ground of both. "Strong susceptibility to outward impressions, liveliness of feeling, dexterity in handling subjects, dispose natures like that of Peter to repeat afresh the thoughts of others." [STEIGER.]

The diction of this Epistle and of his speeches in Acts is very similar: an undesigned coincidence, and so a mark of genuineness (cf. ch. 2, 7 with Acts 4, 11; 1, 12 with Acts 5, 32; 2, 24 with Acts 5, 30; 10, 39; 5, 1 with Acts 2, 32; 3, 15; 1, 10 with Acts 3, 18; 10, 43; 1, 21 with Acts 3, 15; 10, 40; 4, 5 with Acts 10, 42; 2, 24 with Acts 3, 19, 26).

There is, too, a recurrence to the language of the Lord at the last interview after His resurrection, recorded in John 21. Cf. "the Shepherd . . . of . . . souls," ch. 2, 25; "Feed the flock of God," "the chief Shepherd," ch. 5, 2, 4, with John 21, 15-17; "Feed my sheep . . . lambs;" also "Whom . . . ye love," ch. 1, 8; 2, 7, with John 21, 15-17; "Lovest thou me?"

and 2 Peter 1, 14, with John 21, 18, 19. WIESINGER well says, "He who in loving impatience cast himself into the sea to meet the Lord, is also the man who most earnestly testifies to the hope of his return; he who dated his own faith from the sufferings of his Master, is never weary in holding up the suffering form of the Lord before his readers to comfort and stimulate them; he before whom the death of a martyr is in assured expectation, is the man who, in the greatest variety of aspects, sets forth the duty, as well as the consolation, of suffering for Christ; as a rock of the Church he grounds his readers against the storm of present tribulation on the true Rock of ages."

CHAPTER I.

Ver. 1-25. ADDRESS TO THE ELECTED OF THE GODHEAD: THANKSGIVING FOR THE LIVING HOPE TO WHICH WE ARE BEGOTTEN, PRODUCING JOY AMIDST SUFFERINGS: THIS SALVATION AN OBJECT OF DEEPEST INTEREST TO PROPHETS AND TO ANGELS: ITS COSTLY PRICE A MOTIVE TO HOLINESS AND LOVE, AS WE ARE BORN AGAIN OF THE EVER-ABIDING WORD OF GOD. 1. Peter—Greek form of Cephas, man of rock. an apostle of Jesus Christ—"He who preaches otherwise than as a messenger of Christ, is not to be heard; if he preach as such, then it is all one as if thou didst hear Christ speaking in thy presence." [LUTHER.] to the strangers scattered—lit., "sojourners of the dispersion;" only in John 7, 35 and James 1, 1, in New Testament, and LXX., Psalm 147, 2, "the outcasts of Israel;" the designation peculiarly given to the Jews in their dispersed state throughout the world ever since the Babylonian captivity. These he, as the apostle of the circumcision, primarily addresses, but not in the limited temporal sense only; he regards their temporal condition as a shadow of their spiritual calling to be strangers and pilgrims on earth, looking for the heavenly Jerusalem as their home. So the Genile Christians, as the spiritual Israel, are included secondarily, as having the same high calling. He (ch. 1, 14; 2, 10; 4, 3) plainly refers to Christian Geniles (cf. v. 17; ch. 2, 11). Christians, if they rightly consider their calling, must never settle themselves here, but feel themselves travellers. As the Jews in their dispersion diffused through the nations the knowledge of the one God, preparatory to Christ's first advent, so Christians, by their dispersion among the unconverted, diffuse the knowledge of Christ, preparatory to His second advent. "The children of God scattered abroad" constitute one whole in Christ, who "gathers them together in one," now partially and in Spirit, hereafter perfectly and visibly. "Elect," in the Greek order, comes before "strangers;" elect, in relation to heaven, strangers, in relation to the earth. The election here is that of individuals to eternal life by the sovereign grace of God, as the sequel shows. "While each is certified of his own election by the Spirit, he receives no assurance concerning others, nor are we to be too inquisitive [John 21, 21, 22]; Peter numbers them among the elect, as they carried the appearance of having been regenerated." [CALVIN.] He calls the whole Church by the designation strictly belonging only to the better portion of them. [CALVIN.] The election to hearing, and that to eternal life, are distinct. Realization of our election is a strong motive to holiness. The minister invites all, yet does not hide the truth that in none but the elect will the preaching effect eternal blessing. As the chief fruit of exhortations, and even of threatenings, redounds to "the elect;" therefore, at the outset, Peter addresses them. STEIGER translates, To "the elect pilgrims who form the dispersion in Pontus," &c. The order of the provinces is that in which they would be viewed by one writing from the east from Babylon (ch. 5, 13); from north-east southwards to Galatia, south-east to Cappadocia, then Asia, and back to Bithynia, west of Pontus. Contrast the order, Acts 2, 9. He now was ministering to those same peoples as he preached to on Pentecost: "Parthians, Medes, Elamites, dwellers in Mesopotamia and Judea," i. e., the Jews now subject to the Parthians, whose capital was Babylon, where he laboured in person; "dwellers in Cappadocia, Pontus, Asia, Phrygia, Bithynia," the Asiatic dispersion derived from Babylon, whom he ministers to by letter. 2. Foreknowledge—foreordaining love (v. 20), inseparable from God's foreknowledge, the origin from which, and pattern according to which, election takes place. Acts 2, 23, and Romans

11, 2, prove "foreknowledge" to be foreordination. God's foreknowledge is not the perception of any ground of action out of himself; still in it liberty is comprehended, and all absolute constraint debarred. [ANSELM in STEIGER.] For so the Son of God was "foreknown" (so the Greek for "foreordained," v. 20) to be the sacrificial Lamb, not against, or without His will, but His will rested in the will of the Father; this includes self-conscious action; nay, even cheerful acquiescence. The Hebrew and Greek "know" include approval and acknowledging as one's own. The Hebrew marks the oneness of loving and choosing, by having one word for both, Bachar (LXX., Greek, hairetizo). Peter descends from the eternal "election" of God through the new birth, to the believer's "sanctification," that from this he might again raise them through the consideration of their new birth to a "living hope" of the heavenly "inheritance" [HEIDEGGER.] The Divine three are introduced in their respective functions in redemption. through—Greek, "in;" the element in which we are elected. The "election" of God realized and manifested itself "IN" their sanctification. Believers are "sanctified through the offering of Christ once for all" (Hebrews 10, 10). "Thou must believe and know that thou art holy; not, however, through thine own piety, but through the blood of Christ." [LUTHER.] This is the true sanctification of the Spirit, to obey the Gospel, to trust in Christ. [BULLINGER.] sanctification—the Spirit's setting apart of the saint as consecrated to God. The execution of God's choice (Galatians 1, 4). God the Father gives us salvation by gratuitous election; the Son earns it by His blood-shedding; the Holy Spirit applies the merit of the Son to the soul by the Gospel word. [CALVIN.] Cf. Numbers 6, 24-26, the Old Testament triple blessing. unto obedience—the result or end aimed at by God as respects us, the obedience which consists in faith, and that which flows from faith; "obeying the truth through the Spirit" (v. 22). Romans 1, 5, "obedience to the faith," and obedience the fruit of faith. sprinkling, &c.—not in justification through the atonement once for all, which is expressed in the previous clauses, but (as the order proves) the daily being sprinkled by Christ's blood, and so cleansed from all sin, which is the privilege of one already justified and "walking in the light." Grace—the source of "peace," be multiplied—still further than already. Daniel 4, 1, "Ye have now peace and grace, but still not in perfection; therefore, ye must go on increasing until the old Adam be dead." [LUTHER.] 3. He begins, like Paul, in opening his Epistles with giving thanks to God for the greatness of the salvation; herein he looks forward (1.) into the future (v. 3-9); (2.) backward into the past (v. 10-12). [ALFORD.] Blessed—A distinct Greek word (eulogetos, "Blessed BE") is used of God, from that used of man (eulogemenos, "Blessed IS"). Father—This whole Epistle accords with the Lord's prayer; "Father," ch. 1, 3, 14, 17, 23; 2, 2; "Our," ch. 1, 4, end; "In heaven," ch. 1, 4; "Hallowed be thy name," ch. 1, 15, 16; 3, 15; "Thy kingdom come," ch. 2, 9; "Thy will be done," ch. 2, 15; 3, 17; 4, 2, 19; "daily bread," ch. 5, 7; "forgiveness of sins," ch. 4, 8, 1; "temptation," ch. 4, 12; "deliverance," ch. 4, 18 [BENGEL]; cf. ch. 3, 7 and 4, 7, for allusions to prayer. Barak, Hebrew "bless," is lit. to kneel. God, as the original source of blessing, must be blessed through all His works. abundant—Greek, "much," "full." That God's "mercy" should reach us, gully and enemies, proves its fulness. "Mercy" met our misery; "grace," our guilt, begotten us again—of the Spirit by the word (v. 23); whereas we were children of wrath naturally, and dead in sins. unto—so that we have. lively—Greek, "living." It has life in itself, gives life, and looks for life as its object. [DE WETTE.] Living is a favourite expression of St. Peter (v. 23; ch. 2, 4, 5). He delights in contemplating life overcoming death in the believer. Faith and love follow hope (v. 8, 21, 22). "(Unto) a lively hope" is further explained by "(To) an inheritance incorruptible . . . fadeth not away," and "(unto) salvation . . . ready to be revealed in the last time." I prefer with BENGEL and STEIGER to join as in Greek, "Unto a hope living (possessing life and vitality) through the resurrection of Jesus Christ." Faith, the subjective means of the spiritual resurrection of the soul, is wrought by the same power whereby Christ was raised from the dead. Baptism is an objective means (ch. 3, 21). Its moral fruit is a new life. The connection of our sonship with the resurrection appears also in Luke 20, 36; Acts 13, 33. Christ's resurrection is the cause of ours, (1.) as an efficient cause (1 Corinthians 15, 22); (2.) as an exemplary cause, all the saints being about to rise after the similitude of His resurrection. Our "hope" is, Christ rising from the dead hath ordained the power, and is become the pattern of the believer's resurrection. The soul, born again from its natural state into the life of grace, is after that born again unto the life of glory. Matthew 19, 23, "regeneration, when the Son of man shall sit in the throne of His glory;" the resurrection of our bodies is a kind of coming out of the womb of the earth and entering upon immortality, a nativity into another life. [BISHOP PEARSON.] The four causes of our salvation are, (1.) the primary cause, God's mercy; (2.) the proximate cause, Christ's death and resurrection; (3.) the formal cause, our regeneration; (4.) the final cause, our eternal bliss. As John is the disciple of love, so Paul of faith, and Peter of hope. Hence, Peter, most of all the apostles, urges the resurrection of Christ; an undesigned coincidence between the history and the Epistle, and so a proof of genuineness. Christ's resurrection was the occasion of his own restoration by Christ after his fall. 4. To an inheritance—the object of our "hope" (v. 3), which is therefore not a dead, but a "living" hope. The inheritance is the believer's already by title, being actually assigned to him; the entrance on its possession is future, and hoped for as a certainty. Being "begotten again" as a "son," he is an "heir," as earthly fathers beget children who shall inherit their goods. The inheritance is "salvation" (v. 5, 9); "the grace to be brought at the revelation of Christ" (v. 13); "a crown of glory that fadeth not away." incorruptible—not having within the germs of death. Negations of the imperfections which meet us on every side here are the chief means of conveying to our minds a conception of the heavenly things which "have not entered into the heart of man," and which we have not faculties now capable of fully knowing. Peter, sanguine, impulsive, and highly susceptible of outward impressions, was the more likely to feel painfully the deep-seated corruption which, lurking under the outward splendour of the loveliest of earthly things, dooms them soon to rottenness and decay. undefiled—not stained as earthly goods by sin, either in the acquiring, or in the using of them; unsusceptible of any stain. "The rich man is either a dishonest man himself, or the heir of a dishonest man." [JEROME.] Even Israel's inheritance was defiled by the people's sins. Defilement intrudes even on our holy things now, whereas God's service ought to be undefiled. that fadeth not away—Contrast v. 21. Even the most delicate part of the heavenly inheritance, its bloom, continues unfading. "In substance incorruptible; in purity undefiled; in beauty unfading." [ALFORD.] reserved—kept up (Colossians 1, 5, "laid up for you in heaven," 2 Timothy 4, 8); Greek perfect, expressing a fixed and abiding state, "which has been and is reserved." The inheritance is in security, beyond risk, out of the reach of Satan, though we for whom it is reserved are still in the midst of dangers. Still, if we be believers, we too, as well as the inheritance, are "kept" (the same Greek, John 17, 12) by Jesus safely (v. 5). in heaven—Greek, "in the heavens," where it can neither be destroyed nor plundered. It does not follow that, because it is now laid up in heaven, it shall not hereafter be on earth also. for you—It is secure not only in itself from all misfortune, but also from all alienation, so that no other can receive it in your stead. He had said us (v. 3), he now turns his address to the elect, in order to encourage and exhort them. 5. kept—Greek, "who are being guarded." He answers the objection, Of what use is it that salvation is "reserved" for us in heaven, as in a calm secure haven, when we are tossed in the world as on a troubled sea in the midst of a thousand wrecks? [CALVIN.] As the inheritance is "kept" (v. 4) safely for the far distant "heirs," so must they be "guarded" in their persons so as to be sure of reaching it. Neither shall it be wanting to them, nor they to it. "We are guarded in the world as our inheritance is kept in heaven." This defines the "you" of v. 4. The inheritance, remember, belongs only to those who "endure unto the end," being "guarded" by, or IN "the power of God, through faith." Contrast Luke 8, 13. God Himself is our sole guarding power. "It is His power which saves us from our enemies. It is His long-suffering which saves us from ourselves." [BENGEL.] Jude 1, "preserved in Christ Jesus;" Philippians 1, 6; 4, 7, "keep," Greek, "guard," as here. This guarding is effected, on the part of God, by His "power," the efficient cause; on the part of man, "through faith," the effective means. by—Greek, "IN." The believer lives spiritually in God, and in virtue of His power, and God lives in him. "IN" marks that the cause is inherent in the means, working organically through them with living influence, so that the means, in so far as the cause works organically through them, exist also in the cause. The power of God which guards the believer is no external force working upon him from without with mechanical necessity, but the spiritual power of God in which he lives, and with whose Spirit he is clothed. It comes down on, and then dwells in him, even as he is in it. [STEIGER.] Let none flatter himself he is being guarded by the power of God unto salvation, if he be not walking by faith. Neither speculative knowledge and reason, nor works of seeming charity, will avail, severed from faith. It is through faith that salvation is both received and kept. unto salvation—the final end of the new birth. "Salvation," not merely accomplished for us in title by Christ, and made over to us on our believing, but actually manifested, and finally completed. ready to be revealed—When Christ shall be revealed, it shall be revealed. The preparations for it are being made now, and began when Christ came: "All things are now ready;" the salvation is already accomplished, and only waits the Lord's time to be manifested: He "is ready to judge." last time—the last day, closing the day of grace; the day of judgment, of redemption, of the restitution of all things, and of perdition of the ungodly. 6. Wherein—In which prospect of final salvation. greatly rejoice—"exult with joy;" "are exuberantly glad." Salvation is realized by faith (v. 9) as a thing so actually present as to cause exulting joy in spite of existing afflictions. for a season—Greek, "for a little time." if need be—"if it be God's will that it should be so" [ALFORD], for not all believers are afflicted. One need not invite or lay a cross on himself, but only "take up" the cross which God imposes ("his cross"). 2 Timothy 3, 12 is not to be pressed too far. Not every believer, nor every sinner, is tried with afflictions. [THEOPHYLACT.] Some falsely think that notwithstanding our forgiveness in Christ, a kind of atonement, or expiation by suffering, is needed. ye are in heaviness—Greek, "ye were grieved." The "grieved" is regarded as past, the "exulting joy" present. Because the realized joy of the coming salvation makes the present grief seem as a thing of the past. At the first shock of affliction ye were grieved, but now by anticipation ye rejoice, regarding the present grief as past. through—Greek, "IN;" the element in which the grief has place. manifold—many and of various kinds (ch. 4, 12, 13). temptations—"trials" testing your faith. 7. Alm of the "temptations." trial—testing, proving. That your faith so proved "may be found (arist: once for all, as the result of its being proved on the judgment-day) unto (eventuating in) praise," &c., viz., the prize to be bestowed by the Judge. than that of gold—rather "than gold." though—"which perisheth, yet is tried with fire." If gold, though perishing (v. 18), is yet tried with fire in order to remove dross and test its genuineness, how much more does your faith, which sha!

never perish, need to pass through a fiery trial to remove whatever is defective, and to test its genuineness and full value? glory—"Honour" is not so strong as "glory." As "praise" is in words, so "honour" is in deeds: honorary reward. appearing—Translate as in v. 13, "revelation." At Christ's revelation shall take place also the revelation of the sons of God (Romans 8, 19, "manifestation," Greek, "revelation;") 1 John 3, 2, Greek, "manifested . . . manifested," for "appear . . . appear"). 8. not having seen, ye love—though in other cases it is knowledge of the person that produces love to him. They are more "blessed that have not seen and yet have believed," than they who believed because they have seen. On Peter's own love to Jesus, cf. John 21, 15-17. Though the apostles had seen Him, they now ceased to know Him merely after the flesh, in whom—connected with "believing;" the result of which is "ye rejoice" (Greek, exult). now—in the present state, as contrasted with the future state when believers "shall see His face." unspeakable—(1 Corinthians 2, 9.) full of glory—Greek, "glorified." A joy now already encompassed with glory. The "glory" is partly in present possession, through the presence of Christ, "the Lord of glory," in the soul; partly in assured anticipation. "The Christian's joy is bound up with love to Jesus; its ground is faith; it is not therefore either self-seeking or self-sufficient." [STEIGER.] 9. Receiving—in sure anticipation; "the end of your faith," i. e., its crowning consummation, finally-completed "salvation" (Peter here confirms Paul's teaching as to justification by faith): also receiving now the title to it and the first-fruits of it. In the next verse (v. 10) the "salvation" is represented as already present, whereas "the prophets" had it not as yet present. It must, therefore, in this verse, refer to the present: Deliverance now from a state of wrath: believers even now "receive salvation," though its full "revelation" is future. of . . . souls—The immortal soul was what was lost, so "salvation" primarily concerns the soul; the body shall share in redemption hereafter; the soul of the believer is saved already: an additional proof that "receiving . . . salvation" is here a thing present. 10. The magnitude of this "salvation" is proved by the earnestness with which "prophets" and even "angels" searched into it. Even from the beginning of the world this salvation has been testified to by the Holy Spirit. prophets—Though there is no Greek article, yet English Version is right, "the prophets" generally (including all the Old Testament inspired authors), as "the angels" similarly refer to them in general. inquired—perseveringly; so the Greek. Much more is manifested to us than by diligent inquiry and search the prophets attained. Still it is not said, they searched after it, but "concerning" (so the Greek for "of") it. They were already certain of the redemption being about to come. They did not like us fully see, but they desired to see the one and the same Christ whom we fully see in spirit. "As Simeon was anxiously desiring previously, and tranquil in peace only when he had seen Christ, so all the Old Testament saints saw Christ only hidden, and as it were absent—absent not in power and grace, but inasmuch as He was not yet manifested in the flesh." [CALVIN.] The prophets, as private individuals, had to reflect on the hidden and far-reaching sense of their own prophecies; because their words, as prophets, in their public function, were not so much their own as the Spirit's, speaking by and in them: thus Calaphas. A striking testimony to verbal inspiration; the words which the inspired authors wrote are God's words expressing the mind of the Spirit, which the writers themselves searched into, to fathom the deep and precious meaning, even as the believing readers did. "Searched" implies that they had determinate marks to go by in their search. the grace that should come unto you—viz., the grace of the New Testament: an earnest of "the grace" of perfected "salvation" "to be brought at the (second) revelation of Christ." Old Testament believers also possessed the grace of God; they were children of God, but it was as children in their nonage, so as to be like servants; whereas we enjoy the full privileges of adult sons. 11. what—

Greek, "In reference to what, or what manner of time." What expresses the time absolutely: what was to be the era of Messiah's coming; "what manner of time?" what events and features should characterize the time of His coming. The "or" implies that some of the prophets, if they could not as individuals discover the exact time, searched into its characteristic features and events. The Greek for "time" is the season, the epoch, the fit time in God's purposes. Spirit of Christ . . . in them—(Acts 16, 7, in oldest MSS., "the Spirit of Jesus;" Revelation 19, 10.) So JUSTIN MARTYR says, "Jesus was He who appeared and communed with Moses, Abraham, and the other patriarchs." CLEMENS ALEXANDRINUS calls Him "the Prophet of prophets, and Lord of all the prophetic spirit." did signify—"did give intimation." of—Greek, "the sufferers (appointed) unto Christ," or foretold in regard to Christ. "Christ" the anointed Mediator whose sufferings are the price of our "salvation" (v. 9, 10), and who is the channel of "the grace that should come unto you." the glory—Greek, "glories," viz., of His resurrection, of His ascension, of His judgment and coming kingdom, the necessary consequence of the sufferings. that should follow—Greek, "after these (sufferings)," ch. 3, 18-22; 5, 1. Since "the Spirit of Christ" is the Spirit of God, Christ is God. It is only because the Son of God was to become our Christ that He manifested Himself and the Father through Him in the Old Testament, and by the Holy Spirit, eternally proceeding from the Father and Himself, spake in the prophets. 12. Not only was the future revealed to them, but this also, that these revelations of the future were given them not for themselves, but for our good in Gospel times. This, so far from disheartening, only quickened them in unselfishly testifying in the Spirit for the partial good of their own generation (only of believers), and for the full benefit of posterity. Contrast in Gospel times, Revelation 22, 10. Not that their prophecies were unattended with spiritual instruction as to the Redeemer to their own generation, but the full light was not to be given till Messiah should come; it was well that they should have this "revealed" to them, lest they should be disheartened in not clearly discovering with all their inquiry and search the full particulars of the coming "salvation." To Daniel (Daniel 9, 25, 26) the "time" was revealed. Our immense privileges are thus brought forth by contrast with theirs, notwithstanding that they had the great honour of Christ's Spirit speaking in them; and this, as an incentive to still greater earnestness on our part than even they manifested (v. 13, &c.). us—The oldest MSS. read "you," as in v. 10. This verse implies that we, Christians, may understand the prophecies by the Spirit's aid in their most important part, viz., so far as they have been already fulfilled. with the Holy Ghost sent down—on Pentecost. The oldest MSS. omit Greek preposition en, i. e., "in;" then translate, "by." The Evangelists speaking by the Holy Spirit were infallible witnesses. "The Spirit of Christ" was in the prophets also (v. 11), but not manifestly, as in the case of the Christian Church and its first preachers, "SENT down from heaven." How favoured are we in being ministered to, as to "salvation," by prophets and apostles alike, the latter now announcing the same things as actually fulfilled which the former foretold. which things—"the things now reported unto you" by the evangelistic preachers, "Christ's sufferings and the glory that should follow" (v. 11, 12). angels—still higher than "the prophets" (v. 10). Angels do not any more than ourselves possess an INTUITIVE knowledge of redemption. "To look into" in Greek is lit., to bend over so as to look deeply into and see to the bottom of a thing. See note on same word, James 1, 25. As the cherubim stood bending over the mercy-seat, the emblem of redemption, in the holiest place, so the angels intently gaze upon and desire to fathom the depths of "the great mystery of godliness, God manifest in the flesh, justified in the Spirit, seen of angels." Their "ministry to the heirs of salvation" naturally disposes them to wish to penetrate this mystery as reflecting such glory on the love, justice, wisdom, and power of their and our God and Lord. They can know it only through its manifestation in the Church, as they personally have not the direct share in it that we have. "Angels have only the contrast between good and evil, without the power of conversion from sin to righteousness; witnessing such conversion in the Church, they long to penetrate the knowledge of the means whereby it is brought about." [HOFMAN in ALFORD.] 13. Wherefore—Seeing that the prophets ministered unto you in these high Gospel privileges which they did not themselves fully share in, though "searching" into them, and seeing that even angels "desire to look into" them, how earnest you ought to be and watchful in respect to them! gird up . . . loins—referring to Christ's own words, Luke 12. 35; an image taken from the way in which the Israelites ate the pass-over with the loose outer robe girded up about the waist with a girdle, as ready for a journey. Workmen, pilgrims, runners, wrestlers, and warriors (all of whom are types of the Christians), so gird themselves up, both to shorten the garment so as not to impede motion, and to gird up the body itself so as to be braced for action. The believer is to have his mind (mental powers) collected and always ready for Christ's coming. "Gather in the strength of your spirit." [HENSLEY.] Sobriety, i. e., spiritual self-restraint, lest one be overcome by the allurements of the world and of sense, and patient hopeful waiting for Christ's revelation, are the true ways of "girding up the loins of the mind." to the end—rather, "perfectly," so that there may be nothing deficient in your hope, no casting away of your confidence. Still, there may be an allusion to the "end" mentioned v. 9. Hope so perfectly (Greek teleios) as to reach unto the end (telos) of your faith and hope, viz., "the grace that is being brought unto you in (so the Greek) the revelation of Christ." As grace shall then be perfected, so you ought to hope perfectly. "Hope" is repeated from v. 3. The two appearances are but different stages of the ONE great revelation of Christ, comprising the New Testament from the beginning to the end. 14. From sobriety of spirit and endurance of hope he passes to obedience, holiness, and reverential fear. As—Marking their present actual character as "born again" (v. 3, 22). obedient—Greek, "children of obedience;" children to whom obedience is their characteristic and ruling nature, as a child is of the same nature as the mother and father. Contrast Ephesians 5. 6, "the children of disobedience." Cf. v. 17, "obeying the Father" whose "children" ye are. Having the obedience of faith (cf. v. 22) and so of practice (cf. v. 16, 18). "Faith is the highest obedience, because discharged to the highest command." [LUTHER.] fashioning—The outward fashion (Greek schema) is fleeting, and merely on the surface. The "form," or conformation in the New Testament, is something deeper and more perfect and essential. the former lusts in—which were characteristic of your state of ignorance of God: true of both Jews and Gentiles. The sanctification is first described negatively (v. 14, "not fashioning yourselves," &c.; the putting off the old man, even in the outward fashion, as well as in the inward conformation), then positively (v. 15, putting on the new man, cf. Ephesians 4. 22, 24). "Lusts" flow from the original birth-sin (inherited from our first parents, who by self-willed desire brought sin into the world), the lust which, ever since man has been alienated from God, seeks to fill up with earthly things the emptiness of his being; the manifold forms which the mother-lust assumes are called in the plural lusts. In the regenerate, as far as the new man is concerned, which constitutes his truest self, "sin" no longer exists; but in the flesh or old man it does. Hence arises the conflict, uninterceptedly maintained through life, wherein the new man in the main prevails, and at last completely. But the natural man knows only the combat of his lusts with one another, or with the law, without power to conquer them. 15. Lit., "But (rather) after the pattern of Him who hath called you (whose characteristic is that He is) holy, be (Greek, become) ye yourselves also holy." God is our grand model. God's calling is a frequently-urged motive in Peter's Epistles. Every one that begets, begets an offspring resembling himself. [EPIPHANIUS.] "Let the acts of the offspring indicate similarity to the Father." [AUGUSTINE.] conversation—deportment, course of life: one's way of going about, as distinguished from one's internal nature, to which it must outwardly correspond. Christians are already holy unto God by consecration; they must be so also in their outward walk and behaviour in all respects. The outward must correspond to the inward man. 16. Scripture is the true source of all authority in questions of doctrine and practice. Be ye . . . for I am—It is me ye have to do with. Ye are mine. Therefore abstain from Gentile pollutions. We are too prone to have respect unto men. [CALVIN.] As I am the fountain of holiness, being holy in my essence, be ye therefore zealous to be partakers of holiness, that ye may be as I also am. [DIDYMUS.] God is essentially holy: the creature is holy in so far as it is sanctified by God. God, in giving the command, is willing to give also the power to obey it, viz., through the sanctifying of the Spirit (v. 2). 17. if—i. e., "seeing that ye call on," for all the regenerate pray as children of God, "Our Father who art in heaven." the Father—rather, "Call upon as Father Him who without acceptance of persons (Acts 10. 34; Roman's 2. 11; James 2. 1, not accepting the Jew above the Gentile, 2 Chronicles 19. 7; Luke 20. 21; properly said of a judge not biased in judgment by respect of persons) judgeth," &c. The Father judgeth by His Son, His Representative, exercising His delegated authority (John 5. 22). This marks the harmonious and complete unity of the Trinity. work—Each man's work is one complete whole, whether good or bad. The particular works of each are manifestations of the general character of his life-work, whether it was of faith and love whereby alone we can please God and escape condemnation. pass—Greek, "conduct yourselves during," sojourning—the outward state of the Jews in their dispersion is an emblem of the sojourner-like state of all believers in this world, away from our true Fatherland. fear—reverential, not slavish. He who is your Father, is also your Judge—a thought which may well inspire reverential fear. THEOPHYLACT observes, A double fear is mentioned in Scripture: (1.) elementary, causing one to become serious; (2.) perfective: the latter is here the motive by which Peter urges them as sons of God to be obedient. Fear is not here opposed to assurance, but to carnal security: fear producing vigilant caution lest we offend God and backslide. "Fear and hope flow from the same fountain: fear prevents us from falling away from hope." [BENGE.] Though love has no fear in it, yet in our present state of imperfect love, it needs to have fear going ALONG WITH it as a subordinate principle. This fear drowns all other fears. The believer fears God, and so has none else to fear. Not to fear God is the greatest baseness and folly. The martyrs' more than mere human courage flowed from this. 18. Another motive to reverential, vigilant fear (v. 17) of displeasing God, the consideration of the costly price of our redemption from sin. Observe, it is we who are bought by the blood of Christ, not heaven. The blood of Christ is not in Scripture said to buy heaven for us: heaven is the "inheritance" (v. 4) given to us as sons, by the promise of God. corruptible—Cf. v. 7, "gold that perisheth," 23. silver and gold—Greek, "or." Cf. Peter's own words, Acts 3. 6: an undesignated coincidence. redeemed—Gold and silver being liable to corruption themselves, can free no one from spiritual and bodily death; they are therefore of too little value. Contrast v. 19, Christ's "precious blood." The Israelites were ransomed with half a shekel each, which went towards purchasing the lamb for the day's sacrifice (Exodus 30. 12-16; cf. Numbers 3. 44-51). But the Lamb who redeems the spiritual Israelites does so "without money or price." Devoted by sin to the justice of God, the Church of the first-born is redeemed from sin and the curse with Christ's precious blood (Matthew 20. 28; 1 Timothy 2. 6; Titus 2. 14; Revelation 5. 9). In all these passages there is the idea of substitution, the giving of one for another by way of a ransom or equivalent. Man is "sold under sin" is a slave; shut up under condemnation and the curse. The ransom was, therefore, paid to the righteously-incensed Judge, and was accepted as a vicarious satisfaction for our sin by God, inasmuch as it was His own love as well as righteousness which appointed it. An Israelite sold as a bond-servant for debt might be redeemed by one of his brethren. As, therefore, we could not redeem ourselves, Christ assumed our nature in order to become our nearest of kin and brother, and so our God or Redeemer. Holiness is the natural fruit of redemption "from our vain conversation;" for He by whom we are redeemed is also He for whom we are redeemed. "Without the righteous abolition of the curse, either there could be found no deliverance, or, what is impossible, the grace and righteousness of God must have come in collision" [STEIGER]; but now, Christ having borne the curse of our sin, frees from it those who are made God's children by His Spirit. vain—self-deceiving, unreal, and unprofitable: promising good which it does not perform. Cf. as to the Gentiles, Acts 14. 15; Romans 1. 21; Ephesians 4. 17; as to human philosophers, 1 Corinthians 3. 20; as to the disobedient Jews, Jeremiah 4. 14. conversation—course of life. To know what our sin is we must know what it cost. received by tradition from your fathers—The Jews' traditions. "Human piety is a vain blasphemy, and the greatest sin that a man can commit" [LUTHER]. There is only one Father to be imitated, v. 17; cf. Matthew 23. 9, the same antithesis. [BENGEL.] 19. precious—of inestimable value. The Greek order is, "With precious blood, as of a lamb without blemish (in itself) and without spot (contracted by contact with others), [even the blood] of Christ." Though very man, He remained pure in Himself ("without blemish"), and uninfected by any impression of sin from without ("without spot"), which would have unfitted Him for being our atoning Redeemer: so the passover lamb, and every sacrificial victim; so too, the Church, the Bride, by her union with Him. As Israel's redemption from Egypt required the blood of the paschal lamb, so our redemption from sin and the curse required the blood of Christ; "foreordained" (v. 20) from eternity, as the passover lamb was taken up on the tenth day of the month. 20. God's eternal foreordination of Christ's redeeming sacrifice, and completion of it in these last times for us, are an additional obligation on us to our maintaining a holy walk, considering how great things have been thus done for us. Peter's language in the history corresponds with this here: an undesigned coincidence and mark of genuineness. Redemption was no afterthought, or remedy of an unforeseen evil, devised at the time of its arising. God's foreordaining of the Redeemer refutes the slander that, on the Christian theory, there is a period of 4000 years of nothing but an incensed God. God chose us in Christ before the foundation of the world, manifest—in His incarnation in the fulness of the time. He existed from eternity before He was manifested. in these last times—1 Corinthians 10. 11, "the ends of the world." This last dispensation, made up of "times" marked by great changes, but still retaining a general unity, stretches from Christ's ascension to His coming to judgment. 21. by him—Cf. "the faith which is by Him," Acts 3. 16. Through Christ: His Spirit, obtained for us in His resurrection and ascension, enabling us to believe. This verse excludes all who do not "by Him believe in God," and includes all of every age and clime that do. Lit., "are believers in God." To believe IN (Greek eis) God expresses an internal trust: "by believing to love God, going INTO Him, and cleaving to Him, incorporated into His members. By this faith the ungodly is justified, so that thenceforth faith itself begins to work by love." [P. LOMBARD.] To believe ON (Greek epi, or dative case) God, expresses the confidence, which grounds itself on God, reposing on Him. "Faith IN (Greek en) His blood" (Romans 3. 25) implies that His blood is the element IN which faith has its proper and abiding place. Cf. with this verse, Acts 20. 21, "Repentance toward (Greek eis, 'into,' turning towards and going into) God and faith toward (Greek eis, 'into') Christ:" where, as there is but one article to both 'repentance' and 'faith,' the two are inseparably joined as together forming one truth; where repentance is, there faith is; when one knows God the Father spiritually, then he must know the Son by whom alone we can come to the Father. In Christ we have life: if we have not the doctrine of Christ, we have not God. The only living way to God is through Christ and His sacrifice. that raised him—The raising of Jesus by God is the special ground of our "believing;" (1.) because by it God declared openly His acceptance of Him as our righteous substitute; (2.) because by it and His glorification He received power, viz., the Holy Spirit, to impart to His elect "faith:" the same power enabling us to believe as raised Him from the dead. Our faith must not only be IN Christ, but BY and THROUGH Christ. "Since in Christ's resurrection and consequent dominion our safety is grounded, there 'faith' and 'hope' find their stay." [CALVIN.] that your faith and hope might be in God—the object and effect of God's raising Christ. He states what was the actual result and fact, not an exhortation, except indirectly. Your faith flows from His resurrection; your hope from God's having "given Him glory" (cf. v. 11, "glories"). Remember God's having raised and glorified Jesus as the anchor of your faith and hope in God, and so keep alive these graces. Apart from Christ we could have only feared, not believed and hoped in God. Cf. v. 3, 7-9, 13, on hope in connection with faith; love is introduced in v. 22. 22. purified . . . in obeying the truth—Greek, "in your (or the) obedience of (i. e., to) the truth" (the Gospel way of salvation), i. e., in the fact of your believing. Faith purifies the heart as giving it the only pure motive, love to God (Acts 15. 9; Romans 1. 5, "obedience to the faith"), through the Spirit—Omitted in the oldest MSS. The Holy Spirit is the purifier by bestowing the obedience of faith (v. 2; 1 Corinthians 12. 3). unto—with a view to: the proper result of the purifying of your hearts by faith. "For what end must we lead a chaste life? That we may thereby be saved? No; but for this, that we may serve our neighbour." [LUTHER.] unfeigned—Ch. 2. 1, 2, "laying aside . . . hypocrites . . . sincere." love of the brethren—i. e., of Christians. Brotherly love is distinct from common love. "The Christian loves primarily those in Christ; secondarily, all who might be in Christ, viz., all men, as Christ as man died for all, and as he hopes that they, too, may become his Christian brethren." [STEIGER.] BENGEL remarks that as here, so in 2 Peter 1. 5-7, "brotherly love" is preceded by the purifying graces, "faith, knowledge, and godliness," &c. Love to the brethren is the evidence of our regeneration and justification by faith. love one another—When the purifying by faith into love of the brethren has formed the habit, then the act follows, so that the "love" is at once habit and act. with a pure heart—The oldest MSS. read, "(love) from the heart." fervently—Greek, "intensely;" with all the powers on the stretch (ch. 4. 8). "Instantly" (Acts 26. 7). 23. Christian brotherhood flows from our new birth of an imperishable seed, the abiding word of God. This is the consideration urged here to lead us to exercise brotherly love. As natural relationship gives rise to natural affection, so spiritual relationship gives rise to spiritual, and therefore abiding love, even as the seed from which it springs is abiding, not transitory as earthly things. of . . . of . . . by—"The word of God" is not the material of the spiritual new birth, but its mean or medium. By means of the word the man receives the incorruptible seed of the Holy Spirit, and so becomes one "born again:" John 3. 3-5, "Born of water and the Spirit:" where there being but one Greek article to the two nouns, the close connection of the sign and the grace, or new birth signified, is implied. The word is the remote and anterior instrument; baptism, the proximate and sacramental instrument. The word is the instrument in relation to the individual; baptism, in relation to the Church as a society (James 1. 18). We are born again of the Spirit, yet not without the use of means, but by the word of God. The word is not the begetting principle itself, but only that by which it works: the vehicle of the mysterious germinating power. [ALFORD.] which liveth and abideth for ever—It is because the Spirit of God accompanies it that the word carries in it the germ of life. They who are so born again live and abide for ever, in contrast to those who sow to the flesh. "The Gospel bears incorruptible fruits, not dead works, because it is itself incorruptible." [BENGE.] The word is an eternal Divine power. For though the voice or speech vanishes, there still remains the kernel, the truth comprehended in the voice. This sinks into the heart and is living; yea, it is God Himself. So God to Moses, Exodus 4. 12, "I will be with thy mouth." [LUTHER.] The life is in God, yet it is communicated to us through the word. "The Gospel shall never cease, though its ministry shall." [CALOV.] The abiding resurrection glory is always connected with our regeneration by the Spirit. Regeneration beginning with renewing man's soul at the resurrection, passes on to the body, then to the whole world of nature. 24. Scripture proof that the word of God lives for ever, in contrast to man's natural frailty. If ye were born again of flesh, corruptible seed, ye must also perish again as the grass; but now that from which you have derived life remains eternally, and so also will render you eternal. flesh—man in his mere earthly nature. as—Omitted in some of the oldest MSS. of man—The oldest MSS. read, "of it" (i. e., of the flesh). "The glory" is the wisdom, strength, riches, learning, honour, beauty, art, virtue, and righteousness of the NATURAL man (expressed by "flesh"), which all are transitory (John 3. 6), not OF MAN (as English Version reads) absolutely, for the glory of man, in his true ideal realized in the believer, is eternal. withereth—Greek aorist; lit., "withered," i. e., is withered as a thing of the past. So also the Greek for "falleth" is "fell away," i. e., is fallen away: it no sooner is than it is gone. thereof—Omitted in the best MSS. and versions. "The grass" is the flesh: "the flower" its glory. 25. (Psalm 119. 89.) this is the word . . . preached unto you—That is eternal which is born of incorruptible seed (v. 24); but ye have received the incorruptible seed, the word (v. 25); therefore ye are born for eternity, and so are bound now to live for eternity (v. 22, 23). Ye have not far to look for the word; it is among you, even the joyful Gospel message which we preach. Doubt not that the Gospel preached to you by our brother Paul, and which ye have embraced, is the eternal truth. Thus the oneness of Paul and Peter's creed appears. See my Introduction, showing Peter addresses some of the same churches as Paul laboured among and wrote to.

CHAPTER II.

Ver. 1-25. EXHORTATIONS: To guileless feeding on the word by the sense of their privileges as new-born babes, living stones in the spiritual temple built on Christ the chief corner-stone, and royal priests, in contrast to their former state: also to abstinence from fleshly lusts, and to walk worthily in all relations of life, so that the world without which opposes them may be constrained to glorify God in seeing their good works. Christ, the grand pattern to follow in patience under suffering for well-doing. 1. laying aside—once for all; so the Greek aorist expresses, as a garment put off. The exhortation applies to Christians alone, for in none else is the new nature existing which, as "the inward man" (Ephesians 3. 16), can cast off the old as an outward thing, so that the Christian, through the continual renewal of his inward man, can also exhibit himself externally as a new man. But to unbelievers the demand is addressed, that inwardly, in regard to the nous (mind), they must become changed, meta-noesthai (re-pent). [STEIGER.] The "therefore" resumes the exhortation begun in ch. 1. 22. Seeing that ye are born again of an incorruptible seed, be not again entangled in evil, which "has no substantial being, but is an acting in contrariety to the being formed in us." [THEOPHYLACT.] "Malice," &c., are utterly inconsistent with the "love of the brethren," unto which ye have "purified your souls" (ch. 1. 22). The vices here are those which offend against the BROTHERLY LOVE inculcated above. Each succeeding one springs out of that which immediately precedes, so as to form a genealogy of the sins against love. Out of malice springs guile; out of guile, hypocrisies (pretending to be what we are not, and not showing what we really are; the opposite of "love unfeigned," and "without dissimulation"); out of hypocrisies, envies of those to whom we think ourselves obliged to play the hypocrite; out of envies, evil-speaking, malicious, envious detraction of others. Guile is the permanent disposition; hypocrisies the acts flowing from it. The guileless knows no envy. Cf. v. 2, "sincere," Greek, "guileless." "Malice delights in another's hurt; envy pines at another's good; guile imparts duplicity to the heart; hypocrisy (flattery) imparts duplicity to the tongue; evil-speaking wounds the character of another." [AUGUSTINE.] 2. new-born babes—altogether without "guile" (v. 1). As long as we are here we are "babes," in a specially tender relation to God (Isalah 40. 11). The childlike spirit is indispensable if we would enter heaven. "Milk" is here not elementary truths in contradistinction to more advanced Christian truths, as in 1 Corinthians 3. 2; Hebrews 5. 12, 13; but in contrast to "guile, hypocrisies," &c. (v. 1); the simplicity of Christian doctrine in general to the childlike spirit. The same "word of grace" which is the instrument in regeneration, is the instrument also of building up. "The mother of the child is also its natural nurse." [STEIGER.] The babe, instead of chemically analyzing, instinctively desires and feeds on the milk; so our part is not self-sufficient rationalizing and questioning, but simply receiving the truth in the love of it (Matthew 11. 25). desire—Greek, "have a yearning desire for," or "longing after," a natural impulse to the regenerate, "for as no one needs to teach new-born babes what food to take, knowing instinctively that a table is provided for them in their mother's breast," so the believer of himself thirsts after the word of God (Psalm 119). Cf. Tatius' language as to Achilles. of the word—Not as ALFORD, "spiritual," nor "reasonable," as English Version in Romans 12. 1. The Greek logos in Scripture is not used of the reason, or mind, but of the word; the preceding context requires that the word should be meant here; the adjective logikos follows the meaning of the noun logos, "word." James 1. 21, "Lay apart all filthiness, &c., and receive with meekness the engrained word," is exactly parallel, and confirms English Version here. sincere—Greek, "guileless." Cf. v. 1, "laying aside guile." IRENEUS says of heretics, They mix chalk with the milk. The article "the," implies that besides the well-known pure milk, the Gospel, there is no other pure, unadulterated doctrine; it alone can make us guileless (v. 1). grow—The oldest MSS. and versions read, "grow unto salvation." Being BORN again unto salvation, we are also to grow unto salvation. The end to which growth leads is perfected salvation. "Growth is the measure of the fulness of that, not only rescues from destruction, but positive blessedness, which is implied in salvation." [ALFORD.] thereby—Greek, "IN it;" fed on it; in its strength (Acts 11. 14). "The word is to be desired with appetite as the cause of life, to be swallowed in the hearing, to be chewed as cud is by rumination with the understanding, and to be digested by faith." [TERTULLIAN.] 3. Peter alludes to Psalm 34. 8. The first tastes of God's goodness are afterwards followed by fuller and happier experiences. A taste whets the appetite. [BENGE.] gracious—Greek, "good," benignant, kind; as God is revealed to us in Christ, "the Lord" (v. 4), we who are born again ought so to be good and kind to the brethren (ch. 1. 22). "Whosoever has not tasted the word to him it is not sweet; it has not reached the heart; but to them who have experienced it, who with the heart believe, 'Christ has been sent for me and is become my own; my miseries are His, and His life mine,' it tastes sweet." [LUTHER.] 4. coming—drawing near (same Greek as here, Hebrews 10. 22) by faith continually; present tense; not having come once for all at conversion. stone—Peter (i. e., a stone, named so by Christ) desires that all similarly should be living stones BUILT ON CHRIST, THE TRUE FOUNDATION-STONE; cf. his speech in Acts 4. 11. An undesigned coincidence and mark of genuineness. The Spirit foreseeing the Romanist perversion of Matthew 16. 18 (cf. 16. "Son of the LIVING God," which coincides with his language here, "the LIVING stone"), presciently makes Peter himself to refute it. He herein confirms Paul's teaching. Omit the as unto of English Version. Christ is positively termed the "living stone;" living, as having life in Himself from the beginning, and as raised from the dead to live evermore (Revelation 1.18) after His rejection by men, and so the source of life to us. Like no earthly rock, He lives and gives life. Cf. 1 Corinthians 10. 4, and the type, Exodus 17. 6; Numbers 20. 11. disallowed—rejected, reprobated; referred to also by Christ Himself: also by Paul; cf. the kindred prophecies, Isaiah 8. 14; Luke 2. 34. chosen of God—lit., "with (or in the presence and judgment of) God elect," or chosen out (v. 6). Many are alienated from the Gospel, because it is not everywhere in favour, but is on the contrary rejected by most men. Peter answers that, though rejected by men, Christ is peculiarly the stone of salvation honoured by God, first so designated by Jacob in his deathbed prophecy. 5. Ye also, as lively stones—partaking of the name and life which is in "THE LIVING STONE" (v. 4; 1 Corinthians 3. 11). Many names which belong to Christ in the singular are assigned to Christians in the plural. He is "THE Son," "High Priest," "King," "Lamb;" they, "sons," "priests," "kings," "sheep," "lambs." So the Shulamite called from Solomon. [BENGL.] are built up—Greek, "are being built up," as in Ephesians 2. 22. Not as ALFORD, "Be ye built up." Peter grounds his exhortations, v. 2, 11, &c., on their conscious sense of their high privileges as living stones in the course of being built up into a spiritual house (i. e., "the habitation of the Spirit"). priesthood—Christians are at once the spiritual temple and the priests of the temple: There are two Greek words for "temple;" hieron (the sacred place), the whole building, including the courts wherein the sacrifice was killed; and naos (the dwelling, viz., of God), the inner shrine wherein God peculiarly manifested Himself, and where, in the holiest place, the blood of the slain sacrifice was presented before Him. All believers alike, and not merely ministers, are now the dwelling of God (and are called the naos Greek, not the hieron) and priests unto God (Revelation 1. 6). The minister is not, like the Jewish priest (Greek hiericus), admitted nearer to God than the people, but merely for order's sake leads the spiritual services of the people. Priest is the abbreviation of presbyter in the Church of England Prayer Book, not corresponding to the Aaronic priest (hiericus, who offered literal sacrifices). Christ is the only literal hiericus-priest in the New Testament through whom alone we may always draw near to God. Cf. v. 9, "a royal priesthood," i. e., a body of priest-kings, such as was Melchisedec. The Spirit never, in New Testament, gives the name hiericus, or sacerdotal priest, to ministers of the Gospel. holy—consecrated to God. spiritual sacrifices—not the literal one of the mass, as the Romish self-styled disciples of Peter teach. Cf. Isaiah 56. 7, which cf. with "acceptable to God" here: 19. 21; Psalm 4. 5; 50. 14; 51. 17, 19; Hosea 14. 2; Philippians 4. 18. "Among spiritual sacrifices the first place belongs to the general oblation of ourselves. For never can we offer anything to God until we have offered ourselves [2 Corinthians 8. 5] in sacrifice to Him. There follow afterwards prayers, giving of thanks, alms-deeds, and all exercises of piety" [CALVIN.] Christian houses of worship are never called temples, because the temple was a place for sacrifice, which has no place in the Christian dispensation; the Christian temple is the congregation of spiritual worshippers. The synagogue (where reading of Scripture and prayer constituted the worship) was the model of the Christian house of worship (cf. Note, James 2. 2, Greek, "synagogue;" Acts 15. 21). Our sacrifices are those of prayer, praise, and self-denying services in the cause of Christ (v. 9, end). by Jesus Christ—as our mediating High Priest before God. Connect these words with "offer up." Christ is both precious Himself and makes us accepted. [BENGL.] As the temple, so also the priesthood, is built on Christ (v. 4, 5). [BEZA.] Imperfect as are our services, we are not with unbelieving timidity, which is close akin to refined self-righteousness, to doubt their acceptance THROUGH CHRIST. After extolling the dignity of Christians he goes back to CHRIST as the sole source of it. 6. Wherefore also—The oldest MSS. read, "Because that." The statement above is so "because it is contained in Scripture." Behold—Calling attention to the glorious announcement of His eternal counsel. elect—So also believers (v. 9, "chosen," Greek, "elect generation"). precious—In Hebrew, Isaiah 28. 16, "a corner-stone of preciousness." See all my Note there. So in v. 7, Christ is said to be, to believers, "precious," Greek, "PRECIOUSNESS," confounded—Same Greek as in Romans 9. 23 (Peter here as elsewhere confirming Paul's teaching. See Introduction, also Romans 10. 11), "ashamed." In Isaiah 28. 16, "make haste," i. e., flee in sudden panic, covered with the shame of confounded hopes. 7. Application of the Scripture just quoted first to the believer, then to the unbeliever. On the opposite effects of the same Gospel on different classes, cf. John 9. 39; 2 Corinthians 2. 15, 16. precious—Greek, "THE preciousness" (v. 6). To you believers belongs the preciousness of Christ just mentioned. disobedient—to the faith, and so disobedient in practice. the stone which, &c., head of . . . corner—(Psalm 118. 22). Those who rejected the STONE were all the while in spite of themselves unconsciously contributing to its becoming Head of the corner. The same magnet has two poles, the one repulsive, the other attractive; so the Gospel has opposite effects on believers and unbelievers respectively. 8. stone of stumbling, &c.—Quoted from Isaiah 8. 14. Not merely they stumbled, in that their prejudices were offended; but their stumbling implies the judicial punishment of their rejection of Messiah: they hurt themselves in stumbling over the corner-stone, as "stumble" means in Jeremiah 13. 16; Daniel 11. 19, at the word—rather join "being disobedient to the word:" so ch. 3. 1; 4. 17. whereunto—to penal stumbling; to the judicial punishment of their unbelief. See above. also—an additional thought; God's ordination; not that God ordains or appoints them to sin, but they are given up to "the fruit of their own ways" according to the eternal counsel of God. The moral ordering of the world is altogether of God. God appoints the ungodly to be given up unto sin, and a reprobate mind and its necessary penalty. "Were appointed," Greek, "set," answers to "I lay," Greek, "set," v. 6. God, in the active, is said to appoint Christ and the elect [directly]. Unbelievers, in the passive, are said to be appointed [God acting less directly in the appointment of the sinner's awful course]. [BENGL.] God ordains the wicked to punishment, not to crime. [J. CAPELL.] "Appointed" or "set" (not here "FOREORDAINED") refers, not to the eternal counsel so directly, as to the penal justice of God. Through the same Christ whom sinners rejected, they shall be rejected; unlike believers, they are by God appointed unto wrath as FITTED for it. The lost shall lay all the blame of their ruin on their own sinful perversity, not on God's decree; the saved shall ascribe all the merit of their salvation to God's electing love and grace. 9. Contrast in the privileges and destinies of believers. Cf. the similar contrast with the preceding context. chosen—"elect" of God, even as Christ your Lord is. generation—Implying the unity of spiritual origin and kindred of believers as a class distinct from the world. royal—kingly. Believers, like Christ, the antitypical Melchisedec, are at once kings and priests. Israel, in a spiritual sense, was designed to be the same among the nations of the earth. The full realization on earth of this, both to the literal and the spiritual Israel, is as yet future. holy nation—antitypical to Israel. peculiar people—lit., "a people for an acquisition," i. e., whom God chose to be peculiarly His: Acts 20. 28, "purchased," lit., acquired. God's "peculiar treasure" above others. show forth—publish abroad. Not their own praises but His. They have no reason to magnify themselves above others for once they had been in the same darkness, and only through God's grace had been brought to the light which they must henceforth show forth to others. praises—Greek, "virtues," "excellencies:" His glory, mercy (v. 10), goodness (Greek, v. 3; Numbers 14. 17, 18; Isaiah 63. 7). The same term is applied to believers, 2 Peter 1. 5, of him who hath called you—(2 Peter 1. 3.) out of darkness—of heathen and even Jewish ignorance, error, sin, and misery, and so out of the dominion of the prince of darkness. marvellous—Peter still has in mind Psalm 113. 23. light—It is called "His," i. e., God's. Only the (spiritual) light is created by God, not darkness. In Isaiah 45. 7, it is physical darkness and evil, not moral, that God is said to create the punishment of sin, not sin itself. Peter, with characteristic boldness, brands as darkness what all the world calls light; reason, without the Holy Spirit, in spite of its vaunted power, is spiritual darkness. "It cannot apprehend what faith is: there it is stark blind; it gropes as one that is without eyesight, stumbling from one thing to another, and knows not what it does." [LUTHER.] 10. Adapted from Hosea 1. 9, 10; 2. 23. Peter plainly confirms Paul, who quotes the passage as implying the call of the Gentiles to become spiritually that which Israel had been literally, "the people of God." Primarily, the prophecy refers to literal Israel, hereafter to be fully that which in their best days they were only partially, God's people. not obtained mercy—lit., "who were men not compassionate." Implying that it was God's pure mercy, not their merits, which made the blessed change in their state; a thought which ought to kindle their lively gratitude, to be shown with their life, as well as their lips. 11. As heretofore he exhorted them to walk worthy of their calling, in contradistinction to their own former walk, so now he exhorts them to glorify God before unbelievers. Dearlly beloved—he gains their attention to his exhortation by assuring them of his love. strangers and pilgrims—(Ch. 1. 17). Sojourners, lit., settlers having a house in a city without being citizens in respect to the rights of citizenship; a picture of the Christian's position on earth; and pilgrims, staying for a time in a foreign land. FLAUS thus analyzes the exhortation: 1. Purify your souls (a) as strangers on earth who must not allow yourselves to be kept back by earthly lusts, and (b) because these lusts war against the soul's salvation. 2. Walk plously among unbelievers (a) so that they may cease to calumniate Christians, and (b) may themselves be converted to Christ. fleshly lusts—Enumerated in Galatians 5. 19, &c. Not only the gross appetites which we have in common with the brutes, but all the thoughts of the unrenewed mind. which—Greek, "the which," i. e., inasmuch as being such as "war," &c. Not only do they impede, but they assail. [BENGEL.] the soul—i. e., against the regenerated soul; such as were those now addressed. The regenerated soul is besieged by sinful lusts. Like Samson in the lap of Delilah, the believer, the moment that he gives way to fleshly lusts, has the locks of his strength shorn, and ceases to maintain that spiritual separation from the world and the flesh of which the Nazarite vow was the type. 12. conversation—"behaviour," "conduct." There are two things in which "strangers and pilgrims" ought to bear themselves well: (1.) The conversation or conduct, as subjects (v. 13), servants (v. 18), wives (ch. 3. 1), husbands (ch. 3. 7), all persons under all circumstances (v. 8); (2.) confession of the faith (ch. 3. 15, 16). Each of the two is derived from the will of God. Our conversation should correspond to our Saviour's condition; this is in heaven, so ought that to be. honest—honourable, becoming, proper (ch. 3. 16). Contrast "vain conversation," ch. 1. 18. A good walk does not make us plous, but we must first be plous and believe before we attempt to lead a good course. Faith first receives from God, then love gives to our neighbour. [LUTHER.] wherco they speak against you—now (v. 15), that they may, nevertheless, at some time or other hereafter glorify God. The Greek word is rendered, "Wherein they speak against you, &c., that (herein) they may, by your good works, which on a closer inspection they shall behold, glorify God." The very works "which on more careful consideration, must move the heathen to praise God, are at first the object of hatred and railing." [STREIGER.] evil-doers—Because as Christians they could not conform to heathenish customs, they were accused of disobedience to all legal authority; in order to rebut this charge, they are told to submit to every ordinance of man (not sinful in itself). by—owing to. they shall behold—Greek, "they shall be eye-witnesses of:" "shall behold on close inspection." as opposed to their "ignorance" (v. 15) of the true character of Christians and Christianity, by judging on mere hearsay. The same Greek verb occurs in a similar sense in ch. 3. 2. "Other men narrowly look at (so the Greek implies) the actions of the righteous." [BENGEL.] TERTULLIAN contrasts the early Christians and the heathen; These delighted in the bloody gladiatorial spectacles of the amphitheatre, whereas a Christian was excommunicated if he went to it at all. No Christian was found in prison for crime, but only for the faith. The heathen excluded slaves from some of their religious services, whereas Christians had some of their presbyters of the class of slaves. Slavery silently and gradually disappeared by the power of the Christian law of love, "Whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them." When the pagans deserted their nearest relatives in a plague, Christians ministered to the sick and dying. When the Gentiles left their dead unburied after a battle, and cast their wounded into the streets, the disciples hastened to relieve the suffering. glorify—forming a high estimate of the God whom Christians worship, from the exemplary conduct of Christians themselves. We must do good, not with a view to our own glory, but to the glory of God. the day of visitation—of God's grace; when God shall visit them in mercy. 13. every ordinance of man—"every human institution" [ALFORD], lit., "every human creation." For though of divine appointment, yet in the mode of nomination and in the exercise of their authority, earthly governors are but human institutions, being of men, and in relation to men. The apostle speaks as one raised above all human things. But lest they should think themselves so ennobled by faith as to be raised above subordination to human authorities, he tells them to submit themselves for the sake of Christ, who desires you to be subject, and who once was subject to earthly rulers Himself, though having all things subject to Him, and whose honour is at stake in you as His earthly representatives. Cf. Romans 13. 5, "Be subject for conscience' sake." king—the Roman emperor was "supreme" in the Roman provinces to which this Epistle was addressed. The Jewish zealots refused obedience. The distinction between "the king as supreme," and "governors sent by him," implies that "if the king command one thing, and the subordinate magistrate another, we ought rather to obey the superior." [AUGUSTINE in GROTIUS.] Scripture prescribes nothing upon the form of government, but simply subjects Christians to that everywhere subsisting, without entering into the question of the right of the rulers (thus the Roman emperors had by force seized supreme authority, and Rome had, by unjustifiable means, made herself mistress of Asia), because the de facto governors have not been made by chance, but by the providence of God. 14. governors—subordinate to the emperor, "sent," or delegated by Caesar to preside over the provinces. for the punishment—No tyranny ever has been so unprincipled as that some appearance of equity was not maintained in it; however corrupt a government be, God never suffers it to be so much so as not to be better than anarchy. [CALVIN.] Although bad kings often oppress the good, yet that is scarcely ever done by public authority (and it is of what is done by public authority that Peter speaks), save under the mask of right. Tyranny harasses many, but anarchy overwhelms the whole state. [HORNEUS.] The only justifiable exceptions is in cases where obedience to the earthly king plainly involves disobedience to the express command of the King of kings. praise of them that do well—every government recognizes the excellence of truly Christian subjects. Thus PLINY, in his letter to the Emperor Trajan, acknowledges "I have found in them nothing else save a perverse and extravagant superstition." This recognition in the long run mitigates persecution (ch. 3. 13). 15. Ground of his directing them to submit themselves (v. 13). put to silence—lit., "to muzzle," "to stop the mouth." ignorance—spiritual; not having "the knowledge of God," and therefore ignorant of the children of God, and misconstruing their acts; influenced by mere appearances, and ever ready to open their mouths, rather than their eyes and ears. Their ignorance should move the believer's pity, not his anger. They judge of things which they are incapable of judging through unbelief (cf. v. 12). Maintain such a walk that they shall have no charge against you, except touching your faith; and so their minds shall be favourably disposed towards Christianity. 16. as free—as "the Lord's freemen," connected with v. 15, Doing well as being free. "Well-doing" (v. 15) is the natural fruit of being freemen of Christ, made free by "the truth" from the bondage of sin. Duty is enforced on us to guard against licentiousness, but the way in which it is to be fulfilled, is by love and the holy instincts of Christian liberty. We are given principles, not details. not using—Greek, "not as having your liberty for a veil (cloak) of badness, but as the servants of God," and therefore bound to submit to every ordinance of man (v. 13) which is of God's appointment. 17. Honour all men—according to whatever honour is due in each case. Equals have a respect due to them. Christ has dignified our humanity by assuming it; therefore we should not dishonour, but be considerate to and honour our common humanity, even in the very humblest. The first "honour" is in the Greek aorist imperative, implying, "In every case render promptly every man's due." [ALFORD.] The second is in the present, implying, Habitually and continually honour the king. Thus the first is the general precept; the three following are its three great divisions. Love—present: Habitually love with the special and congenial affection that you ought to feel to brethren, besides the general love to all men. Fear God . . . the king—The king is to be honoured; but God alone, in the highest sense, feared. 18. Servants—Greek, "household servants;" not here the Greek for "slaves." Probably including freedmen still remaining in their master's house. Masters were not commonly Christians; he therefore mentions only the duties of the servants. These were then often persecuted by their unbelieving masters. Peter's special object seems to be to teach them submission, whatever the character of the masters might be. Paul not having this as his prominent design, includes masters in his monitions. be subject—Greek, being subject: the participle expresses a particular instance of the general exhortation to good conduct, v. 11, 12, of which the first particular precept is given v. 13, "Submit yourselves to every ordinance of man for the Lord's sake." The general exhortation is taken up again in v. 16; and so the participle v. 13, "being subject," is joined to the hortatory imperatives going before, viz., "abstain," "submit yourselves." "honour all men," with—Greek, "IN," all—all possible: under all circumstances, such as are presently detailed. fear—the awe of one subject: God, however, is the ultimate object of the "fear;" fear "for the Lord's sake" (v. 13), not merely slavish fear of masters. good-kind, gentle—indulgent towards errors: considerate: yielding, not exacting all which justice might demand. froward—perverse: harsh. Those bound to obey must not make the disposition and behaviour of the superior the measure of the fulfilment of their obligations. 19. Reason for subjection even to froward masters. thank-worthy—(Luke 6. 33.) A course out of the common, and especially praiseworthy in the eyes of God: not as Rome interprets, earning merit, and so a work of supererogation (cf. v. 20). for conscience toward God—lit., "consciousness of God:" from a conscientious regard to God, more than to men. endure—Greek, patiently bear up under: "as a superimposed burden." [ALFORD.] grief—Greek, "griefs," 20. what—Greek, "what kind of." glory—what peculiar merit. buffeted—the punishment of slaves, and suddenly inflicted [BENGL.] this is—Some oldest MSS. read, "for." Then the translation is, "But if when . . . ye take it patiently (it is a glory), for this is," &c. acceptable—Greek, "thankworthy," as in v. 19. 21. Christ's example a proof that patient endurance under undeserved sufferings is acceptable with God. herunto—to the patient endurance of unmerited suffering (ch. 3. 9). Christ is an example to servants, even as He was once in "the form of a servant," called—with a heavenly calling, though slaves. for us—His dying for us is the highest exemplification of "doing well" (v. 20). Ye must patiently suffer, being innocent, as Christ also innocently suffered (not for Himself, but for us). The oldest MSS. for "us . . . us," read, "you . . . for you." Christ's sufferings, whilst they are for an example, were also primarily everlasting obligations on us to please Him. leaving—behind: so the Greek: on His departure to the Father, to His glory. an example—Greek, "a copy," lit., a writing copy set by masters for their pupils. Christ's precepts and sermons were the transcript of His life. Peter graphically sets before servants those features especially suited to their case. follow—close upon: so the Greek. his steps—footsteps, viz., of His patience combined with innocence. 22. Illustrating Christ's well-doing (v. 20) though suffering. did—Greek aorist, "Never in a single instance did." [ALFORD.] Quoted from Isaiah 53. 9, end, LXX. neither—nor yet: not even. [ALFORD.] Sinlessness as to the mouth is a mark of perfection. Guile is a common fault of servants. "If any boast of his innocency, Christ surely did not suffer as an evil-doer" [CALVIN], yet He took it patiently (v. 20). On Christ's sinlessness, cf. 2 Corinthians 5. 21; Hebrews 7. 26. 23. Servants are apt to "answer again" (Titus 2. 9). Threats of Divine judgment against oppressors are often used by those who have no other arms, as for instance slaves. Christ, who as Lord could have threatened with truth, never did so. committed himself—or His cause, as man in His suffering. Cf. the type, Jeremiah 11. 20. In this Peter seems to have before his mind Isaiah 53. 8. Cf. Romans 12. 19, on our corresponding duty. Leave your case in His hands, not desiring to make Him executioner of your revenge, but rather praying for enemies. God's righteous judgment gives tranquility and consolation to the oppressed. 24. his own self—there being none other but Himself who could have done it. His voluntary undertaking of the work of redemption is implied. The Greek puts in antithetical juxtaposition, OUR, and HIS OWN SELF, to mark the idea of His substitution for us. His "well-doing" in His sufferings is set forth here as an example to servants and to us all (v. 20). bare—to sacrifice: carried and offered up: a sacrificial term. Isaiah 53. 11, 12, "He bare the sin of many:" where the idea of bearing on Himself is the prominent one; here the offering in sacrifice is combined with that idea. So the same Greek means, ch. 2. 5. our sins—In offering or presenting in sacrifice (as the Greek for "bare" implies) His body, Christ offered in it the guilt of our sins upon the cross, as upon the altar of God, that it might be expiated in Him, and so taken away from us. Cf. Isaiah 53. 10, "Thou shalt make His soul an offering for sin." Peter thus means by "bare" what the Syriac takes two words to express, to bear and to offer: (1.) He hath borne our sins laid upon Him [viz., their guilt, curse, and punishment]; (2.) He hath so borne them that He offered them along with Himself on the altar. He refers to the animals upon which sins were first laid, and which were then offered thus laden. [VIRINGA.] Sin or guilt among the Semitic nations is considered as a burden lying heavily upon the sinner. [GENSENIUS.] on the tree—the cross, the proper place for One on whom the curse was laid: this curse stuck to Him until it was legally (through His death as the guilt-bearer) destroyed in His body; thus the hand-writing of the bond against us is cancelled by His death. that we being dead to sins—the effect of His death to "sin" in the aggregate, and to all particular "sins," viz., that we should be as entirely delivered from them, as a slave that is dead is delivered from service to his master. This is our spiritual standing through faith by virtue of Christ's death: our actual mortification of particular sins is in proportion to the degree of our effectually being made conformable to His death. "That we should die to the sins whose collected guilt Christ carried away in His death, and so LIVE TO THE RIGHTEOUSNESS (cf. Isaiah 53. 11, 'My righteous servant shall justify many'), the gracious relation to God which He has brought in." [STEIGER.] by whose stripes [Greek, stripe] ye were healed—A paradox, yet true. "Ye servants (cf. 'buffeted,' 'the tree,' v. 20, 21) often bear the strife; but it is not more than your Lord Himself bore: learn from Him patience in wrongful sufferings." 25.

(Isaiah 53. 6.) For—Assigning their natural need of healing (v. 21). now—now that the atonement for all has been made, the foundation is laid for individual conversion: so “ye are returned,” or “have become converted to,” &c. Shepherd and bishop—The designation of the pastors and elders of the Church belongs in its fullest sense to the great Head of the Church, “the good Shepherd.” As the “bishop” oversees (as the Greek term means), so “the eyes of the Lord are over the righteous” (ch. 3. 12). He gives us His spirit and feeds and guides us by His word. “Shepherd,” Hebrew, Parnas, is often applied to kings, and enters into the composition of names, as Pharnabazus.

CHAPTER III.

VER. 1-22. RELATIVE DUTIES OF HUSBANDS AND WIVES: EXHORTATIONS TO LOVE AND FORBEARANCE; RIGHT CONDUCT UNDER PERSECUTIONS FOR RIGHTEOUSNESS' SAKE, AFTER CHRIST'S EXAMPLE, WHOSE DEATH RESULTED IN QUICKENING TO US THROUGH HIS BEING QUICKENED AGAIN, OF WHICH BAPTISM IS THE SACRAMENTAL SEAL. 1. Likewise—Greek, “in like manner,” as “servants” in their sphere; cf. the reason of the woman's subjection, 1 Corinthians 11. 8-10; 1 Timothy 2. 11-14. your own—enforcing the obligation: it is not strangers ye are required to be subject to. Every time that obedience is enjoined upon women to their husbands, the Greek idios, “one's own peculiarly,” is used, whilst the wives of men are designated only by heauton, “of themselves.” Feeling the need of leaning on one stronger than herself, the wife (especially if joined to an unbeliever) might be tempted, though only spiritually, to enter into that relation with another in which she ought to stand to her own spouse (1 Corinthians 14. 34, 35, “Let them ask their own [idiotus] husbands at home”); an attachment to the person of the teacher might thus spring up, which, without being in the common sense spiritual adultery, would still weaken in its spiritual basis the married relation. [STEIGER.] that, if—Greek, “that even if.” Even if you have a husband that obeys not the word (i. e., is an unbeliever), without the word—independently of hearing the word preached, the usual way of faith coming. But BENGEL, “without word,” i. e., without direct Gospel discourse of the wives, “they may (lit., in oldest MSS., SHALL, which marks the almost objective certainty of the result) be won” indirectly. “Unspoken acting is more powerful than unperformed speaking.” [ECUMENIUS.] “A soul converted is gained to itself, to the pastor, wife, or husband, who sought it, and to Jesus Christ; added to His treasury who thought not His own precious blood too dear to lay out for this gain.” [LEIGHTON.] “The discreet wife would choose first of all to persuade her husband to share with her in the things which lead to blessedness; but if this be impossible, let her then alone diligently press after virtue, in all things obeying him so as to do nothing at any time against his will, except in such things as are essential to virtue and salvation.” [CLEMENS ALEXANDRINUS.] 2. behold—on narrowly looking into it, lit., “having closely observed.” chaste—pure, spotless, free from all impurity. feared—reverential, towards your husbands. Scrupulously pure, as opposed to the noisy, ambitious character of worldly women. 3. lit., “To whom let there belong [viz., as their peculiar ornament] not the outward adornment [usual in the sex which first, by the fall, brought in the need of covering, Note, ch. 5. 5] of, &c., but,” &c. plaiting—artificial braiding, in order to attract admiration. wearing—lit., “putting round,” viz., the head, as a diadem—the arm, as a bracelet—the finger, as rings. apparel—showy and costly. “Have the blush of modesty on thy face instead of paint, and moral worth and discretion instead of gold and emeralds.” [MELISSA.] 4. But—rather. The “outward adornment” of jewelry, &c., is forbidden, in so far as woman loves such things, not in so far as she uses them from a sense of propriety, and does not abuse them. Singularly mostly comes from pride, and throws needless hindrances to religion in the way of others. Under costly attire there may be a humble mind. “Great is he who uses his earthenware as if it were plate; not less great is he who uses his silver as if it were earthenware.” [SENECA in ALFORD.] hidden—inner man, which the Christian instinctively hides from public view. of the heart—consisting in the heart regenerated and adorned by the Spirit. This “inner man of the heart” is the subject of the verb “be,” v. 3, Greek: “Of whom let the inner man be,” viz., the distinction or adornment. in that—consisting or standing in that as its element. not corruptible—not transitory, nor tainted with corruption, as all earthly adornments. meek and quiet—meek, not creating disturbances; quiet, bearing with tranquillity the disturbances caused by others. Meek in affections and feelings; quiet in words, countenance, and actions. [BENGEL.] in the sight of God—who looks to inward, not merely outward things. of great price—the results of redemption should correspond to its costly price (ch. 1. 19). 5. after this manner—with the ornament of a meek and quiet spirit (cf. the portrait of the godly wife, Proverbs 31. 10-31). trusted—Greek, “hoped.” “Holy” is explained by “hoped in (so as to be united to, Greek) God.” Hope in God is the spring of true holiness. [BENGEL.] in subjection—their ornament consisted in their subordination. Vanity was forbidden (v. 3) as being contrary to female subjection. 6. Sara—an example of faith. calling him lord—(Genesis 18. 12.) ye are—Greek, “ye have become;” “children” of Abraham and Sara by faith, whereas ye were Gentile aliens from the covenant, afraid with any amazement—Greek, “fluttering alarm,” “consternation.” Act well, and be not thrown into sudden panic, as weak females are apt to be, by any opposition from without. BENGEL translates, “Not afraid of any fluttering terror coming from without” (v. 13-16). So LXX. Proverbs 3. 25 uses the same Greek word, which Peter probably refers to. Anger assails men, fear, women. You need fear no man in doing what is right: not thrown into fluttering agitation by any sudden outbreak of temper on the part of your unbelieving husbands, whilst you do well. 7. dwell—Greek, “dwelling;” connected with the verb, ch. 2. 17, “Honour all,” knowledge—Christian knowledge: appreciating the due relation of the sexes in the design of God, and acting with tenderness and forbearance accordingly: wisely: with wise consideration. them . . . giving honour to the wife—translate and punctuate the Greek rather, “Dwelling according to knowledge with the female (Greek adjective, qualifying ‘vessel’: not as English Version, a noun) as with the weaker vessel (Note, 1 Thessalonians 4. 4. Both husband and wife are vessels in God's hand, and of God's making, to fulfil His gracious purposes. Both weak, the woman the weaker. The sense of his own weakness, and that she, like himself, is God's vessel and fabric, ought to lead him to act with tender and wise consideration towards her who is the weaker fabric), giving (lit., assigning, apportioning) honour as being also (besides being man and wife) helms together,” &c.; or, as the Vatican MS. reads, “as to those who are also (besides being your wives) fellow-heirs.” (The reason why the man should give honour to the woman is, because God gives honour to both as fellow-helms; cf. the same argument, v. 9.) He does not take into account the case of an unbelieving wife, as she might yet believe. grace of life—God's gracious gift of life (ch. 1. 4, 13). that your prayers be not hindered—by dissensions, which prevent united prayer, on which depends the blessing. 8. General summary of relative duty, after having detailed particular duties from ch. 2. 18. of one mind—as to the faith. having compassion one of another—Greek, “sympathizing” in the joy and sorrow of others. love as brethren—Greek, “loving the brethren.” pitiful—towards the afflicted. courteous—genuine Christian politeness; not the tinsel of the world's politeness; stamped with unfeigned love on one side, and humility on the other. But the oldest MSS. read, “humble-minded.” It is slightly different from “humble,” in that it marks a conscious effort to be truly humble. 9. evil—in deed. railing—in word. blissing—your revilers; participle, not a noun after “rendering.” knowing that—The oldest MSS. read merely, “because.” are—Greek,

"were called." inherit a blessing—not only passive, but also active; receiving spiritual blessing from God by faith, and in your turn blessing others from love. [GERHARD in ALFORD.] "It is not in order to inherit a blessing that we must bless, but because our portion is blessing." No railing can injure you (v. 13). Imitate God who blesses you. The first fruits of His blessing for eternity are enjoyed by the righteous even now (v. 10). [BENGEL.] 10. will love—Greek, "wishes to love." He who loves life (present and eternal), and desires to continue to do so, not involving himself in troubles which will make this life a burden, and cause him to forfeit eternal life. Peter confirms his exhortation, v. 9, by Psalm 34. 12-16. refrain—curb, lit., "cause to cease;" implying that our natural inclination and custom is to speak evil. "Men commonly think that they would be exposed to the wantonness of their enemies if they did not strenuously vindicate their rights. But the Spirit promises a life of blessedness to none but those who are gentle and patient of evils." [CALVIN.] evil . . . guile—First he warns against sins of the tongue, evil-speaking, and deceitful, double-tongued speaking; next, against acts of injury to one's neighbour. 11. In oldest MSS., Greek, "Moreover (besides his words, in acts), let him," eschew—"turn from." ensue—pursue as a thing hard to attain, and that flees from one in this troublesome world. 12. Ground of the promised present and eternal life of blessedness to the meek (v. 10). The Lord's eyes are ever over them for good. ears . . . unto their prayers—(1 John 5. 14, 15.) face . . . against—The eyes imply favourable regard; the face of the Lord upon (not as English Version, "against") them that do evil, implies that He narrowly observes them, so as not to let them really and lastingly hurt His people (cf. v. 13). 13. who . . . will harm you—This fearless confidence in God's protection from harm, Christ, the Head, in His sufferings realized; so His members. if ye be—Greek, "if ye have become." followers—the oldest MSS. read "emulons," "zealous of" (Titus 2. 14). good—The contrast in Greek is, "Who will do you evil, if ye be zealous of good?" 14. But and if—"But if even." "The promises of this life extend only so far as it is expedient for us that they should be fulfilled." [CALVIN.] So he proceeds to state the exceptions to the promise (v. 10), and how the truly wise will behave in such exceptional cases. "If ye should suffer;" if it should so happen; "suffer," a milder word than harm. for righteousness—"not the suffering, but the cause for which one suffers, makes the martyr" [AUGUSTINE]. happy—Not even can suffering take away your blessedness, but rather promotes it. and—Greek, "but." Do not impair your blessing (v. 9) by fearing man's terror in your times of adversity. lit., "Be not terrified with their terror," i. e., with that which they try to strike into you, and which strikes themselves when in adversity. This verse and v. 15 is quoted from Isaiah 8. 12, 13. God alone is to be feared; he that fears God has none else to fear. neither be troubled—the threat of the law, Leviticus 26. 36; Deuteronomy 28. 65, 66; in contrast to which the Gospel gives the believer a heart assured of God's favour, and therefore unruffled, amidst all adversities. Not only be not afraid, but be not even agitated. 15. sanctify—hallow; honour as holy, enshrining Him in your hearts. So in the Lord's Prayer, Matthew 6. 9. God's holiness is thus glorified in our hearts as the dwelling-place of His Spirit. the Lord God—The oldest MSS. read Christ. Translate, "Sanctify Christ as Lord." and—Greek, "but," or "moreover." Besides this inward sanctification of God in the heart, be also ready always to give, &c. answer—an apologetic answer defending your faith. to every man that asketh you—The last words limit the universality of the "always;" not to a railler. But to every one among the heathen who inquires honestly, a reason—a reasonable account. This refutes Rome's dogma, "I believe it, because the Church believes it." Credulity is believing without evidence; faith is believing on evidence. There is no repose for reason itself but in faith. This verse does not impose an obligation to bring forward a learned proof and logical defence of revelation. But as believers deny themselves, crucify the world, and brave persecution, they must be buoyed up by some strong "hope;" men of the world, having no such hope themselves, are moved by curiosity to ask the secret of this hope; the believer must be ready to give an experimental account "how this hope arose in him, what it contains, and on what it rests" [STEIGER]. with—The oldest MSS. read, "but with." Be ready, but with "meekness." Not perty and arrogantly. meekness—(v. 4). The most effective way; not self-sufficient impetuosity. fear—due respect towards man, and reverence towards God, remembering His cause does not need man's hot temper to uphold it. 16. Having a good conscience—the secret spring of readiness to give account of our hope. So hope and good conscience go together in Acts 24. 15, 16. Profession without practice has no weight. But those who have a good conscience can afford to give an account of their hope "with meekness." whereas—(Ch. 2. 12.) they speak evil of you, as of evil-doers—One oldest MS. reads, "ye are spoken against," omitting the rest. falsely accuse—"calumniate;" the Greek expresses malice shown in deeds as well as in words. It is translated, "despitefully use," Matthew 5. 44; Luke 6. 28. conversation—life, conduct. in Christ—who is the very element of your life as Christians. "In Christ" defines "good." It is your good walk as Christians, not as citizens, that calls forth malice (ch. 4. 4, 5, 14). 17. better—one may object, I would not bear it so ill if I had deserved it. Peter replies, it is better that you did not deserve it, in order that doing well and yet being spoken against, you may prove yourself a true Christian. [GERHARD.] if the will of God be so—rather as the optative is in the oldest MSS., "if the will of God should will it so." Those who honour God's will as their highest law (ch. 2. 15) have the comfort to know that suffering is God's appointment (ch. 4. 19). So Christ Himself; our inclination does not wish it. 18. Confirmation of v. 17, by the glorious results of Christ's suffering innocently. For—"Because." That is "better," v. 17, by means of which we are rendered more like to Christ in death and in life; for His death brought the best issue to Himself and to us. [BENGEL.] Christ—the Anointed Holy One of God; the Holy suffered for sins, the Just for the unjust. also—as well as yourselves (v. 17). Cf. ch. 2. 21; there His suffering was brought forward as an example to us; here, as a proof of the blessedness of suffering for well-doing. once—for all; never again to suffer. It is "better" for us also once to suffer with Christ, than for ever without Christ. [BENGEL.] We now are suffering our "once;" it will soon be a thing of the past; a bright consolation to the tried. for sins—as though He had Himself committed them. He exposed Himself to death by His "confession," even as we are called on to "give an answer to him that asketh a reason of our hope." This was "well-doing" in its highest manifestation. As He suffered, "The Just," so we ought willingly to suffer, for righteousness' sake (v. 14; cf. v. 12, 17). that he might bring us to God—together with Himself in His ascension to the right hand of God (v. 22). He brings us, "the unjust," justified together with Him into heaven. So the result of Christ's death is His drawing men to Him; spiritually now, in our having access into the Holiest, opened by Christ's ascension, literally hereafter. "Bring us," moreover, by the same steps of humiliation and exaltation through which Himself passed. The several steps of Christ's progress from lowliness to glory are trodden over again by His people in virtue of their oneness with Him (ch. 4. 1-3). "To God," is Greek dative (not the preposition and case), implying that God wishes it. [BENGEL.] put to death—the means of His bringing us to God. in the flesh—i. e., in respect to the life of flesh and blood. quicken by the Spirit—The oldest MSS. omit the Greek article. Translate with the preposition "in," as the antithesis to the previous "in the flesh" requires, "in spirit," i. e., in respect to His Spirit. "Put to death" in the former mode of life "quicken" in the other. Not that His Spirit ever died and was quickened, or made alive again, but whereas He had lived after the manner of mortal men in the flesh, He began to live a spiritual "resurrection" (v. 21) life, whereby he has the power to bring us to God. Two ways of explaining v. 18, 19, are open to us: I. "Quickenened in Spirit," i. e., immediately on His release from the "flesh," the energy of His undying spirit-life was "quickenened" by God the Father, into new modes of action, viz., "In the Spirit He went down (as subsequently He went up to heaven, v. 22, the same Greek verb) and heralded [not salvation, as ALFORD, contrary to Scripture, which everywhere represents man's state, whether saved or lost, after death irreversible. Nor is any mention made of the conversion of the spirits in prison. See note, v. 20. Nor is the phrase here 'preached the Gospel' (evangelizo), but heralded (ekeruxe) or 'preached:' but simply made the announcement of His finished work; so the same Greek in Mark 1. 45, 'publish,' confirming Enoch and Noah's testimony, and thereby declaring the virtual condemnation of their unbelief, and the salvation of Noah and believers; a sample of the similar opposite effects of the same work on all unbelievers, and believers, respectively; also a consolation to those whom Peter addresses, in their sufferings at the hands of unbelievers; specially selected for the sake of 'baptism,' its 'antitype' (v. 21), which, as a seal, marks believers as separated from the rest of the doomed world] to the spirits (His Spirit speaking to the spirits) in prison (in Hades or Sheol, awaiting the judgment, 2 Peter 2. 4), which were of old disobedient when," &c. II. The strongest point in favour of I. is the position of "sometime," i. e., of old, connected with "disobedient;" whereas if the preaching or announcing were a thing long past, we should expect "sometime," or of old, to be joined to "went and preached." But this transposition may express that their disobedience preceded His preaching. The Greek participle expresses the reason of His preaching, "inasmuch as they were sometime disobedient" (cf. ch. 4. 6). Also "went" seems to mean a personal going, as in v. 22, not merely in spirit. But see the answer below. The objections are, 'quickenened' must refer to Christ's body (cf. v. 21 end), for as His Spirit never ceased to live, it cannot be said to be "quickenened." Cf. John 5. 21; Romans 8. 11, and other passages, where "quicken" is used of the bodily resurrection. Also, not His Spirit, but His soul, went to Hades. His Spirit was commended by Him at death to His Father, and was thereupon "in Paradise." The theory—1. would thus require that His descent to the spirits in prison should be after His resurrection! Cf. Ephesians 4. 9, 10, which makes the descent precede the ascent. Also Scripture elsewhere is silent about such a heralding, though possibly Christ's death had immediate effects on the state of both the godly and the ungodly in Hades: the souls of the godly heretofore in comparative confinement, perhaps then having been, as some Fathers thought, translated to God's immediate and heavenly presence; but this cannot be proved from Scripture. Cf. however, John 3. 13; Colossians 1. 18. Prison is always used in a bad sense in Scripture. "Paradise" and "Abraham's bosom," the abode of good spirits in Old Testament times, are separated by a wide gulf from Hell or Hades, and cannot be called "prison." Cf. 2 Corinthians 12. 2, 4, where "paradise" and the "third heaven" correspond. Also, why should the antediluvian unbelievers in particular be selected as the objects of His preaching in Hades? Therefore explain: "Quickenened in spirit, in which (as distinguished from in person; the words "in which," i. e., in spirit, expressly obviating the objection that "went" implies a personal going) He went (In the person of Noah, "a preacher of righteousness," 2 Peter 2. 5: ALFORD'S own note, Ephesians 2. 17, is the best reply to his argument from "went" that a local going to Hades in person is meant. As "He came and preached peace" by His Spirit in the apostles and ministers after His death and ascension; so before His incarnation He preached in Spirit through Noah to the antediluvians, John 14. 18, 28; Acts 26. 23. "Christ should show," lit., "announce light to the Gentiles") and preached unto the spirits in prison, i. e., the antediluvians, whose bodies indeed seemed free, but their spirits were in prison, shut up in the earth as one great condemned cell (exactly parallel to Isaiah 24. 22, 23. "upon the earth . . . they shall be gathered together as prisoners are gathered in the pit, and shall be shut up in the prison," &c. [just as the fallen angels are judicially regarded as "in chains of darkness," though for a time now at large on the earth, 1 Peter 2. 4], where v. 18 has a plain allusion to the flood, "the windows from on high are open," cf. Genesis 7. 11); from this prison the only way of escape was that preached by Christ in Noah. Christ, who in our times came in the flesh, in the days of Noah preached in Spirit by Noah to the spirits then in prison (Isaiah 61. 1, end, "the Spirit of the Lord God hath sent me to proclaim the opening of the prison to them that are bound"). So in ch. 1. 11, "the Spirit of Christ" is said to have testified in the prophets. As Christ suffered even to death by enemies, and was afterwards quickened in virtue of His "Spirit" (or Divine nature, Romans 1. 3, 4; 1 Corinthians 15. 45), which henceforth acted in its full energy, the first result of which was the raising of His body (v. 21, end) from the prison of the grave and His soul from Hades; so the same Spirit of Christ enabled Noah, amidst reproach and trials, to preach to the disobedient spirits fast bound in wrath. That Spirit in you can enable you also to suffer patiently now, looking for the resurrection deliverance, 20, once—Not in the oldest MSS. when . . . the long-suffering of God waited in the days of Noah—Oldest MSS. Greek, "was continuing to wait on" (if haply men in the 120 years of grace would repent) until the end of His waiting came in their death by the flood. This refutes ALFORD'S idea of a second day of grace having been given in Hades. Noah's days are selected, as the ark and the destroying flood answer respectively to "baptism" and the coming destruction of unbelievers by fire. while the ark was a-preparing—(Hebrews 11. 7.) A long period of God's "long-suffering and waiting," as Noah had few to help him, which rendered the world's unbelief the more inexorable. wherein—lit., "(by having entered) into which," eight—seven (the sacred number) with ungodly Ham. few—So now. souls—As this term is here used of living persons, why should not "spirits" also? Noah preached to their ears, but Christ in spirit, to their spirits, or spiritual natures. saved by water—The same water which drowned the unbelieving, buoyed up the ark in which the eight were saved. Not as some translate, "were brought safe through the water." However, the sense of the preposition may be as in 1 Corinthians 3. 15, "they were safely preserved through the water," though having to be in the water. 21. whereunto—The oldest MSS. read, "which;" lit., "which;" viz., water, in general; being) the antitype (of the water of the flood) is now saving (the salvation being not yet fully realized by us, cf. 1 Corinthians 10. 1, 2, 5; Jude 5; puts into a state of salvation) us also (two oldest MSS. read "you" for "us") You also, as well as Noah and his party, to wit, baptism." Water saved Noah not of itself, but by sustaining the ark built in faith resting on God's word: it was to him the sign and mean of a kind of regeneration of the earth. The flood was for Noah a baptism, as the passage through the Red Sea was for the Israelites; by baptism in the flood he and his family were transferred from the old world to the new; from immediate destruction to lengthened probation; from the companionship of the wicked to communion with God; from the severing of all bonds between the creature and the Creator to the privileges of the covenant; so we by spiritual baptism. As there was a Ham who forfeited the privileges of the covenant, so many now. The antitypical water, viz., baptism, saves you also, not of itself, nor the mere material water, but the spiritual thing conjoined with it, repentance and faith, of which it is the sign and seal, as Peter proceeds to explain. Cf. the union of the sign and thing signified, John 3. 5; Ephesians 5. 26; Titus 3. 5; Hebrews 10. 22; cf. 1 John 5. 6. not the, &c.—"flesh" bears the emphasis. "Not the putting away of the filth of the flesh" (as is done by a mere water baptism, unaccompanied with the Spirit's baptism, cf. Ephesians 2. 11), but of the soul. It is the ark (Christ and His Spirit-filled Church), not the water, which is the instrument of salvation; the water only flowed round the ark; so not the mere water baptism, but the water when accompanied with the Spirit. answer—Greek, "interrogation," referring to the questions asked of candidates for baptism; eliciting a confession of faith "toward God," and a renunciation of Satan [AUGUSTINE, ad Catechumenos, B. 4., c. 1; CYPRIAN, Ep. 7., ad Rogatian], which, when flowing from "a good conscience," assure one of being "saved." Lit., "a good conscience's Interrogation (including the satisfactory answer) toward God." I prefer this to the translation of WAHL, ALFORD, &c., "inquiry of a good conscience after God;" not one of the parallels alleged, not even 2 Samuel 11. 7, in the LXX., is strictly in point. Recent Byzantine Greek idiom (whereby the term meant (1.) the question; (2.) the stipulation; (3.) the engagement), easily flowing from the usage of the word as Peter has it, confirms the former translation. by the resurrection of Jesus—joined with "saves you;" In so far as baptism applies to us the power of Christ's resurrection. As Christ's death unto sin is the source of the believer's death unto, and so deliverance from, sin's penalty and power; so His resurrection life is the source of the believer's new spiritual life. 22. (Psalm 110. 1; Romans 8, 34, 33; 1 Corinthians 15. 24; Ephesians 1. 21; 3. 10; Colossians 1. 16; 2. 10-15.) The fruit of His patience in His voluntary endured and undeserved sufferings: a pattern to us, v. 17, 18. gone—(Luke 24. 51.) Proving against rationalists an actual material ascension. Lit., "Is on the right hand of God, having gone into heaven." The oldest MSS. of the Vulgate and the Latin Fathers, add what expresses the benefit to us of Christ's sitting on God's right hand, "Who is on the right hand of God, having swallowed up death that we may become heirs of everlasting life;" involving for us A STATE OF LIFE, saved, glorious, and eternal. The GREEK MSS., however, reject the words. Cf. with this verse Peter's speeches, Acts 2. 32-35; 3. 21, 26; 10. 40, 42.

CHAPTER IV.

Ver. 1-19. LIKE THE RISEN CHRIST, BELIEVERS HENCEFORTH OUGHT TO HAVE NO MORE TO DO WITH SIN. As the end is near, cultivate self-restraint, watchful prayerfulness, charity, hospitality, scriptural speech, ministering to one another according to your several gifts to the glory of God: Rejoicing patience under suffering. 1. For us—Supported by some oldest MSS. and versions, omitted by others. in the flesh—in His mortal body of humiliation. arm—(Ephesians 6. 11, 13.) the same mind—of suffering with patient willingness what God wills you to suffer. he that hath suffered—for instance, Christ first, and in His person the believer: a general proposition. hath ceased—lit., "has been made to cease," i. e., has obtained by the very fact of His having suffered once for all, a cessation from sin, which had heretofore lain on him (Romans 6. 6-11, especially 7.) The Christian is by faith one with Christ: as then Christ by death is judicially freed from sin; so the Christian who has in the person of Christ died, has no more to do with it judicially, and ought to have no more to do with it actually. "The flesh" is the sphere in which sin has place. 2. That he, &c.—"That he (the believer, who has once for all obtained cessation from sin by suffering, in the person of Christ, viz., in virtue of his union with the crucified Christ) should no longer live the rest of his time in the flesh to the lusts of men, but to the will of God" as his rule. "Rest of his time in the flesh" (the Greek has the preposition "in" here, not in v. 1 as to Christ) proves that the reference is here not to Christ, but to the believer, whose remaining time for glorifying God is short (v. 3). "Live" in the truest sense, for heretofore he was dead. Not as ALFORD, "Arm yourselves . . . with a view no longer to live the rest of your time." 3. may suffice—Greek, "is sufficient." Peter takes the lowest ground: for not even the past time ought to have been wasted in lust; but since you cannot recall it, at least lay out the future to better account. us—Omitted in oldest MSS. wrought—Greek, "wrought out." Gentiles—heathen: which many of you were. when, &c.—"walking as ye have done [ALFORD] in lasciviousness;" the Greek means petulant, immodest, wantonness, unbridled conduct: not so much filthy lust. excess of wine—"wine-bibblings." [ALFORD.] abominable—"nefarious," "lawless idolatries," violating God's most sacred law; not that all Peter's readers (Note, ch. 1. 1) walked in these, but many, viz., the Gentile portion of them. 4. Wherein—In respect to which abandonment of your former walk (v. 3). run not with them—eagerly, in troops. [BENGEL.] excess—lit., profusion; a sink; stagnant water remaining after an inundation. riot—profligacy. speaking evil—charging you with pride, singularity, hypocrisy, and secret crimes (v. 14; 2 Peter 2. 2). However, there is no "of you" in the Greek, but simply "blaspheming." It seems to me always to be used, either directly or indirectly, in the sense of impious reviling against God, Christ, or the Holy Spirit, and the Christian religion, not merely against men as such; Greek, v. 14, below. 5. They who now call you to account falsely, shall have to give account themselves for this very evil-speaking (Jude 15), and be condemned justly. ready—very speedily (v. 7; 2 Peter 3. 10). Christ's coming is to the believer always near. 6. For—Giving the reason for v. 5, "judge the dead." Gospel preached also to . . . dead—as well as to them now living, and to them that shall be found alive at the coming of the Judge. "Dead" must be taken in the same literal sense as in v. 5, which refutes the explanation "dead" in sins. Moreover, the absence of the Greek article does not necessarily restrict the sense of "dead" to particular dead persons, for there is no Greek article in v. 5 also, where "the dead" is universal in meaning. The sense seems to be, Peter, as representing the true attitude of the Church in every age, expecting Christ at any moment, says, The Judge is ready to judge the quick and dead—the dead, I say, for they, too, in their lifetime, have had the Gospel preached to them, that so they might be judged at last in the same way as those living now (and those who shall be so when Christ shall come), viz., "men in the flesh," and that they might, having escaped condemnation by embracing the Gospel so preached, live unto God in the spirit (though death has passed over their flesh), Luke 20. 38, thus being made like Christ in death and in life (Note, ch. 3. 18). He says, "live," not "made alive" or quickened; for they are supposed to have been already "quickened together with Christ" (Ephesians 2. 5). This verse is parallel to ch. 3. 19; cf. Note there. The Gospel, substantially, was "preached" to the Old Testament Church; though not so fully as to the New Testament Church. It is no valid objection, that the Gospel has not been preached to all that shall be found dead at Christ's coming. For Peter is plainly referring only to those within reach of the Gospel, or who might have known God through His ministers in Old and New Testament times. Peter, like Paul, argues that those found living at Christ's coming shall have no advantage above the dead who shall then be raised, inasmuch as the latter live unto, or "according to," God, even already in His purpose. ALFORD's explanation is wrong, "that they might be judged according to men as regards the flesh," i. e., be in the state of the completed sentence on sin, which is death after the flesh. For "judged" cannot have a different meaning in this verse from what "judge" bears in v. 5. "Live according to God" means, live a life with God, such as God lives, divine; as contrasted with "according to men in the flesh," i. e., a life such as men live in the flesh. 7. Resuming the idea in v. 5. the end of all things—and therefore also of the wantonness (v. 3, 4) of the wicked, and of the sufferings of the righteous. [BENGEL.] The nearness meant is not that of mere time, but that before the Lord; as he explains to guard against misapprehension, and defends God from the charge of procrastination: We live in the last dispensation, not like the Jews under the Old Testament. The Lord will come as a thief; He is "ready" (v. 5) to judge the world at any moment; it is only God's long-suffering and His will that the Gospel should be preached as a witness to all nations, that induces him to lengthen out the time which is with Him still as nothing. sober—"self-restrained." The opposite duties to the sins in v. 3 are here inculcated. Thus "sober" is the opposite of "lasciviousness" (v. 3). watch—Greek, "be soberly vigilant;" not intoxicated with worldly cares and pleasures. Temperance promotes wake- fulness or watchfulness, and both promote prayer. Drink makes drowsy, and drowsiness prevents prayer. prayer—Greek, "prayers;" the end for which we should exercise vigilance. 8. above all things—not that "charity" or love is placed above "prayer," but because love is the animating spirit, without which all other duties are dead. Transtate as Greek, "Having your mutual (lit., towards yourselves) charity intense." He presupposes its existence among them; he urges them to make it more fervent. charity shall cover the multitude, &c.—The oldest MSS. have "covereth." Quoted from Proverbs 10. 12; cf. 17. 9. "Covereth" so as not harshly to condemn or expose faults; but forbearingly to bear the other's burdens, forgiving and forgetting past offences. Perhaps the additional idea is included, by prayer for them, love tries to have them covered by God; and so being the instrument of converting the sinner from his error, "covereth a (not 'the,' as English Version) multitude of sins;" but the former idea from Proverbs is the prominent one. It is not, as Rome teaches, "covereth" his own sins; for then the Greek middle voice would be used; and Proverbs 10. 12 and 17. 9 support the Protestant view. "As God with His love covers my sins if I believe, so must I also cover the sins of my neighbour." [LUTHER.] Cf. the conduct of Shem and Japheth to Noah (Genesis 9. 23), in contrast to Ham's exposure of his father's shame. We ought to cover others' sins only where love itself does not require the contrary. 9. (Romans 12. 13; Hebrews 13. 2.) Not the spurious hospitality which passes current in the world, but the entertaining of those needing it, especially those exiled for the faith, as the representatives of Christ, and all hospitality to whomsoever exercised from genuine Christian love. without grudging—Greek, "murmuring." "He that giveth, let him do it with simplicity," i. e., open-hearted sincerity; with cordiality. Not secretly speaking against the person whom we entertain, or upbraiding him with the favour we have conferred on him. 10. every—"Even as each man hath received," in whatever degree, and of whatever kind. The Spirit's gifts (lit., "gift of grace," i. e., gratuitously bestowed) are the common property of the Christian community, each Christian being but a steward for the edifying of the whole, not receiving the gift merely for his own use. minister the same—not discontentedly envying or disparaging the gift of another. one to another—Greek as in v. 8, "towards yourselves;" implying that all form but one body, and in seeking the good of other members they are promoting the good of themselves. stewards—Referring to Matthew 25. 15, &c.; Luke 19. 13-26. 11. If any . . . speak—viz., as a prophet, or divinely-taught teacher in the Church assembly. the—The Greek has no article: "as oracles of God." This may be due to Greek, "God," having no article, it being a principle when a governed noun omits the Greek article, that the governing noun should omit it too. In Acts 7. 38 also, the Greek article is wanting; thus English Version, "as the oracles of God," viz., the Old Testament, would be right, and the precept be similar to Romans 12. 6, "prophecy according to the analogy of the faith." But the context suits better thus, "Let him speak as (becomes one speaking) oracles of God." His divinely-inspired words are not his own, but God's, and as a steward (6. 10) having them committed to him, he ought so to speak them. Jesus was the pattern in this respect (Matthew 7. 29; John 12. 49; 14. 10; cf. Paul, 2 Corinthians 2. 17). Note, the very same term as is applied in the only other passages where it occurs (Acts 7. 38; Romans 3. 2; Hebrews 5. 12), to the Old Testament inspired writings, is here predicated of the inspired words (the substance of which was afterwards committed to writing) of the New Testament prophets. minister—In acts; the other sphere of spiritual activity besides speaking. as of—"out of" the store of his "strength" (Greek, physical power in relation to outward service, rather than moral and intellectual "ability;" so in Mark 12. 30). giveth—Greek, "supplieth;" originally said of a choragus, who supplied the chorus with all necessaries for performing their several parts. that God in all things may be glorified—the final end of all a Christian's acts. through Jesus Christ—The mediator through whom all our blessings come down to us, and also through whom all our praises ascend to God. Through Christ alone can God be glorified in us and our sayings and doings. to whom—Christ. be—Greek, "is," for ever and ever—Greek, "unto the ages of the ages." 12. strange—they might think it strange that God should allow his chosen children to be sore tried. fiery trial—like the fire by which metals are tested and their dross removed. The Greek adds "in your case." which is to try you—Greek, "which is taking place for a trial to you." Instead of its "happening to you" as some strange and untoward chance, it "is taking place" with the gracious design of trying you; God has a wise design in it—a consolatory reflection. 13. inasmuch as—The oldest MSS. read, "in proportion as;" "in as far as" ye by suffering are partakers of Christ's sufferings, i. e., by faith enter into realizing fellowship with them; willingly for His sake suffering as He suffered. with exceeding joy—Greek, "exulting joy;" now ye rejoice amidst sufferings; then ye shall exult, for ever free from sufferings (ch. 1. 6, 8). If we will not bear suffering for Christ now, we must bear eternal sufferings hereafter. 14. for—Greek, "IN the name of Christ," viz., as Christians (v. 16; ch. 3. 14, above); "in my name, because ye belong to Christ." The emphasis lies on this: v. 15, "as a murderer, thief," &c., stands in contrast. Let your suffering be on account of Christ, not on account of evil-doing (ch. 2. 20). reproached—reproach affects noble minds more than loss of goods, or even bodily sufferings. the Spirit . . . upon you—the same Spirit as rested on Christ (Luke 4. 18). "The Spirit of glory" is His Spirit, for He is the "Lord of glory" (James 2. 1). Believers may well overcome the "reproach" (cf. Hebrews 11. 26), seeing that "the Spirit of glory" rests upon them, as upon Him. It cannot prevent the happiness of the righteous, if they are reproached for Christ, because they retain before God their glory entire, as having the Spirit, with whom glory is inseparably joined. [CALVIN.] and of God—Greek, "and the (Spirit) of God;" implying that the Spirit of glory (which is Christ's Spirit) is at the same time also the Spirit of God. on their part he is evil spoken of, but on your part he is glorified—Omitted in the two oldest Greek MSS. and Syriac and Coptic versions, but supported by one very old MS., Vulgate, Sahidic, Cyprian, &c. "Evil spoken of," lit., "blasphemed;" not merely do they "speak against you," as in ch. 3. 16, but blasphemously mock Christ and Christianity itself. 15. But—Greek, "For." "Reproached in the name of Christ" I say (v. 14), "FOR let none," &c. as . . . as . . . as . . . as—the as twice in italics is not in the Greek. The second Greek "as" distinguishes the class "busybody in other men's matters," from the previous class of delinquents. Christians, from mistaken zeal, under the plea of faithfulness, might readily step out of their own calling and make themselves judges of the acts of unbelievers. Lit., "a bishop in what is (not his own, but) another's" province; an allusion to the existing bishops or overseers of the Church; a self-constituted bishop in others' concerns. 16. a Christian—the name given in contempt first at Antioch, Acts 11. 26; 26. 27, 28; the only three places where the term occurs. At first believers had no distinctive name, but were called among themselves "brethren," Acts 6. 3; "disciples," Acts 6. 1; "those of the way," Acts 9. 2; "saints," Romans 1. 7; by the Jews (who denied that Jesus was the CHRIST, and so would never originate the name Christian), in contempt, "Nazarenes." At Antioch, where first idolatrous Gentiles (Cornelius, Acts 10.), was not an idolater, but a proselyte were converted, and wide missionary work began, they could be no longer looked on as a Jewish sect, and so the Gentiles designated them by the new name "Christians." The rise of the new name marked a new epoch in the Church's life, a new stage of its development, viz., its missions to the Gentiles. The idle and witty people of Antioch, we know from heathen writers, were famous for inventing nicknames. The date of this Epistle must have been when this had become the generally recognized designation among Gentiles (it is never applied by Christians to each other, as it was in after ages—an undesigned proof that the New Testament was composed when it professes), and when the name exposed one to reproach and suffering, though not seemingly as yet to systematic persecution. let him not be ashamed—though the world is ashamed of shame. To suffer for one's own faults is no honour (v. 15; ch. 2, 20),—for Christ, is no shame (v. 14; ch. 3, 13). but let him glorify God—not merely glory in persecution; Peter might have said as the contrast, "but let him esteem it an honour to himself;" but the honour is to be given to God, who counts him worthy of such an honour, involving exemption from the coming judgments on the ungodly. on this behalf—The oldest MSS. and Vulgate read, "in this name," i. e., in respect of suffering for such a name. 17. Another ground of consolation to Christians. All must pass under the judgment of God; God's own household first, their chastisement being here, for which they should glorify Him as a proof of their membership in His family, and a pledge of their escape from the end of those whom the last judgment shall find disobedient to the Gospel. the time—Greek, "season," "fit time." judgment must begin at the house of God—the Church of living believers. Peter has in mind Ezekiel 9, 6; cf. Amos 3, 2; Jeremiah 25, 29. Judgment is already begun, the Gospel word, as a "two-edged sword," having the double effect of saving some and condemning others, and shall be consummated at the last judgment. "When power is given to the destroyer, he observes no distinction between the righteous and the wicked; not only so, but he begins first at the righteous." [WESTERN from Rabbins.] But God limits the destroyer's power over His people. if . . . at us, what shall the end be of them, &c.—If even the godly have chastening judgments now, how much more shall the ungodly be doomed to damnatory judgments at last. Gospel of God—the very God who is to judge them. 18. scarcely—Cf. "so as by fire," 1 Corinthians 3, 15; having to pass through trying chastisements, as David did for his sin. "The righteous" man has always more or less of trial, but the issue is certain, and the entrance into the kingdom abundant at last. The "scarcely" marks the severity of the ordeal, and the unlikelihood (in a mere human point of view) of the righteous sustaining it; but the righteousness of Christ and God's everlasting covenant make it all sure. ungodly—having no regard for God; negative description. sinner—loving sin; positive; the same man is at once God-forgetting and sin-loving. appear—in judgment. 19. General conclusion from v. 17, 18. Seeing that the godly know that their sufferings are by God's will, to chasten them that they may not perish with the world, they have good reason to trust God cheerfully amidst sufferings, persevering in well-doing. let them—Greek, "let them also," "let even them," as well as those not suffering. Not only under ordinary circumstances, but also in time of suffering, let believers commit, &c. (cf. Note, ch. 3, 14). according to the will of God—(Note, ch. 3, 17.) God's will that the believer should suffer (v. 17), is for his good. One oldest MS. and Vulgate read, "In well-doings;" contrast ill-doings, v. 15. Our committing of ourselves to God is to be, not in indolent and passive quietism, but accompanied with active well-doings. faithful—to His covenant promises. Creator—who is therefore also our Almighty Preserver. He, not we, must keep our souls. Sin destroyed the original spiritual relation between creature and Creator, leaving that only of government. Faith restores it; so that the believer, living to the will of God (ch. 4, 2), rests implicitly on his Creator's faithfulness.

CHAPTER V.

Ver. 1-14. EXHORTATIONS TO ELDERS, JUNIORS, AND ALL IN GENERAL. PARTING PRAYER. CONCLUSION. 1. elders—alike in office and age (v. 5). I . . . also an elder—To put one's self on a level with those whom we exhort, gives weight to one's exhortations (cf. 2 John 1). Peter, in true humility for the Gospel's sake, does not put forward his apostleship here, wherein he presided over the elders. In the apostleship the apostles have no successors, for "the signs of an apostle" have not been transmitted. The presidents over the presbyters and deacons, by whatever name designated, angel, bishop, or moderator, &c., though of the same ORDER as the presbyters, yet have virtually succeeded to a superintendency of the Church analogous to that exercised by the apostles (this superintendency and priority existed from the earliest times after the apostles [TERTULLIAN]); just as the Jewish synagogue (the model which the Church followed) was governed by a council of presbyters, presided over by one of themselves; "the chief ruler of the synagogue." Cf. VITRINGA, Synagogue, Part II., ch. 3. and 7. witness—an eye-witness of Christ's sufferings, and so qualified to exhort you to believing patience in suffering for well-doing after His example (ch. 4, 19; 2, 20). This explains the "therefore" inserted in the oldest MSS., "I therefore exhort," resuming exhortation, ch. 4, 19. His higher dignity as an apostle is herein delicately implied, as eye-witnessing was a necessary qualification for apostleship; cf. Peter's own speeches, Acts 1, 21, 22; 2, 32; 10, 39. also—Implying the righteous recompense corresponding to the sufferings. partaker of the glory—according to Christ's promise; an earnest of which was given in the transfiguration. 2. Feed—Greek, "Tend as a shepherd," by discipline and doctrine. Lead, feed, heed; by prayer, exhortation, government, and example. The dignity is marked by the term "elder;" the duties of the office, to tend or oversee, by "bishop." Peter has in mind Christ's injunction to him, "Feed (tend) my sheep . . . Feed (pasture) my lambs" (John 21, 16). He invites the elders to share with him the same duty (cf. Acts 20, 28). The flock is Christ's. which is among you—Whilst having a concern for all the Church, your special duty is to feed that portion of it which is among you. oversight—Greek, "bishopric," or duty of bishops, i. e., overseer. not by constraint—necessity is laid upon them, but willingness prevents it being felt, both in undertaking and in fulfilling the duty. [BENGL.] "He is a true presbyter and minister of the counsel of God who doeth and teacheth the things of the Lord, being not accounted righteous merely because he is a presbyter, but because righteous, chosen into the presbytery." [CLEMENS ALEXANDRINUS.] willingly—One oldest MS., Vulgate, Syriac, and Coptic, add, "as God would have it to be done" (Romans 8, 27). not for filthy lucre—(Isaiah 56, 11; Titus 1, 7.) of a ready mind—promptly and heartily, without selfish motive of gain-seeking, as the Israelites gave their services willingly to the sanctuary. 3. being lords—Greek, "lording it;" implying pride and oppression. "Not that we have dominion over your faith." God's heritage—Greek, "the inheritances," i. e., the portions of the Church committed severally to your pastoral charge. [BENGL.] It is explained by "the flock" in the next clause. However, in v. 2, "flock of God which is among you," answering to "(God's) heritages" (plural to express the sheep who are God's portion and inheritance, Deuteronomy 32, 9) committed to you, favours English Version. The flock, as one whole, is God's heritage, or flock in the singular. Regarded in relation to its component sheep, divided among several pastors, it is in the plural "heritages." Cf. Acts 1, 17, 25, "Part" (the same Greek). Bernard of Clairvaux, wrote to Pope Eugene, "Peter could not give thee what he had not: what he had gave; the care over the Church, not dominion." being—Greek, "becoming." enamples—the most effective recommendation of precept (1 Timothy 4, 12). Titus 2, 7, "patterns." So Jesus, "A monstrosity it is to see the highest rank joined with the meanest mind, the first seat with the lowest life, a grandiloquent tongue with a lazy life, much talking with no fruit." [BERNARD.] 4. And—And so: as the result of "being enamples" (v. 3). chief Shepherd—The title peculiarly Christ's own, not Peter's or the pope's. when . . . shall appear—Greek, "be manifested" (Colossians 3, 4). Faith serves the Lord while still unseen. that fadeth not away—Greek, "amaranthine" (cf. ch. 1, 4). crown—Greek, stephanos, a garland of victory, the prize in the Grecian games, woven of ivy, parsley, myrtle, olive, or oak. Our crown is distinguished from theirs in that it is "incurruptible" and "fadeth not away," as the leaves of theirs soon did. "The crown of life." Not a kingly "crown" (a different Greek word, diadema): the prerogative tive of the Lord Jesus (Revelation 19. 12). glory—Greek, "the glory," viz., to be then revealed (v. 1; ch. 4. 13). 5. ye younger—The deacons were originally the younger men, the presbyters older; but subsequently as presbyter expressed the office of Church-ruler or teacher, so Greek neoteros means not (as lit.) young men in age, but subordinate ministers and servants of the Church. So Christ uses the term "younger." For He explains it by "he that doth serve," lit., he that ministereth as a deacon; just as He explains "the greatness" by "he that is chief," lit., "he that ruleth," the very word applied to the bishops or presbyters. So "the young men" are undoubtedly the deacons of the Church of Jerusalem, of whom, as being all Hebrews, the Hellenistic Christians subsequently complained as neglecting their Grecian widows, whence arose the appointment of the seven others, Hellenistic deacons. So here, Peter, having exhorted the presbyters, or elders, not to lord it over those committed to them, adds, Likewise ye neoters or younger, i. e., subordinate ministers and deacons, submit cheerfully to the command of the elders. [MOSHEIM.] There is no Scripture sanction for "younger" meaning laymen in general (as ALFORD explains): its use in this sense is probably of later date. The "all of you" that follows, refers to the congregation generally; and it is likely that, like Paul, Peter should notice, previous to the general congregation, the subordinate ministers as well as the presbyters, writing as he did to the same region (Ephesus), and to confirm the teaching of the apostle of the Gentiles. Yea—To sum up all my exhortations in one. be subject—Omitted in the oldest MSS. and Versions, but TISCHENDORF quotes the Vatican MS. for it. Then translate, "Gird (ch. 1. 13; 4. 1) fast on humility (lowliness of mind) to one another." The verb is lit., "tie on with a fast knot." [WAHL.] Or, "gird on humility as the slave dress (encomboma):" as the Lord girded himself with a towel to perform a servile office of humility and love, washing his disciples' feet, a scene in which Peter had played an important part, so that he would naturally have it before his mind. Cf. similarly v. 2 with John 21. 15-17. Clothing was the original badge of man's sin and shame. Pride caused the need of man's clothing, and pride still reigns in dress; the Christian therefore clothes himself in humility (ch. 3. 3, 4). God provides him with the robe of Christ's righteousness, in order to receive which man must be stripped of pride. God resisteth the proud—Quoted, as James 4. 6, from Proverbs 3. 34. Peter had James before his mind, and gives his Epistle inspired sanction. Cf. v. 9 with James 4. 7, lit., "arrayeth Himself against." Other sins flee from God: pride alone opposeth itself to God; therefore, God also in turn opposes Himself to the proud. [GERHARD in ALFORD.] Humility is the vessel of all graces. [AUGUSTINE.] 6. under the mighty hand—afflicting you (ch. 3. 15): "accept" His chastisements, and turn to Him that smiteth you. He depresses the proud and exalts the humble. in due time—wait humbly and patiently for His own fit time. One oldest MS. and Vulgate read, "In the season of visitation," viz., His visitation in mercy. 7. Castling—once for all: so the Greek aorist. care—"anxiety." The advantage flowing from humbling ourselves under God's hand (v. 6) is confident reliance on His goodness. Exemption from care goes along with humble submission to God. careth for you—lit., "respecting you." Care is a burden which faith casts off the man on his God. Cf. Psalm 22. 10; 37. 5; 55. 22, to which Peter alludes; Luke 12. 22, 37; Philippians 4. 6. careth—not so strong a Greek word as the previous Greek "anxiety." 8. Peter has in mind Christ's warning to himself to watch against Satan, from forgetting which he fell. Be sober . . . vigilant—"Care," i. e., anxiety, will intoxicate the soul; therefore be sober, i. e., self-restrained. Yet, lest this freedom from care should lead any to false security, he adds, "Be vigilant" against "your adversary." Let this be your "care." God provides, therefore do not be anxious. The devil seeks, therefore watch. [BENGEL.] because—Omitted in the oldest MSS. The broken and disjointed sentences are more fervid and forcible. LUCI-

FER of Cagliari reads as English Version. adversary—lit. opponent in a court of justice (Zechariah 3. 1). "Satan" means opponent. "Devil," accuser or slanderer (Revelation 12. 10). "The enemy" (Matthew 13. 39). "A murderer from the beginning" (John 8. 44). He counteracts the Gospel and its agents. "The tempter," roaring lion—Implying his violent and insatiable thirst for prey as a hungry lion. Through man's sin he got God's justice on his side against us; but Christ, our Advocate, by fulfilling all the demands of justice for us, has made our redemption altogether consistent with justice. walketh about—(Job 1. 7; 2. 2.) So the children of the wicked one cannot rest. Evil spirits are in 2 Peter 2. 4; Jude 6, said to be already in chains of darkness and in hell. This probably means that this is their doom finally: a doom already begun in part; though for a time they are permitted to roam in the world (of which Satan is prince), especially in the dark air that surrounds the earth. Hence perhaps arises the miasma of the air at times, as physical and moral evil are closely connected. deavour—entangle in worldly "care" (v. 7) and other snares, so as finally to destroy. Cf. Revelation 12. 15, 16. 9. (Luke 4. 13; Ephesians 6. 11-17; James 4. 7.) steadfast—Cf. "established in the truth," 2 Peter 1. 12. Satan's power exists only in respect to the unbelieving; the faithful he cannot hurt (1 John 5. 18). Faith gives strength to prayer, the great instrument against the foe (James 1. 6, &c.). knowing, &c.—"encouragement not to faint in afflictions;" your brethren suffer the same; nothing beyond the common lot of Christians befalls you (1 Corinthians 10. 13). It is a sign of God's favour rather than displeasure, that Satan is allowed to harass you, as he did Job. Your fellow-Christians have the same battle of faith and prayer against Satan. in the world—lying in the wicked one, and therefore necessarily the scene of "tribulation" (John 16. 33). are—are being accomplished according to the appointment of God. 10. Comforting assurance that God will finally "perfect" His work of "grace" in them, after they have undergone the necessary previous suffering. But—Only do you watch and resist the foe: God will perform the rest. [BENGEL.] of all grace—(Cf. ch. 4. 10.) The God to whom as its source all grace is to be referred—who in grace completes what in grace He began. He from the first "called you" (so the oldest MSS. read for 'us') unto (with a view to) glory." He will not let His purpose fall short of completion. If He does so in punishing, much more in grace. The three are fitly conjoined: the call, the glory to which we are called, and the way (suffering); the fourth is the ground of the calling, viz., the grace of God in Christ. by—Greek, "in." Christ is He in virtue of whom, and in union with whom, believers are called to glory. The opposite is "in the world" (v. 9; John 16. 33). after that ye have suffered—Join to "called you:" suffering, as a necessary preliminary to glory, was contemplated in God's calling. a while—short and inconsiderable, as compared with the glory. perfect, &c.—The two oldest MSS. and Vulgate and Coptic versions, read, "Shall perfect (so that there shall be nothing defective in you), stablish, strengthen," and omit "settle," lit., ground, or fix on a foundation. ALFORD reads it in spite of the oldest MSS. The authority of the latter I prefer; moreover the climax seems to require rather a verb of completing the work of grace, than, as the Greek means, founding it. The Greek has "shall HIMSELF perfect you:" though you are called on to watch and resist the foe, God Himself must really do all in and through you. The same God who begins must Himself complete the work. The Greek for "stablish" (so as to be "steadfast in the faith," v. 9) is the same as "strengthen," Luke 22. 32. Peter has in mind Christ's charge, "When thou art converted strengthen thy brethren." His exhortation accords with his name Peter, "Thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build my Church." "Stablish;" so as not to waver. "Strengthen" with might in the inner man by His Spirit, against the foe. 11. To him—Emphatic. To Him and Him alone: not to ourselves. Cf. "Himself," Note, v. 10. glory and—Omitted in the oldest MSS. and versions, dominion—Greek, "the might" shown in so "perfecting,"

&c., you, v. 10. 12. Silvanus—Silas, the companion of Paul and Timothy: a suitable messenger by whom to confirm, as Peter here does, Paul's doctrine of "the true grace of God" in the same churches (cf. 2 Peter 3. 16). We never meet with Silvanus as Paul's companion after Paul's last journey to Jerusalem. His connection with Peter was plainly subsequent to that journey, as I suppose—Join "faithful unto you [STEIGER], as I suppose." Silvanus may have stood in a close relation to the churches in Asia, perhaps having taken the oversight of them after Paul's departure, and had afterwards gone to Peter, by whom he is now sent back to them with this Epistle. He did not know, by positive observation, Silvanus' faithfulness to them; he therefore says, "faithful to you, as I suppose," from the accounts I hear; not expressing doubt. ALFORD joins "I have written unto you," which the Greek order favours. The seeming uncertainty, thus, is not as to Silvanus' faithfulness, which is strongly marked by the Greek article, but as to whether he or some other would prove to be the bearer of the letter, addressed as it was to five provinces, all of which Silvanus might not reach: "By Silvanus, that faithful brother, as I expect, I have written to you." [BIRKS.] briefly—Greek, "in few (words)," as compared with the importance of the subject (Hebrews 13. 22), exhorting—not so much formally teaching doctrines, which could not be done in so "few words." testifying—bearing my testimony in confirmation (so the Greek compound verb implies) of that truth which ye have already heard from Paul and Silas (1 John 2. 27). that this—of which I have just written, and of which Paul before testified to you (whose testimony, now that he was no longer in those regions, was called in question probably by some; cf. 2 Peter 3. 15, 16). 2 Peter 1. 12, "the present truth," viz., the grace formerly promised by the prophets, and now manifested to you. "Grace" is the key-note of Paul's doctrine which Peter now confirms (Ephesians 2. 5, 8). Their sufferings for the Gospel made them to need some attestation and confirmation of the truth, that they should not fall back from it. wherein ye stand—The oldest MSS. read imperatively, "Stand ye." Lit., "into which (having been already admitted, ch. 1. 8, 21; 2. 7, 8, 9) stand (therein)." Peter seems to have in mind Paul's words (Romans 5. 2; 1 Corinthians 15. 1). "The grace wherein we stand must be true, and our standing in it true also." [BENGEL.] Cf. in STEIGER, "He began his Epistle with grace (ch. 1. 2), he finishes it with grace, he has sprinkled the middle with grace, that in every part he might teach that the Church is not saved but by grace." 13. The . . . at Babylon—ALFORD, BENGEL, &c., translate, "She that is elected together with you in Babylon," viz., Peter's wife, whom he led about with him in his missionary journeys. Cf. ch. 3. 7, "heirs together of the grace of life." But why she should be called "elected together with you in Babylon," as if there had been no Christian woman in Babylon besides, is inexplicable on this view. In English Version the sense is clear: "That portion of the whole dispersion (ch. 1. 1, Greek), or Church of Christianized Jews, with Gentile converts, which resides in Babylon." As Peter and John were closely associated, Peter addresses the Church in John's peculiar province, Asia, and closes with "your co-elect sister Church at Babylon saluteth you;" and John similarly addresses the "elect lady," i. e., the Church in Babylon, and closes with "the children of thine elect sister (the Asiatic Church) greet thee;" cf. Introduction to 2 John). ERASMUS explains, "Mark who is in the place of a son to me:" cf. Acts 12. 12, implying Peter's connection with Mark; whence the mention of him in connection with the Church at Babylon, in which he laboured under Peter before he went to Alexandria, is not unnatural. PAPIAS reports from the presbyter John (B. 3. 39), that Mark was interpreter of Peter, recording in his Gospel the facts related to him by Peter. Silvanus or Silas had been substituted for John Mark, as Paul's companion, because of Mark's temporary unfaithfulness. But now Mark restored is associated with Silvanus, Paul's companion, in Peter's esteem, as Mark was already reinstated in Paul's esteem. That Mark had a spiritual connection with the Asiatic churches which Peter addresses, and so naturally salutes them, appears from 2 Timothy 4. 11; Colossians 4. 10. Babylon—The Chaldean Babylon on the Euphrates. See Introduction, ON THE PLACE OF WRITING this Epistle, in proof that Rome is not meant as Papists assert; cf. LIGHTFOOT sermon. How unlikely that in a friendly salutation the enigmatical title of Rome given in prophecy (John, Revelation 17. 5), should be used! Babylon was the centre from which the Asiatic dispersion whom Peter addresses was derived. PHILO, Legat. ad Caium, sec. 36, and JOSEPHUS, Antiquities, 15. 2. 2; 23. 12, inform us that Babylon contained a great many Jews in the apostolic age (whereas those at Rome were comparatively few, about 8000, JOSEPHUS 17. 11); so it would naturally be visited by the apostle of the circumcision. It was the headquarters of those whom he had so successfully addressed on Pentecost, Acts 2. 9, Jewish "Parthians . . . dwellers in Mesopotamia" (the Parthians were then masters of Mesopotamian Babylon); these he ministered to in person. His other hearers, the Jewish "dwellers in Cappadocia, Pontus, Asia, Phrygia, Pamphylia," he now ministers to by letter. The earliest distinct authority for Peter's martyrdom at Rome is DIONYSIUS, bishop of Corinth, in the latter half of the second century. The desirableness of representing Peter and Paul, the two leading apostles, as together founding the Church of the metropolis, seems to have originated the tradition. CLEMENT OF ROME (1 Epistola ad Corinthios, sec. 4. 5), often quoted for, is really against it. He mentions Paul and Peter together, but makes it as a distinguishing circumstance of Paul, that he preached both in the East and West, implying that Peter never was in the West. In 2 Peter 1. 14, he says, "I must shortly put off this tabernacle," implying his martyrdom was near, yet he makes no allusion to Rome, or any intention of his visiting it. 14. Kiss of charity—Romans 16. 16, "an holy kiss;" the token of love to God and the brethren. Love and holiness are inseparable. Cf. the instance, Acts 20. 37. peace—Peter's closing salutation; as Paul's is, "Grace be with you," though he accompanies it with "peace be to the brethren." "Peace" (flowing from salvation) was Christ's own salutation after the resurrection, and from Him Peter derives it. be with you all that are in Christ—The oldest MSS. omit "Jesus." In Ephesians 6. 24, addressed to the same region, the same limitation of the salutation occurs, whence, perhaps, Peter here adopts it. Contrast "Be with you all," Romans 16. 24; 1 Corinthians 16. 33.

THE SECOND EPISTLE GENERAL OF PETER. INTRODUCTION.

AUTHENTICITY AND GENUINENESS.—If not a gross imposture, its own internal witness is unequivocal in its favour. It has Peter's name and apostleship in its heading: not only his surname, but his original name Simon, or Simeon, he

thus, at the close of his life, reminding his readers who he originally was before his call. Again, in ch. 1. 18-18, he mentions his presence at the Transfiguration, and Christ's prophecy of his death: and in ch. 3. 15, his brotherhood with Paul. Again, in ch. 3. 1, the author speaks of himself as author of the former Epistle: it is, moreover, addressed so as to include (but not to be restricted to) the same persons as the first, whom he presupposes to be acquainted with the writings of Paul, by that time recognized as "Scripture" (ch. 3. 15, "the long-suffering of God," cf. Romans 2. 4). This necessarily implies a late date, when Paul's Epistles (including Romans) already had become generally diffused and accepted as Scripture in the Church. The Church of the fourth century had, besides the testimony which we have of the doubts of the earlier Christians, other external evidence which we have not, and which, doubtless, under God's overruling providence, decided them on accepting it. It is hard to understand how a book palpably false (as it would be if Peter be not the author) could have been accepted in the Canon as finally established in the Councils of Laodicea, 360 A. D. (if the 59th article be genuine), Hippo, and Carthage in the fourth century (393 and 397). The whole tone and spirit of the Epistle disprove its being an imposture. He writes as one not speaking of himself, but moved by the Holy Ghost (ch. 1. 21). An attempt at such a fraud in the first ages would have brought only shame and suffering, alike from Christians and heathen, on the perpetrator: there was then no temptation to pious frauds as in later times. That it must have been written in the earliest age, is plain from the wide gulf in style which separates it and the other New Testament Scriptures from even the earliest and best of the post-apostolic period. DAILEY well says, "God has allowed a fosse to be drawn by human weakness around the sacred canon to protect it from all invasion."

Traces of acquaintance with it appear in the earliest Fathers. HERMAS, Similes 6. 4; cf. ch. 2. 13, Greek, "luxury in the day...luxuriating with their own deceivings;" and Shepherd, Vision 3. 7, "They have left their true way" (cf. ch. 2. 15); and Vision 4. 3, "Thou hast escaped this world" (cf. ch. 2. 20). CLEMENT OF ROME, ad Corinthios, c. 7. 9 and 10, and to Noah's preaching and Lot's deliverance, "the Lord making it known that He does not abandon those that trust in Him, but appoints those otherwise inclined to judgment" (cf. ch. 2. 5, 6, 7, 9). IRENÆUS, A. D. 173 ("the day of the Lord is as a thousand years"), and JUSTIN MARTYR, seem to allude to ch. 3. 8. HIPPOLYTUS, De Antichristo, seems to refer to ch. 1. 21, "The prophets spake not of their own private (individual) ability and will, but what was (revealed) to them alone by God." The difficulty is, neither TERTULIAN, CYPRIAN, CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA, nor the oldest Syriac (Peshito) version (the later Syriac has it), nor the fragment known as MURATORI'S Canon, mentions it. The first writer who has expressly named it is ORIGEN, in the third century (Homily on Joshua; also 4th Homily on Leviticus, and 13th on Numbers), who names it "Scripture," quoting ch. 1. 4; 2. 16; however (in EUSEBIUS, Ecclesiastical History, 6. 25), he mentions that the Second Epistle was doubted by some. FIRMIAN, bishop of Cappadocia, in Epistle ad Cyprian, speaks of Peter's Epistles as warning us to avoid heretics (a monition which occurs in the Second, not the First Epistle). Now Cappadocia is one of the countries mentioned (cf. 1 Peter 1. 1 with ch. 3. 1) as addressed; and it is striking, that from Cappadocia we get the earliest decisive testimony. "Internally it claims to be written by Peter, and this claim is confirmed by the Christians of that very region in whose custody it ought to have been found." [TREGELLES.]

The books disputed (Antilegomena), as distinguished from those universally recognized (Homologomena), are Epistles, 2 Peter, James, 2 and 3 John, Jude, the Apocalypse, Epistle to Hebrews (cf. EUSEBIUS, Ecclesiastical History, 3. 3, 25). The Antilegomena stand in quite a different class from the Spurious; of these there was no dispute, they were universally rejected, e. g., the Shepherd of Hermas, the Revelation of Peter, the Epistle of Barnabas. CYRIL OF JERUSALEM (A. D. 348) enumerates seven Catholic Epistles, including 2 Peter; so also GREGORY OF NAZIANZEN (389 A. D.), and EPIPHANIUS, A. D. 367. The oldest Greek MSS. extant (of the fourth century) contain the Antilegomena. JEROME, De Viris Illustribus, conjectured, from a supposed difference of style between the two Epistles, that Peter, being unable to write Greek, employed a different translator of his Hebrew dictation in the Second Epistle, and not the same as translated the First into Greek. Mark is said to have been his translator in the case of the Gospel according to St. Mark; but this is all gratuitous conjecture.

Much of the same views pervade both Epistles. In both alike he looks for the Lord's coming suddenly, and the end of the world (cf. ch. 3. 8-10 with 1 Peter 4. 5); the inspiration of the prophets (cf. 1 Peter 1. 10-12 with ch. 1. 19-21; 3. 2); the new birth by the Divine word a motive to abstinence from worldly lusts (cf. 1 Peter 1. 22; 2. 2; cf. ch. 1. 4); also 1 Peter 2. 9 with ch. 1. 3, both containing in the Greek the rare word "virtue" (1 Peter 4. 17 with ch. 2. 3).

It is not strange that distinctive peculiarities of style should mark each Epistle, the design of both not being the same. Thus the sufferings of Christ are more prominent in the First Epistle, the object there being to encourage thereby Christian sufferers; the glory of the exalted Lord is more prominent in the Second, the object being to communicate fuller "knowledge" of Him as the antidote to the false teaching against which Peter warns his readers. Hence His title of redemption, "Christ," is the one employed in the First Epistle; but in the Second Epistle, "the Lord." Hope is characteristic of the First Epistle; full knowledge, of the Second Epistle. In the First Epistle he puts his apostolic authority less prominently forward than in the Second, wherein his design is to warn against false teachers. The same difference is observable in Paul's Epistles. Contrast 1 Thessalonians 1. 1; 2 Thessalonians 1. 1; Philippians 1. 1, with Galatians 1. 1; 1 Corinthians 1. 1. The reference to Paul's writings as already existing in numbers, and as then a recognized part of Scripture, implies that this Epistle was written at a late date, just before Peter's death.

Striking verbal coincidences occur: cf. 1 Peter 1. 19, end, with ch. 3. 14, end; ch. 1. 3, "His own," Greek, 2. 16; 3. 17 with 1 Peter 3. 1, 5. The omission of the Greek article, 1 Peter 2. 13 with ch. 1. 21; 2. 4, 5, 7. Moreover, two words occur, ch. 1. 13, "tabernacle," i. e., the body, and 15, "decease," which at once remind us of the transfiguration narrative in the Gospel. Both Epistles refer to the Deluge, and to Noah as the eighth that was saved. Though the First Epistle abounds in quotations of the Old Testament, whereas the Second contains none, yet references to the Old Testament occur often (ch. 1. 21; 2. 5-8, 15; 3. 5, 6, 10, 13). Cf. Greek, 1 Peter 3. 21, "putting away," with ch. 1. 14; 1 Peter 1. 17, Greek, Pass the time, with ch. 2. 13; 1 Peter 4. 3, "walked in," with ch. 2. 10; 3. 3; "called you," 1 Peter 1. 15; 2. 9; 5. 10, with ch. 1. 3.

Moreover, more verbal coincidences with the speeches of Peter in Acts occur in this Second, than in the First Epistle. Cf. Greek, "obtained," ch. 1. 1 with Acts 1. 17; ch. 1. 6, Greek, "godliness," with Acts 3. 12, the only passage where the term occurs, except in the Pastoral Epistles; and ch. 2. 9 with Acts 10. 2, 7; ch. 2. 9, "punished," with Acts 4. 21, the only places where the term occurs; ch. 3. 2, the double genitive, with Acts 5. 32; "the day of the Lord," ch. 3. 10, with Acts 2. 20, where only it occurs except in 1 Thessalonians 5. 2.

The testimony of Jude, 17, 18, is strong for its genuineness and inspiration, by adopting its very words, and by referring to it as received by the churches to which he, St. Jude, wrote, "Remember the words which were spoken before of the apostles of our Lord Jesus Christ; how that they told you there should be mockers in the last time, who should walk after their own ungodly lusts." Jude, therefore, must have written after 2 Peter, to which he plainly refers; not before, as ALFORD thinks. No less than eleven passages of Jude rest on similar statements of 2 Peter. Jude 2, cf. ch. 1. 2; Jude 4, cf. ch. 2. 1; Jude 6, cf. ch. 2. 4; Jude 7, cf. ch. 2. 6; Jude 8, cf. ch. 2. 10; Jude 9, cf. ch. 2. 11; Jude 11, cf. ch. 2. 15; Jude 12, cf. ch. 2. 17; Jude 16, cf. ch. 2. 18; Jude 18, cf. ch. 2. 1 and 3. 3. Just in the same way Micah ch. 4. 1-4 leans on the somewhat earlier prophecy of Isaiah, whose inspiration he thereby confirms. ALFORD reasons that because Jude, in many of the passages akin to 2 Peter, is fuller than 2 Peter, he must be prior. This by no means follows. It is at least as likely, if not more so, that the briefer is the earlier, rather than the fuller. The dignity and energy of the style is quite consonant to what we should expect from the prompt and ardent foreman of the apostles. The difference of style between 1 and 2 Peter accords with the distinctness of the subjects and objects.

THE DATE, from what has been said, would be about 68 or 69 A. D., about a year after the first, and shortly before the destruction of Jerusalem, the typical precursor of the world's end, to which ch. 3. so solemnly calls attention, after Paul's ministry had closed (cf. Greek aorist, "wrote," past time, ch. 3. 15), just before Peter's own death. It was written to include the same persons, and perhaps in, or about the same place, as the first. Being without salutations of individuals, and entrusted to the care of no one Church, or particular churches as the first is, but directed generally "to them that have obtained like precious faith with us," it took a longer time in being recognized as canonical. Had Rome been the place of its composition or publication, it could hardly have failed to have had an early acceptance—an incidental argument against the tradition of Peter's martyrdom at Rome. The remote scene of its composition in Babylon, or else in some of the contiguous regions beyond the borders of the Roman empire, and of its circulation in Cappadocia, Pontus, &c., will additionally account for its tardy but at last universal acceptance in the catholic Church. The former Epistle, through its more definite address, was earlier in its general acceptance.

OBJECT.—In ch. 3. 17, 18 the twofold design of the Epistle is set forth, viz., to guard his readers against "the error" of false teachers, and to exhort them to grow in experimental "knowledge of our Lord and Saviour." The ground on which this knowledge rests is stated, ch. 1. 12-21, viz., the inspired testimony of apostles and prophets. The danger now, as of old, was about to arise from false teachers, who soon were to come among them, as Paul also (to whom reference is made, ch. 3. 15, 16) testified in the same region. The grand antidote is "the full knowledge of our Lord and Saviour," through which we know God the Father, partake of His nature, escape from the pollutions of the world, and have entrance into Christ's kingdom. The aspect of Christ presented is not so much that of the past suffering, as of the future reigning, Saviour, His present power, and future new kingdom. This aspect is taken as best fitted to counteract the theories of the false teachers who should "deny" His Lordship and His coming again, the two very points which, as an apostle and eye-witness, Peter attests (His "power" and His "coming"); also, to counteract their evil example in practice, blaspheming the way of truth, despising governments, slaves to covetousness and filthy lusts of the flesh, whilst boasting of Christian freedom, and, worst of all, apostates from the truth. The knowledge of Christ, as being the knowledge of "the way of righteousness," "the right way," is the antidote of their bad practice. Hence "the preacher of righteousness," Noah, and "righteous Lot," are instanced as escaping the destruction which overtook the "unjust" or "unrighteous;" and Balaam is instanced as exemplifying the awful result of "unrighteousness" such as characterized the false teachers. Thus the Epistle forms one connected whole, the parts being closely bound together by mutual relation, and the end corresponding with the beginning; cf. ch. 3. 14, 18 with ch. 1. 2, in both "grace" and "peace" being connected with "the knowledge" of our Saviour; cf. also ch. 3. 17 with 1. 4, 10, 12; and ch. 3. 18, "grow in grace and knowledge," with the fuller ch. 1. 5-8; and ch. 2. 21; and ch. 3. 13, "righteousness," with ch. 1. 1; and ch. 3. 1 with ch. 1. 13; and ch. 3. 2 with ch. 1. 19.

The germs of Carpocratian and Gnostic heresies already existed, but the actual manifestation of these heresies is spoken of as future (ch. 2. 1, 2, &c.); another proof that this Epistle was written, as it professes, in the apostolic age, before the development of the Gnostic heresies in the end of the first and the beginning of the second centuries. The description is too general to identify the heresies with any particular one of the subsequent forms of heresy, but applies generally to them all.

Though altogether distinct in aim from the First Epistle, yet a connection may be traced. The neglect of the warnings to circumspection in the walk, led to the evils foretold in the Second Epistle. Cf. the warning against the abuse of Christian freedom, 1 Peter 2. 16 with ch. 2. 19, "While they promise thee liberty, they themselves are the servants of corruption;" also the caution against pride, 1 Peter 5. 5, 6 with ch. 2. 18, "they speak great swelling words of vanity."

CHAPTER I.

Ver. 1-21. ADDRESS: EXHORTATION TO ALL GRACES, AS GOD HAS GIVEN US, IN THE KNOWLEDGE OF CHRIST, ALL THINGS PERTAINING TO LIFE: CONFIRMED BY THE TESTIMONY OF APOSTLES, AND ALSO PROPHETS, TO THE POWER AND COMING OF CHRIST. 1. Simon—the Greek form: in oldest MSS., "Symeon" (Hebrew, i. e., hearing), as in Acts 15. 14. His mention of his original name, accords with the design of this Second Epistle, which is to warn against the coming false teachers, by setting forth the true "knowledge" of Christ on the testimony of the original apostolic eye-witnesses like himself. This was not required in the First Epistle, servant—"slave;" so Paul, Romans 1. 1. to them, &c.—He addresses a wider range of readers (all believers) than in the First Epistle, ch. 1., but means to include especially those addressed in the First Epistle, as ch. 3. 1 proves, obtained—by grace. Applied by Peter to the receiving of the apostleship, lit., by allotment: as the Greek is, Luke 1. 9; John 19. 24. They did not acquire it for themselves; the Divine election is as independent of man's control, as the lot which is cast forth, like precious—"equally precious" to all; to those who believe, though not having seen Christ, as well as to Peter and those who have seen Him. For it lays hold of the same "exceeding great and precious promises," and the same "righteousness of God our Saviour." "The common salvation . . . the faith once delivered unto the saints" (Jude 3). with us—apostles and eye-witnesses (v. 18). Though putting forward his apostleship to enforce his exhortation, he with true humility puts himself, as to "the faith," on a level with all other believers. The degree of faith varies in different believers; but in respect to its objects, present justification, sanctification, and future glorification, it is common alike to all. Christ is to all believers "made of God wisdom, righteousness, sanctification, and redemption." through—Greek, "IN." Translate, as the one article to both nouns requires, "the righteousness of Him who is (at once) our God and (our) Saviour." Peter, confirming Paul's testimony to the same churches, adopts Paul's lup-sided phraseology. The Gospel plan sets forth God's righteousness, which is Christ's righteousness, in the brightest light. Faith has its sphere in it as its peculiar element: God is in redemption "righteous," and at the same time a "Saviour;" cf. Isaiah 45, 21, "a just God and a Saviour." 2. Grace . . . peace—(1 Peter 1, 2.) through—Greek, "in;" the sphere in which alone grace and peace can be multiplied. knowledge—Greek, "full knowledge." of God, and of Jesus our Lord—the Father is here meant by "God," but the Son in v. 1: marking how entirely one the Father and Son are (John 14, 7-11). The Vulgate omits "of God and;" but oldest MSS. support the words. Still the prominent object of Peter's exhortation is "the knowledge of Jesus our Lord" (a phrase only in Romans 4, 24), and, only secondarily, of the Father through Him (v. 8; ch. 2, 20; 3, 18). 3. According as—Seeing that. [ALFORD.] "As He hath given us ALL things (needful) for life and godliness, (so) do you give us ALL diligence," &c. The oil and flame are given wholly of grace by God, and "taken" by believers: their part henceforth is to "trim their lamps" (cf. v. 3, 4 with 5, &c.). life and godliness—Spiritual life must exist first before there can be true godliness. Knowledge of God experimentally is the first step to life (John 17, 3). The child must have vital breath first, and then cry to, and walk in the ways of, his father. It is not by godliness that we obtain life, but by life, godliness. To life stands opposed corruption; to godliness, lust (v. 4). called us—v. 10—"calling" (1 Peter 2, 9). to glory and virtue—rather, "through (His) glory." Thus English Version reads as one oldest MS. But other oldest MSS; and Vulgate read, "By His own (peculiar) glory and virtue;" being the explanation of "His Divine power;" glory and moral excellency (the same attribute is given to God in 1 Peter 2, 9, "praises," lit., virtues) characterize God's "power." "Virtue," the standing word in heathen ethics, is found only once in Paul (Philippians 4, 8), and in Peter in a distinct sense from its classic usage; it (in the heathen sense) is a term too low and earthly for expressing the gifts of the Spirit. [TRENCH, Synonyms.] 4. Whereby—By His glory and virtue: His glory making the "promises" to be exceeding great; His virtue making them "precious." [BENGEL.] Precious promises are the object of precious faith. given—the promises themselves are a gift: for God's promises are as sure as if they were fulfilled. by these—promises. They are the object of faith, and even now have a sanctifying effect on the believer, assimilating him to God. Still more so, when they shall be fulfilled. might—Greek, "that ye MAY become partakers of the Divine nature," even now in part; hereafter perfectly; 1 John 3, 2, "We shall be like Him." the Divine nature—not God's essence, but His holiness, including His "glory" and "virtue," v. 3; the opposite to "corruption through lust." Sanctification is the imparting to us of God Himself by the Holy Spirit in the soul. We by faith partake also of the material nature of Jesus (Ephesians 5, 30.) The "Divine power" enables us to be partakers of "the Divine nature." escaped the corruption—which involves in, and with itself, destruction at last of soul and body; on "escaped" as from a condemned cell, cf. ch. 2, 18-20; Genesis 19, 17; Colossians 1, 13. through—Greek, "in." "The corruption in the world" has its seat, not so much in the surrounding elements, as in the "lust" or concupiscence of men's hearts. 5. And besides this—rather, "And for this very reason," viz., "seeing that His Divine power hath given unto us all things that pertain to life and godliness" (v. 3). giving—lit., introducing, side by side with God's gift, on your part "diligence." Cf. an instance, v. 10; ch. 3, 14; 2 Corinthians 7, 11. all—all possible. add—lit., "minister additionally," or abundantly (cf. Greek, 2 Corinthians 9, 10); said properly of the one who supplied all the equipments of a chorus. So accordingly, "there will be ministered abundantly unto you an entrance into the everlasting kingdom of our Saviour" (v. 11). to—Greek, "in;" in the possession of your faith, minister virtue. Their faith (answering to "knowledge of Him," v. 3) is presupposed as the gift of God (v. 3; Ephesians 2, 8), and is not required to be ministered by us; in its exercise, virtue is to be, moreover, ministered. Each grace being assumed, becomes the stepping-stone to the succeeding grace; and the latter in turn qualifies and completes the former. Faith leads the band; love brings up the rear [BENGEL.] The fruits of faith specified are seven, the perfect number. virtue—moral excellency; manly, strenuous energy, answering to the virtue (energetic excellency) of God, and to—Greek, "in;" "and in (the exercise of) your virtue knowledge," viz., practical discrimination of good and evil; intelligent appreciation of what is the will of God in each detail of practice. 6. Greek, "And in your knowledge self-control." In the exercise of Christian knowledge or discernment of God's will, let there be the practical fruit of self-control as to one's lusts and passions. Incontinence weakens the mind; continence, or self-control, removes weakness and imparts strength. [BENGEL.] "And in your self-control patient endurance" amidst sufferings, so much dwelt on in the First Epistle, ch. 2, 3, and 4. "And in your patient endurance godliness;" it is not to be mere stolid endurance, but united to [and flowing from] God-trusting. [ALFORD.] 7. "And in your godliness brotherly kindness;" not suffering your godliness to be moroseness, nor a sullen solitary habit of life, but kind, generous, and courteous. [ALFORD.] Your natural affection and brotherly kindness are to be sanctified by godliness. "And in your brotherly kindness love," viz., to all men, even to enemies, in thought, word, and deed. From brotherly kindness we are to go forward to love. Cf. 1 Thessalonians 3, 12, "Love one toward another (brotherly kindness), and toward all men" (charity). So charity completes the choir of graces in Colossians 3, 14. In a retrograde order, he who has love will exercise brotherly kindness; he who has brotherly kindness will feel godliness needful; the godly will mix nothing stoical with his patience; to the patient, temperance is easy; the temperate weighs things well, and so has knowledge; knowledge guards against sudden impulse carrying away its virtue. [BENGEL.] 8. be—Greek, "subsist," i. e., supposing these things to have an actual subsistence in you; "be" would express the mere matter-of-fact being (Acts 16, 20). abound—more than in others; so the Greek. make—"render," "constitute you," habitually, by the very fact of possessing these graces. barren—"inactive," and, as a field lying fallow and unworked (Greek), so barren and useless. unfruitful in—rather, ". . . in respect to," &c. "The full knowledge (Greek) of Christ" is the goal towards which all these graces tend. As their subsisting in us constitutes us not barren or idle, so their abounding in us constitutes us not unfruitful in respect to it. It is through doing His will, and so becoming like Him, that we grow in knowing Him (John 7, 17). 9. But—Greek, "For." Confirming the need of these graces (v. 5-8) by the fatal consequences of the want of them. he that lacketh—Greek, "he to whom these are not present." blind—as to the spiritual realities of the unseen world. and cannot see afar off—Explanatory of "blind." He closes his eyes (Greek) as unable to see distant objects (viz., heavenly things), and fixes his gaze on present and earthly things which alone he can see. Perhaps a degree of wilfulness in the blindness is implied in the Greek, "closing the eyes," which constitutes its culpability; hating and rebelling against the light shining around him. forgotten—Greek, "contracted forgetfulness," wilful and culpable oblivion. that he was purged—The continually present sense of one's sins having been once for all forgiven, is the strongest stimulus to every grace (Psalm 130, 4). This once-for-all accomplished cleansing of unbelievers at their new birth is taught symbolically by Christ, John 13, 10, Greek, "He that has been bathed (once for all) needeth not save to wash his feet (of the soils contracted in the daily walk), but is clean every whit (in Christ our righteousness)." "Once purged (with Christ's blood), we should have no more consciousness of sin" (as condemning us, Hebrews 10, 2), because of God's promise. Baptism is the sacramental pledge of this. 10. Wherefore—Seeking the blessed consequence of having, and the evil effects of not having, these graces (v. 8, 9). the rather—the more earnestly. brethren—marking that it is affection for them which constrains him so earnestly to urge them. Nowhere else does he so address them, which makes his calling them so here the more emphatical. give diligence—

The Greek aorist implies one life-long effect. [ALFORD.] to make—Greek middle voice; to make so far as it depends on you; to do your part towards making. "To make" absolutely and finally is God's part, and would be in the active. your calling and election sure—by "ministering additionally in your faith virtue, and in your virtue knowledge," &c. God must work all these graces in us, yet not so that we should be mere machines, but willing instruments in His hands in making His election of us "secure." The ensuring of our election is spoken of not in respect to God, whose counsel is steadfast and everlasting, but in respect to our part. There is no uncertainty on His part, but on ours the only security is our faith in His promise and the fruits of the Spirit (v. 5-7, 11). Peter subjoins election to calling, because the calling is the effect and proof of God's election, which goes before and is the main thing (Romans 8, 28, 30, 33, where God's "elect" are those "predestinated," and election is "His purpose," according to which he "called" them). We know His calling before His election, thereby calling is put first. fall—Greek, "stumble" and fall finally (Romans 11, 11). Metaphor from one stumbling in a race (1 Corinthians 9, 24). 11. an—rather as Greek, "the entrance" which ye look for. ministered—the same verb as in v. 5. Minister in your faith virtue and the other graces, so shall there be ministered to you the entrance into that heaven where these graces shine most brightly. The reward of grace hereafter shall correspond to the work of grace here. abundantly—Greek, "richly." It answers to "abound," v. 8. If these graces abound in you, you shall have your entrance into heaven not merely "scarcely" (as he had said, 1 Peter 4, 18), nor "so as by fire," like one escaping with life after having lost all his goods, but in triumph without "stumbling and falling." 12. Wherefore—as these graces are so necessary to your abundant entrance into Christ's kingdom (v. 10, 11). I will not be negligent—The oldest MSS. read, "I will be about always to put you in remembrance" (an accumulated future: I will regard you as always needing to be reminded): cf. "I will endeavour," v. 15. "I will be sure always to remind you." [ALFORD.] "Always;" implying the reason why he writes the second Epistle so soon after the first. He feels there is likely to be more and more need of admonition on account of the increasing corruption (ch. 2, 1, 2). in the present truth—the Gospel-truth now present with you: formerly promised to Old Testament believers as about to be, now in the New Testament actually present with, and in, believers, so that they are "established" in it as a "present" reality. Its importance renders frequent admonitions never superfluous: cf. Paul's similar apology, Romans 15, 14, 15. 13. Ye—Greek, "But;" though "you know" the truth (v. 12). this tabernacle—soon to be taken down (2 Corinthians 5, 1): I therefore need to make the most of my short time for the good of Christ's Church. The zeal of Satan against it, the more intense as his time is short, ought to stimulate Christians on the same ground. by—Greek, "IN" (cf. ch. 3, 1). 14. shortly I must put off—Greek, "the putting off (as a garment) of my tabernacle is speedy;" implying a soon approaching, and also a sudden death (as a violent death is). Christ's words, John 21, 18, 19, "When thou art old," &c., were the ground of his "knowing," now that he was old, that his foretold martyrdom was near. Cf. as to Paul, 2 Timothy 4, 6. Though a violent death, he calls it a "departure" (Greek for "decease," v. 15), cf. Acts 7, 60. 15. endeavour—"use my diligence:" the same Greek word as in v. 10: this is the field in which my diligence has scope. Peter thus fulfils Christ's charge, "Feed my sheep." decease—"departure." The very word (exodus) used in the Transfiguration, Moses and Elias conversing about Christ's decease (found nowhere else in the New Testament, but Hebrews 11, 22, "the departing of Israel" out of Egypt, to which the saints' deliverance from the present bondage of corruption answers). "Tabernacle" is another term found here as well as there (Luke 9, 31, 33): an undesigned coincidence confirming Peter's authorship of this Epistle. that ye may be able—by the help of this written Epistle; and perhaps also of St. Mark's Gospel, which Peter superintended. always—Greek, "on each occasion:" as often as occasion may require. to have . . . in remembrance—Greek, "to exercise remembrance of." Not merely "to remember," as sometimes we do, things we care not about; but "have them in (earnest) remembrance," as momentous and precious truths. 16. For—Reason why he is so earnest that the remembrance of these things should be continued after his death. followed—out in detail. cunningly-devised—Greek, "devised by (man's) wisdom," as distinguished from what the Holy Ghost teaches (cf. 1 Corinthians 3, 13). But cf. also ch. 2, 3, "feigned words," fables—as the heathen mythologies, and the subsequent Gnostic "fables and genealogies," of which the germs already existed in the junction of Judaism with Oriental philosophy in Asia Minor. A precautionary protest of the Spirit against the rationalistic theory of the Gospel history being myth. when we made known unto you—not that Peter himself had personally taught the churches in Pontus, Galatia, &c., but he was one of the apostles whose testimony was borne to them, and to the Church in general, to whom this Epistle is addressed (ch. 1, 1, including, but not restricted, as 1 Peter, to the churches in Pontus, &c.). power—the opposite of "fables:" cf. the contrast of "word" and "power," 1 Corinthians 4, 20. A specimen of His power was given at the Transfiguration; also of His "coming" again, and its attendant glory. The Greek for "coming" is always used of His second advent. A refutation of the scoffers (ch. 3, 4): I, James and John, saw with our own eyes a mysterious sample of His coming glory. were—Greek, "were made." eye-witnesses—As initiated spectators of mysteries (so the Greek), we were admitted into His innermost secrets, viz., at the Transfiguration. his—Emphatical (cf. Greek): THAT great, ONE'S majesty. 17. received . . . honour—in the voice that spake to Him. glory—in the light which shone around Him. came—Greek, "was borne:" the same phrase occurs only in 1 Peter 1, 13: one of several instances showing that the argument against the authenticity of this Second Epistle, from its dissimilarity of style as compared with 1 Peter, is not well founded, such a voice—as he proceeds to describe. from the excellent glory—rather as Greek, "BY (i. e., uttered by) the magnificent glory" (i. e., by God: as His glorious manifested presence is often called by the Hebrews "the Glory," cf. "His Excellency," Deuteronomy 33, 26; Psalm 21, 5). in whom—Greek, "in regard to whom" (accusative); but Matthew 17, 5, "in whom" (dative) centres and rests my good pleasure. Peter also omits, as not required by his purpose, "hear Him," showing his independence in his inspired testimony. I am—Greek aorist, past time, "My good pleasure rested from eternity." 18. we—Emphatical: we, James and John, as well as myself. which came—rather as Greek, "we heard borne from heaven." holy mount—as the Transfiguration mount came to be regarded, on account of the manifestation of Christ's Divine glory there. 19. and—and so, viz., by this sample of Christ's glory in His humiliation (John 1, 14), and earnest of His coming glory in His exaltation. We—all believers. a more sure—rather as Greek, "we have the word of prophecy more sure" (confirmed). Previously we knew its sureness by faith, but, through that visible specimen of its hereafter entire fulfilment, assurance is made doubly sure. Prophecy assures us that Christ's sufferings, now past, are to be followed by Christ's glory, still future: the Transfiguration gives us a pledge to make our faith still stronger, that "the day" of His glory will "dawn" ere long. He does not mean to say that "the word of prophecy," or Scripture, is surer than the voice of God heard at the Transfiguration, as English Version; for this is plainly not the fact. The fulfilment of prophecy so far in Christ's history makes us the surer of what is yet to be fulfilled, His consummated glory. The word was the "lamp (Greek for 'light') heeded" by Old Testament believers, until a gleam of the "daydawn" was given at Christ's first coming, and especially in His Transfiguration. So the word is a lamp to us still, until "the day" burst forth fully at the second coming of "the Sun of righteousness." The day, when it dawns upon you, makes sure the fact that you saw correctly, though indistinctly, the objects revealed by the lamp, whereunto—to which word of prophecy, primarily the Old Testament in Peter's day; but now also in our day the New Testament, which, though brighter than the Old Testament (cf. 1 John 2, 3, end), is but a lamp even still as compared with the brightness of the eternal day (cf. ch. 3, 2). Oral teachings and traditions of ministers are to be tested by the written word (Acts 17, 11). dark—the Greek implies squalid, having neither water nor light: such spiritually is the world without, and the smaller world (microcosm) within, the heart in its natural state. Cf. the "dry places" Luke 11, 24 (viz., unwatered by the Spirit), through which the unclean spirit goeth. dawn—bursting through the darkness. day-star—Greek, "the morning star," as Revelation 22, 16. The Lord Jesus. In your hearts—Christ's arising in the heart by His Spirit giving full assurance, creates spiritually full day in the heart, the means to which is prayerfully giving heed to the word. This is associated with the coming of the day of the Lord, as being the earnest of it. Indeed, even our hearts shall not fully realize Christ in all His unspeakable glory and felt presence, until He shall come (Malachi 4, 2). Isaiah 66, 14, 15, "When you see this, your heart shall rejoice . . . For, behold, the Lord will come." However, TREGELLES' punctuation is best, "whereunto ye do well to take heed (as unto a light shining in a dark place, until the day have dawned and the morning star arisen) in your hearts." For the day has already dawned in the heart of believers; what they wait for is, its visible manifestation at Christ's coming. 20. "Forasmuch as ye know this" (1 Peter 1, 13). first—the foremost consideration in studying the word of prophecy. Laying it down as a first principle never to be lost sight of, is—Greek, not the simple verb, to be, but to begin to be, "proves to be," "becometh." No prophecy is found to be the result of "private (the mere individual writer's uninspired) interpretation" (solution), and so origination. The Greek noun epitulis, does not mean in itself origination; but that which the sacred writer could not always fully interpret, though being the speaker or writer (as 1 Peter 1, 10-12 implies), was plainly not of his own, but of God's disclosure, origination, and inspiration, as Peter proceeds to add, "But holy men . . . spake (and afterwards wrote) . . . moved by the Holy Ghost;" a reason why ye should "give" all "heed" to it. The parallelism to v. 16 shows that "private interpretation," contrasted with "moved by the Holy Ghost," here answers to "fables devised by (human) wisdom," contrasted with "we were eyewitnesses of His majesty," &c., as attested by the "voice from God." The words of the prophetic (and so of all) Scripture writers were not mere words of the individuals, and therefore to be interpreted by them, but of "the Holy Ghost" by whom they were "moved." "Private" is explained, v. 21, "by the will of man" (viz., the individual writer). In a secondary sense the text teaches also, as the word is the Holy Spirit's, it cannot be interpreted by its readers (any more than by its writers by their mere private human powers, but by the teaching of the Holy Ghost (John 16, 14). "He who is the author of Scripture is its supreme interpreter." [GERHARD.] ALFORD translates, "Springs not out of human interpretation," i. e., is not a prognostication made by a man knowing what he means when he utters it, but, &c. (John 11, 49-52). Rightly: except that the verb is rather, Doth become, or prove to be. It not being of private interpretation, you must "give heed" to it, looking for the Spirit's Illumination "in your hearts" (cf. Notes, v. 19). 21. came not in old time—rather, "was never at any time borne" (to us). by the will of man—alone. Jeremiah 23, 26, "prophets of the deceit of their own heart." Cf. ch. 3, 5, "willingly." holy—One oldest MS. has, "men from God:" the emissaries from God. "Holy," if read, will mean because they had the Holy Spirit. moved—Greek, "borne" (along) as by a mighty wind: Acts 2, 2, "rushing (the same Greek) wind:" rapt out of themselves; still not in fanatical excitement (1 Corinthians 14, 32). The Hebrew nabi, "prophet," meant an announcer or interpreter of God: he, as God's spokesman, interpreted not his own "private" will or thought, but God's. "Man of the Spirit" (Margin, Hosca 9, 7). "Thou tes-tifiedst by thy spirit in thy prophets." "Seer," on the other hand, refers to the mode of receiving the communications from God, rather than to the utterance of them to others. "Spake" implies that, both in its original oral announcement, and now even when in writing, it has been always, and is, the living voice of God speaking to us through His inspired servants. Greek, "Borne (along)" forms a beautiful antithesis to "was borne." They were passive, rather than active instruments. The Old Testament prophets primarily, but including also all the inspired penmen, whether of the New or Old Testament (ch. 3, 2).

CHAPTER II.

Ver. 1-22. FALSE TEACHERS TO ARISE: THEIR BAD PRACTICES AND SURE DESTRUCTION, FROM WHICH THE GODLY SHALL BE DELIVERED, AS LOT WAS. 1. But—In contrast to the prophets "moved by the Holy Ghost" (ch. 1, 21). also—as well as the true prophets (ch. 1, 19-21). Paul had already testified the entrance of false prophets into the same churches. among the people—Israel: he is writing to believing Israelites primarily (Note, 1 Peter 1, 1). Such a "false prophet" was Balaam (v. 15). there shall be—already symptoms of the evil were appearing (v. 9-22; Jude 4-13). false teachers—teachers of falsehood. In contrast to the true teachers, whom he exhorts his readers to give heed to (ch. 3, 2). who—such as (lit., "the which") shall, privily—not at first openly and directly, but by the way, bringing in error by the side of the true doctrine (so the Greek): Rome objects, Protestants cannot point out the exact date of the beginnings of the false doctrines superadded to the original truth; we answer, Peter foretells us it would be so, that the first introduction of them would be stealthy and unobserved (Jude 4). dammable—lit., "of destruction;" entailing destruction (Philippians 3, 19) on all who follow them. heresies—self-chosen doctrines, not emanating from God (cf. "will-worship," Colossians 2, 23). even—going even to such a length as to deny both in teaching and practice. Peter knew, by bitter repentance, what a fearful thing it is to deny the Lord (Luke 22, 61, 62). denying—Him whom, above all others, they ought to confess. Lord—"Master and Owner" (Greek), cf. Jude 4, Greek. Whom the true doctrine teaches to be their OWNER by right of purchase. Lit., "denying Him who bought them (that He should be thereby), their Master." bought them—even the ungodly were bought by His "precious blood." It shall be their bitterest self-reproach in hell, that, as far as Christ's redemption was concerned, they might have been saved. The denial of His propitiatory sacrifice is included in the meaning (cf. 1 John 4, 3). bring upon themselves—cf. "God bringing in the flood upon the world," v. 5. Man brings upon himself the vengeance which God brings upon him, swift—swiftly descending: as the Lord's coming shall be swift and sudden. As the ground swallowed up Korah and Dathan, and "they went down quick into the pit." Cf. Jude 11, which is akin to this passage. 2. follow—out: so the Greek. pernicious ways—The oldest MSS. and Vulgate read, "licentiousness" (Jude 4). False doctrine and immoral practice generally go together (v. 18, 19). by reason of whom—"on account of whom," viz., the followers of the false teachers. the way of truth shall be evil spoken of—"blasphemed" by those without, who shall lay on Christianity itself the blame of its professors' evil practice. Contrast 1 Peter 2, 12. 3. through—Greek, "in covetousness" as their element (v. 14, end). Contrast 2 Corinthians 11, 20; 12, 17. of a long time—in God's eternal purpose. "Before of old ordained to condemnation" (Jude 4). lingereth not—though sinners think it lingers. "Is not idle." damnation—Greek, "destruction" (Note v. 1). Personified. slumbereth not—though sinners slumber. 4. If—The apodosis or consequent member of the sentence is not expressed, but is virtually contained in v. 9. If God in past time has punished the ungodly, and saved His people, He will be sure to do so also in our days (cf. end of v. 3). angels—the highest of intelligent creatures (cf. with this verse, Jude 6), yet not spared when they sinned. hell—Greek, "Tartarus;" nowhere else in

New Testament or LXX.: equivalent to the usual Greek, Geenna. Not inconsistent with 1 Peter 5. 8; for though their final doom is hell, yet for a time they are permitted to roam beyond it in "the darkness of this world." Slaves of Tartarus (called "the abyss," or "deep," Luke 8. 31; "the bottomless pit," Revelation 9. 11) may also come upon earth. Step by step they are given to Tartarus, until at last they shall be wholly bound to it. delivered—as the judge delivers the condemned prisoner to the officers (Revelation 20. 2). into chains—(Jude 6.) The oldest MSS. read, "dens," as ALFORD translates: the Greek, however, may, in Hellenistic Greek, mean "chains," as Jude expresses it. They are "reserved" unto hell's "mist of darkness" as their final "judgment" or doom, and meanwhile their exclusion from the light of heaven is begun. So the ungodly were considered as virtually "in prison," though at large on the earth, from the moment that God's sentence went forth, though not executed till 120 years after. 5. eighth—i. e., Noah, and seven others. Contrasted with the densely-peopled "world of the ungodly." preacher—not only "righteous" himself (cf. v. 8), but also "a preacher of righteousness:" adduced by Peter against the licentiousness of the false teachers (v. 2) who have no prospect before them but destruction, even as it overtook the ungodly world in Noah's days. 6. with—"to overthrow." [ALFORD.] ensample—"of (the fate that should befall) those who in after time should live ungodly." Cf. Jude 7, "set forth for an example." 7. just—righteous. filthy conversation—lit., "behaviour in licentiousness" (Genesis 19. 5). the wicked—Greek, "lawless:" who set at defiance the laws of nature, as well as man and God. The Lord reminds us of Lot's faithfulness, but not of his sin in the cave: so in Rahab's case. 8. vexed—Greek, "tormented." 9. knoweth how—He is at no loss for means, even when men see no escape. out of—not actually from. temptations—trials. to be punished—Greek, "being punished:" as the fallen angels (v. 4), actually under sentence, and awaiting its final execution. Sin is already its own penalty; hell will be its full development. 10. chiefly—they especially will be punished (Jude 8). after—following after. lust of uncleanness—defilement: "hankering after polluting and unlawful use of the flesh." [ALFORD.] government—Greek, "lordship," "dominion" (Jude 8). presumptuous—Greek, "Darers." Self-will begets presumption. Presumptuously daring. are not afraid—though they are so insignificant in might; Greek, "tremble not" (Jude 8, end). speaking evil of—Greek, "blaspheme." dignities—Greek, "glories." II. which are—though they are, greater—than these blasphemers. Jude instances Michael, against them—against "dignities," as for instance, the fallen angels: once exalted, and still retaining traces of their former power and glory. railing accusation—Greek, "blaspheming judgment" (Jude 9), before the Lord—in the presence of the Lord, the Judge, in reverence, they abstain from judgment. [BENGEL.] Judgment belongs to God, not the angels. How great is the dignity of the saints who, as Christ's assessors, shall hereafter judge angels! Meanwhile, railing judgments, though spoken with truth, against dignities, as being uttered irreverently, are of the nature of "blasphemies" (Greek: 1 Corinthians 4. 4, 5). If superior angels dare not, as being in the presence of God, the Judge, speak evil even of the bad angels, how awful the presumption of those who speak evil blasphemously of good "dignities." 2 Samuel 16. 7, 8, Shimei; Numbers 16. 2, 3, Korah, &c., referred to also in Jude 11; Numbers 12. 8, "Were ye (Aaron and Miriam) not afraid to speak evil of my servant Moses?" The angels who sinned still retain the indelible impress of majesty. Satan is still "a strong man:" "prince of this world;" and under him are "principalities, powers, rulers of the darkness of this world." We are to avoid irreverence in regard to them, not on their account, but on account of God. A warning to those who use Satan's name irreverently and in blasphemy. "When the ungodly curseth Satan, he curseth his own soul." 12. (Jude 10, 19). But—in contrast to the "angels," v. 11. brute—Greek, "irrational." In contrast to angels that "excel in strength." beasts—Greek, "animals" (cf. Psalm 49. 20). natural—Transposed in the oldest MSS., "Born natural," i. e., born naturally so: being in their very nature (i. e., naturally) as such (irrational animals), born to be taken and destroyed (Greek, "unto capture and destruction," or corruption, Note, Galatians 6. 8; cf. end of this verse, "shall perish," lit., shall be corrupted, in their own corruption. Jude 10, "naturally . . . corrupt themselves," and so destroy themselves; for one and the same Greek word expresses corruption, the seed, and destruction, the developed fruit). speaking evil of—Greek, "in the case of things which they understand not." Cf. the same presumption, the parent of subsequent Gnostic error, producing an opposite, though kindred, error, "the worshipping of good angels:" Colossians 2. 18, "intruding into those things which he hath not seen." 13. receive—"shall carry off as their due." reward of—i. e., for their "unrighteousness." [ALFORD.] Perhaps it is implied, unrighteousness shall be its own reward or punishment. "Wages of unrighteousness" (v. 15) has a different sense, viz., the earthly gain to be gotten by "unrighteousness." In the day-time—translate as Greek, "counting the luxury which is in the day-time (not restricted to night, as ordinary revelling. Or as Vulgate, CALVIN, &c., 'the luxury which is but for a day:' so Hebrews 11. 25, 'the pleasures of sin for a season,' and 12. 16, Esau) to be pleasure," i. e., to be their chief good and highest enjoyment. Spots—in themselves. blemishes—disgraces: bringing blame (so the Greek) on the Church and on Christianity itself. sporting themselves—Greek, "luxuriating." with—Greek, "IN." deceivings—or else passively, "deceits:" luxuries gotten by deceit. Cf. Matthew 13. 22, "Deceitfulness of riches;" Ephesians 4. 22, "Deceitful lusts;" Whilst deceiving others, they are deceived themselves. Cf. with English Version, Philippians 3. 19, "Whose glory is in their shame." "Their own" stands in opposition to "you:" "Whilst partaking of the love-feast (cf. Jude 12) with you," they are at the same time "luxuriating in their own deceivings," or "deceits" (to which latter clause answers Jude 12, end: Peter presents the positive side, "they luxuriate in their own deceivings;" Jude, the negative, "feeding themselves without fear"). But several of the oldest MSS., Vulgate, Syriac, and Sahidic Versions read (as Jude), "In their own love feasts:" "their own" will then imply that they pervert the love-feasts so as to make them subserve their own self-indulgent purposes. 14. full of adultery—lit., "full of an adulteress," as though they carried about adulteresses always dwelling in their eyes: the eye being the avenue of lust. [HORNEUS.] BENGEL makes the adulteress who fills their eyes, to be "alluring desire," that cannot cease—"that cannot be made to cease from sin." beguiling—"luring baits for." unstable—not firmly established in faith and piety. heart—not only the eyes, which are the channel, but the heart, the fountain-head of lust. Job 31. 7, "Mine heart walked after mine eyes." covetous practices—The oldest MSS. read singular, "covetousness." cursed children—rather as Greek, "children of curse," i. e., devoted to the curse. Cursing and covetousness, as in Balaam's case, often go together: the curse he designed for Israel, fell on Israel's foes and on himself. True believers bless, and curse not, and so are blessed. 15. have—Some of the seducers are spoken of as already come, others as yet to come. following—out: so the Greek. the way—(Numbers 22. 23, 32; Isaiah 56. 11.) son of Bosor—the same as Beor (Numbers 22. 5). This word was adopted, perhaps, because the kindred word Basar means flesh; and Balaam is justly termed son of carnality, as covetous, and the enticer of Israel to lust. loved the wages of unrighteousness—and therefore wished (in order to gain them from Balak) to curse Israel whom God had blessed, and at last gave the hellish counsel, that the only way to bring God's curse on Israel was to entice them to fleshly lust and idolatry, which often go together. 16. was rebuked—Greek, "had a rebuke," or conviction; an exposure of his specious wickedness on his being tested (the root verb of the Greek noun means to convict on testing). his—Greek, "his own;" his own beast convicted him of his own iniquity. ass-

lit., "beast of burden;" the ass was the ordinary animal used in riding in Palestine. dumb—Greek, "voiceless-speaking in man's voice;" marking the marvellous nature of the miracle. forbade—lit., "hindered." It was not the words of the ass (for it merely deprecated his beating it), but the miraculous fact of its speaking at all, which withstood Balaam's perversity in desiring to go after God had forbidden him in the first instance. Thus indirectly the ass, and directly the angel, rebuked his worse than asinine obstinacy; the ass turned aside at the sight of the angel, but Balaam, after God had plainly said, Thou shalt not go, persevered in wishing to go for gain; thus the ass, in act, forbade his madness. How awful a contrast—a dumb beast forbidding an inspired prophet! 17. (Jude 12, 13.) wells—"clouds" in Jude; both promising (cf. v. 19) water, but yielding none; so their "great swelling words" are found on trial to be but "vanity" (v. 18). clouds—The oldest MSS. and versions read, "mists," dark, and not transparent and bright as "clouds" often are, whence the latter term is applied sometimes to the saints; fit emblem of the children of darkness. "Clouds" is a transcriber's correction from Jude 12, where it is appropriate, "clouds . . . without water" (promising what they do not perform); but not here, "mists driven along by a tempest." mist—blackness; "the chilling horror accompanying darkness." [BENGE.] 18. allure—Greek, "lay baits for," through—Greek, "IN;" the lusts of the flesh being the element in which they lay their baits. much wantonness—Greek, "by licentiousness;" the bait which they lay. clean escaped—Greek, "really," &c. But the oldest MSS. and Vulgate read, "scarcely," or "for but a little time;" scarcely have they escaped from them who live in error (the ungodly world), when they are allured by these seducers into sin again (v. 20). 19. promise . . . liberty—(Christian)—these promises are instances of their "great swelling words" (v. 18). The liberty which they propose is such as fears not Satan, nor loathes the flesh. Pauline language, adopted by Peter here, and 1 Peter 2. 16, Note; cf. ch. 3. 15; Romans 6. 16-22; 8. 15, 21; Galatians 5. 1, 13; cf. John 8. 34. corruption—Note, v. 12, "destroyed . . . perish . . . corruption," of whom—"by whatever . . . by the same, &c." 20. after they—the seducers "themselves" have escaped (v. 19); Note, Hebrews 6. 46). pollutions—which bring corruption" (v. 19). through—Greek, "IN." knowledge—Greek, "full and accurate knowledge." the Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ—solemnly expressing in full the great and gracious One from whom they fall. latter end is worse . . . than the beginning—Peter remembers Christ's words, "Worse" stands opposed to "better" (v. 21). 21. the way of righteousness—"the way of truth" (v. 2). Christian doctrine, and "the knowledge of the Lord and Saviour," turn—back again; so the Greek, from the holy commandment—the Gospel which enjoins holiness; in opposition to their corruption. "Holy," not that it makes holy, but because it ought to be kept inviolate. [TITTMANN.] delivered—once for all; admitting no turning back. 22. But—You need not wonder at the event; for dogs and swine they were before, and dogs and swine they will continue. They "scarcely" (v. 18) have escaped from their filthy folly, when they again are entangled in it. Then they seduce others who have in like manner "for a little time escaped from them that live in error" (v. 18). Peter often quoted Proverbs in his First Epistle (1. 7; 2. 17; 4. 8, 18; another proof that both Epistles come from the same writer.

CHAPTER III.

Ver. 1-18. SURENESS OF CHRIST'S COMING, AND ITS ACCOMPANIMENTS, DECLARED IN OPPOSITION TO SCOFFERS ABOUT TO ARISE. GOD'S LONG-SUFFERING A MOTIVE TO REPENTANCE, AS PAUL'S EPISTLES SET FORTH; CONCLUDING EXHORTATION TO GROWTH IN THE KNOWLEDGE OF CHRIST. 1. now—"This now a second Epistle I write." Therefore he had lately written the former Epistle. The seven Catholic Epistles were written by James, John, and Jude, shortly before their deaths; previously, whilst having the prospect of being still for some time alive, they

felt it less necessary to write. [BENGE.] unto you—The Second Epistle, though more general in its address, yet included especially the same persons as the First Epistle was particularly addressed to. pure—lit., "pure when examined by sunlight;" "sincere." Adulterated with no error. Opposite to "having the understanding darkened." ALFORD explains, The mind, will, and affection, in relation to the outer world, being turned to God [the Sun of the soul], and not obscured by fleshly and selfish regards. by way of—Greek, "IN," in putting you in remembrance (ch. 1. 12, 13). Ye already know (v. 3); it is only needed that I remind you (Jude 5). 2. prophets—of the Old Testament. of us—The oldest MSS. and Vulgate read, "And of the commandment of the Lord and Saviour (declared) by your apostles" (so "apostle of the Saviours," Romans 11, 13)—the apostles who live among you in the present time, in contrast to the Old Testament "prophets." 3. Knowing this first—from the word of the apostles. shall come—their very scoffing shall confirm the truth of the prediction. scoffers—The oldest MSS. and Vulgate add, "(scoffers) in (i. e., with) scoffing." As Revelation 14. 2, "Harping with harps." walking after their own lusts—(Ch. 2. 10; Jude 16, 18). Their own pleasure is their sole law, unrestrained by reverence for God. 4. (Cf. Psalm 10. 11; 73. 11.) Presumptuous skepticism and lawless lust, setting nature and its so-called laws above the God of nature and revelation, and arguing from the past continuity of nature's phenomena that there can be no future interruption to them, was the sin of the antediluvians, and shall be that of the scoffers in the last days. Where—Implying that it ought to have taken place before this, if ever it was to take place, but that it never will. the promise—which you, believers, are so continually looking for the fulfilment of (v. 13). What becomes of the promise which you talk so much of? his—Christ's; the subject of prophecy from the earliest days. the fathers—to whom the promise was made, and who rested all their hopes on it. all things—in the natural world; skeptics look not beyond this. as they were—continue as they do; as we see them to continue. From the time of the promise of Christ's coming as Saviour and King being given to the fathers, down to the present time, all things continue, and have continued, as they now are, from "the beginning of creation." The "scoffers" here are not necessarily atheists, nor do they maintain that the world existed from eternity. They are willing to recognize a God, but not the God of revelation. They reason from seeming delay against the fulfilment of God's word at all. 5. Refutation of their scoffing from Scripture history. willingly—wiffully; they do not wish to know. Their ignorance is voluntary. they . . . are ignorant of—In contrast to v. 8, "Be not ignorant of this." Lit., in both verses, "This escapes THEIR notice (sagacious philosophers though they think themselves);" "let this not escape YOUR notice." They obstinately shut their eyes to the Scripture record of the creation and the deluge; the latter is the very parallel to the coming judgment by fire, which Jesus mentions, as Peter doubtless remembered. by the word of God—not by a fortuitous concurrence of atoms. [ALFORD.] of old—Greek, "from of old;" from the first beginning of all things. A confutation of their objection, "all things continue as they were FROM THE BEGINNING OF CREATION." Before the flood, the same objection to the possibility of the flood might have been urged with the same plausibility: The heavens (sky) and earth have been FROM OF OLD, how unlikely then that they should not continue so! But, replies Peter, the flood came in spite of their reasonings; so will the conflagration of the earth come in spite of the "scoffers" of the last days, changing the whole order of things (the present "world," or as Greek means, "order"), and introducing the new heavens and earth (v. 13). earth standing out of—Greek, "consisting of," i. e., "formed out of the water." The waters under the firmament were at creation gathered together into one place, and the dry land emerged out of, and above them. in—rather, "by means of the water," as a great instrument (along with fire) in the changes wrought on the earth's surface to prepare it for man. Held together by the water. The earth arose out of the water by the efficacy of the water itself. [TITTMANN.] ¶ Whereby—Greek, "By which" (plural). By means of which heavens and earth (in respect to the WATERS which flowed together from both) the then world perished (i. e., in respect to its occupants, men and animals, and its then existing order; not was annihilated); for in the flood "the fountains of the great deep were broken up" from the earth (1.) below, and "the windows of heaven" (2.) above "were opened." The earth was deluged by that water out of which it had originally risen. 7. (Cf. Job 28. 5, end.) which are now—"the postdiluvian visible world." In contrast to "that then was," v. 6. the same—Other oldest MSS. read, "His" (God's). kept in store—Greek, "treasured up," reserved—"kept." It is only God's constantly watchful providence which holds together the present state of things till His time for ending it. 8. be not ignorant—as those scoffers are (v. 5). Besides the refutation of them (v. 5-7) drawn from the history of the deluge, here he adds another (addressed more to believers than to the mockers), God's delay in fulfilling His promise is not, like men's delays, owing to inability or fickleness in keeping His word, but through "long-suffering." this one thing—as the consideration of chief importance (Luke 10. 42). one day . . . thousand years—Psalm 90. 4: Moses there says, Thy eternity, knowing no distinction between a thousand years and a day, is the refuge of us creatures of a day. Peter views God's eternity in relation to the last day: that day seems to us, short-lived beings, long in coming, but with the Lord the interval is irrespective of the idea of long or short. His eternity exceeds all measures of time: to His Divine knowledge all future things are present: His power requires not long delays for the performance of His work: His long-suffering excludes all impatient expectation and eager haste, such as we men feel. He is equally blessed in one day and in a thousand years. He can do the work of a thousand years in one day: so in v. 9 it is said, "He is not slack," i. e., "slow:" He has always the power to fulfil His "promise." thousand years as one day—no delay which occurs is long to God: as to a man of countless riches, a thousand guineas are as a single penny. God's æonologie (eternal-ages measurer) differs wholly from man's horologe (hour-glass). His gnomon (dial-pointer) shows all the hours at once in the greatest activity and in perfect repose. To Him the hours pass away, neither more slowly, nor more quickly, than befits His economy. There is nothing to make Him need either to hasten or delay the end. The words, "with the Lord" (Psalm 90. 4, "In thy sight"), silence all man's objections on the ground of his incapability of understanding this. [BENGL.] 9. slack—slow, tardy, late; exceeding the due time, as though that time were already come. Hebrews 10. 37, "Will not tarry." his promise—which the scoffers cavil at. Ver. 4, "Where is the promise?" It shall be surely fulfilled "according to His promise" (v. 13). some—"the scoffers." count—His promise to be the result of "slackness" (tardiness). long-suffering—waiting until the full number of those appointed to "salvation" (v. 15) shall be completed. to us-ward—The oldest MSS., Vulgate, Syriac, &c., read, "towards you." any—not desiring that any, yea, even that the scoffers, should perish, which would be the result if He did not give space for repentance. come-go and be received to repentance; the Greek implies, there is room for their being received to repentance (cf. Greek, Mark 2. 2; John 8. 37). 10. The certainty, suddenness, and concomitant effects, of the coming of the day of the Lord. FABER argues from this that the millennium, &c., must precede Christ's literal coming, not follow it. But "the day of the Lord" comprehends the whole series of events, beginning with the premillennial advent, and ending with the destruction of the wicked, and final conflagration, and general judgment (which last intervenes between the conflagration and the renovation of the earth). will—Emphatical. But (in spite of the mockers, and notwithstanding the delay) come and be present the day of the Lord SHALL, as a thief—Peter remembers and repeats his Lord's image (Luke 12. 39, 41) used in the conversation in which he took a part; so also Paul (1 Thessalonians 5. 2) and John (Revelation 3. 3; 16. 15). the heavens—which the scoffers say shall "continue" as they are (v. 4; Matthew 24. 35; Revelation 21. 1). with a great noise—with a rushing noise, like that of a whizzing arrow, or the crash of a devouring flame. elements—the component materials of the world. [WAHL.] However, as "the works" in the earth are mentioned separately from "the earth," so it is likely by "elements," mentioned after "the heavens," are meant "the works therein," viz., the sun, moon, and stars (as THEOPHILUS OF ANTIOCH, p. 22, 143, 223; and JUSTIN MARTYR, Apology, 2. 44, use the word "elements"); these, as at creation, so in the destruction of the world, are mentioned. [BENGL.] But as "elements" is not so used in Scripture Greek, perhaps it refers to the component materials of "the heavens," including the heavenly bodies; it clearly belongs to the former clause, "the heavens," not to the following, "the earth," &c. melt—be dissolved, as in v. 11. the works . . . therein—of nature and of art. 11. Your duty, seeing that this is so, is to be ever eagerly expecting the day of God. then—Some oldest MSS. substitute "thus" for "then:" a happy refutation of the "thus" of the scoffers, v. 4 (English Version, "As they were," Greek, "thus"). shall be—Greek, "are being (in God's appointment, soon to be fulfilled) dissolved;" the present tense implying the certainty as though it were actually present. what manner of men to be—Exclamatory. How watchful, prayerful, zealous! to be—not the mere Greek substantive verb of existence (einai), but (huparechein) denoting a state or condition in which one is supposed to be. [TITTMANN.] What holy men ye ought to be found to be, when the event comes! This is "the holy commandment" mentioned in v. 2. conversation . . . godliness—Greek plural: Behaviours (towards men), godlinesses (or pieties towards God) in their manifold modes of manifestation. 12. hastening unto—with the utmost eagerness desiring [WAHL], praying for, and contemplating, the coming Saviour as at hand. The Greek may mean "hastening (i. e., urging onward [ALFORD] the day of God;" not that God's eternal appointment of the time is changeable, but God appoints us as instruments of accomplishing those events which must be first before the day of God can come. By praying for His coming, furthering the preaching of the Gospel for a witness to all nations, and bringing in those whom "the long-suffering of God" waits to save, we hasten the coming of the day of God. The Greek verb is always in New Testament used as neuter (as English Version here), not active; but the LXX. use it actively. Christ says, "Surely I come quickly. Amen." Our part is to speed forward this consummation by praying, "Even so, come, Lord Jesus." the coming—Greek, "presence" of a person: usually, of the Saviour. the day of God—God has given many myriads of days to men: one shall be the great "day of God" Himself, wherein—rather as Greek, "on account of (or owing to) which" day. heavens—the upper and lower regions of the sky. melt—our igneous rocks show that they were once in a liquid state. 13. Nevertheless—"But:" in contrast to the destructive effects of the day of God stand its constructive effects. As the flood was the baptism of the earth, eventuating in a renovated earth, partially delivered from "the curse," so the baptism with fire shall purify the earth so as to be the renovated abode of regenerated man, wholly freed from the curse. his promise—(Isaiah 65. 17; 66. 22.) The "we" is not emphatical as in English Version. new heavens—new atmospheric heavens surrounding the renovated earth. righteousness—dwelleth in that coming world as its essential feature, all pollutions having been removed. 14. that ye . . . be found of him—"In His sight" [ALFORD], at His coming; plainly implying a personal coming. without spot—at the coming marriage feast of the Lamb, in contrast to ch. 2. 13, "Spots they are and blemishes while they feast," not having on the King's pure wedding garment. blameless—(1 Corinthians 1. 8; Philippians 1. 10; 1 Thessalonians 3. 13; 5. 23.) in peace—In all its aspects, towards God, your own consciences, an your fellow-men, and as its consequence eternal blessedness: "the God of peace" will effect this for

you. 15. account . . . the long-suffering . . . is salvation—is designed for the salvation of those yet to be gathered into the Church: whereas those scoffers "count it (to be the result of) slackness" on the Lord's part (v. 9). our beloved brother Paul—A beautiful instance of love and humility. Peter praises the very Epistles which contain his condemnation. according to the wisdom given unto him—Adopting Paul's own language, 1 Corinthians 3. 10, "According to the grace of God which is given unto me as a wise master-builder." Supernatural and inspired wisdom "GIVEN" him, not acquired in human schools of learning. hath written—Greek aorist, "wrote," as a thing wholly past: Paul was by this time either dead, or had ceased to minister to them. to you—Galatians, Ephesians, Colossians, the same region as Peter addresses. Cf. "in peace," v. 14, a practical exhibition of which Peter now gives in showing how perfectly agreeing Paul (who wrote the Epistle to the Galatians) and he are, notwithstanding the event recorded (Galatians 2. 11-14). Colossians 4. refers to Christ's second coming. The Epistle to the Hebrews, too (addressed not only to the Palestinian, but also secondarily to the Hebrew Christians everywhere), may be referred to, as Peter primarily (though not exclusively) addresses in both Epistles the Hebrew Christians of the dispersion (Note, 1 Peter 1. 1). Hebrews 9. 27, 28; 10. 25, 37, "speak of these things" (v. 16) which Peter has been handling, viz., the coming of the day of the Lord, delayed through His "long-suffering," yet near and sudden. 16. also in all his Epistles—Romans 2. 4 is very similar to v. 15, beginning. The Pauline Epistles were by this time become the common property of all the churches. The "all" seems to imply they were now completed. The subject of the Lord's coming is handled, 1 Thessalonians 4. 13; 5. 11; cf. v. 10 with 1 Thessalonians 5. 2. Still Peter distinguishes Paul's Epistle, or Epistles, "to you," from "all his (other) Epistles," showing that certain definite churches, or particular classes of believers, are meant by "you," in which—Epistles. The oldest MSS. read the feminine relative (hais); not as Received Text (hois), "in which things," some things hard to be understood—viz., in reference to Christ's coming, e. g., the statements as to the man of sin and the apostasy, before Christ's coming. "Paul seemed thereby to delay Christ's coming to a longer period than the other apostles, whence some doubted altogether His coming." [BENGL.] Though there be some things hard to be understood; there are enough besides plain, easy, and sufficient for perfecting the man of God. "There is scarce anything drawn from the obscure places, but the same in other places may be found most plain." [AUGUSTINE.] It is our own prejudice, foolish expectations, and carnal fancies, that make Scripture difficult. [JEREMY TAYLOR.] unlearned—Not those wanting human learning are meant, but those lacking the learning imparted by the Spirit. The humanly learned have been often most deficient in spiritual learning, and have originated many heresies. Cf. 2 Timothy 2. 23, a different Greek word, "unlearned," lit., "untutored." When religion is studied as a science, nothing is more abstruse; when studied in order to know our duty and practise it, nothing is easier. unstable—not yet established in what they have learned; shaken by every seeming difficulty; who, in perplexing texts, instead of waiting until God by His Spirit make them plain in comparing them with other Scriptures, hastily adopt distorted views. wrest—strain and twist (properly with a hand-screw) what is straight in itself, e. g., 2 Timothy 2. 18. other Scriptures—Paul's Epistles were, therefore, by this time, recognized in the Church, as "Scripture:" a term never applied in any of the fifty places where it occurs, save to the Old and New Testament sacred writings. Men in each Church having miraculous discernment of spirits would have prevented any un-inspired writing from being put on a par with the Old Testament word of God; the apostles' lives also were providentially prolonged, Paul and Peter's at least to thirty-four years after Christ's resurrection, John's to thirty years later, so that fraud in the canon is out of question. The three first Gospels and Acts are included in "the other Scriptures," and perhaps all the New Testament books, save John and Revelation, written later. unto their own destruction—not through Paul's fault (ch. 2. 1). 17. Ye—Warned by the case of those "unlearned and unstable" persons (v. 16). knowing . . . before—the event. led away with—the very term, as Peter remembers, used by Paul of Barnabas being "carried," Greek, led away with Peter and the other Jews in their hypocrisy. wicked—"lawless," as in ch. 2. 7. fall from—(grace, Galatians 5. 4: the true source of "steadfastness" or stability in contrast with the "unstable" (v. 16): "established" (ch. 1. 12): all kindred Greek terms. Cf. Jude 20, 21. 18. grow—Not only do not "fall from" (v. 17), but grow onward: the true secret of not going backward. Ephesians 4. 15, "Grow up into Him, the Head, Christ." grace and . . . knowledge of . . . Christ—"the grace and knowledge of Christ" [ALFORD rightly]: the grace of which Christ is the author, and the knowledge of which Christ is the object. for ever—Greek, "to the day of eternity:" the day that has no end; "the day of the Lord," beginning with the Lord's coming.

THE FIRST GENERAL EPISTLE OF JOHN. INTRODUCTION.

AUTHORSHIP.—POLYCARP, the disciple of John (ad Philippenses c. 7), quotes ch. 4. 3. EUSEBIUS (Ecclesiastical History 3. 39) says of PAPIAS, a hearer of John, and a friend of POLYCARP, "He used testimonies from the First Epistle of John." IRENEUS, according to EUSEBIUS (Ecclesiastical History 5. 8), often quotes this Epistle. So in his work Against Heresies (3. 15. 5, 8) he quotes from John by name, ch. 2. 18, &c.; and in 3. 16, 7, he quotes ch. 4. 1-3; 5. 1, and 2 John 7. 8. CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA (Stromata 2. 66, p. 464) refers to ch. 5. 16, as in John's larger Epistle. See other quotations, Stromata 3. 32, 42; 4. 102. TERTULLIAN (Adversus Marcion 5. 16) refers to ch. 4. 1, &c.; Adversus Praxean, c. 15, to 1 John 1. 1. See his other quotations, c. 28; and Contra Gnosticos, 12. CYPRIAN, Epistle 23 (24), quotes, as John's, ch. 2. 3, 4; and De Oratione Domini 5, quotes ch. 2. 15-17; and De Opere et Eleemos, ch. 1. 8; and De Bene Patientia 2, quotes ch. 2. 6. MURATORI'S fragment on the Canon states, "There are two of John (the Gospel and Epistle?) esteemed Catholic," and quotes ch. 1. 3. The Peschito Syriac contains it. ORIGEN (in EUSEBIUS 6. 25) speaks of the First Epistle as genuine, and "probably the second and third, though all do not recognize the latter two" on the Gospel of John, tom. 13. vol. 2, he quotes ch. 1. 5. DIONYSIUS OF ALEXANDRIA, ORIGEN'S scholar, cites the words of this Epistle as those of the Evangelist John. EUSEBIUS, Ecclesiastical History 3. 24, says, John's first Epistle and Gospel are acknowledged without question by those of the present day, as well as by the ancients. So also JEROME, in Catalogus Ecclesiasticorum

Scriptorium. The opposition of COSMAS INDICOPLEUSTES, in the sixth century, and that of MARCION because our Epistle was inconsistent with his views, are of no weight against such irrefragable testimony.

The internal evidence is equally strong. Neither the Gospel, nor our Epistle, can be pronounced an imitation; yet both, in style and modes of thought, are evidently of the same mind. The individual notices are not so numerous or obvious as in Paul's writings, as was to be expected in a Catholic Epistle; but such as there are accord with John's position. He implies his apostleship, and perhaps alludes to his Gospel, and the affectionate tie which bound him as an aged pastor to his spiritual "children;" and in ch. 2, 18, 19; 4, 1-3, he alludes to the false teachers as known to his readers; and in ch. 5, 21 warns them against the idols of the surrounding world. It is no objection against its authenticity, that the doctrine of the Word, or Divine second Person, existing from everlasting, and in due time made flesh, appears in it, as also in the Gospel, as opposed to the heresy of the Docetæ in the second century, who denied that our Lord is come in the flesh, and maintained He came only in outward semblance; for the same doctrine appears in Colossians 1, 15-18; 1 Timothy 3, 16; Hebrews 1, 1-3; and the gems of Docetism, though not fully developed till the second century, were in existence in the first. The Spirit, presciently through John, puts the Church beforehand on its guard against the coming heresy.

TO WHOM ADDRESSED.—AUGUSTINE, Quest. Evang., 2, 39, says this Epistle was written to the Parthians. BEDE, in a prologue to the seven Catholic Epistles, says that Athanasius attests the same. By the Parthians may be meant the Christians living beyond the Euphrates in the Parthian territory, outside the Roman empire, "the Church at Babylon elected together with" the churches in the Ephesian region, the quarter to which Peter addressed his Epistles. As Peter addressed the flock which John subsequently tended (and in which Paul had formerly ministered), so John, Peter's close companion after the ascension, addresses the flock among whom Peter had been when he wrote. Thus "the elect lady" answers to "the Church elected together." See farther confirmation of this view in Introduction to 2 John. It is not necessarily an objection to this view that John never is known to have personally ministered in the Parthian territory. For neither did Peter personally minister to the churches in Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, Bithynia, though he wrote his Epistles to them. Moreover, in John's prolonged life, we cannot dogmatically assert that he did not visit the Parthian Christians, after Peter had ceased to minister to them, on the mere ground of absence of extant testimony to that effect. This is as probable a view as ALFORD'S, &c., that in the passage of Augustine, "to the Parthians," is to be altered by conjectural emendation; and that the Epistle is addressed to the churches at and around Ephesus, on the ground of the fatherly tone of affectionate address in it, implying his personal ministry among his readers. But his position, as probably the only surviving apostle, accords very well with his addressing, in a Catholic Epistle, a cycle of churches which he may not have specially ministered to in person, with affectionate fatherly counsel, by virtue of his general apostolic superintendence of all the churches.

TIME AND PLACE OF WRITING.—This Epistle seems to have been written subsequently to his Gospel, as it assumes the reader's acquaintance with the Gospel facts and Christ's speeches, and also with the special aspect of the incarnate Word, as God manifest in the flesh, set forth more fully in his Gospel. The tone of address, as a father addressing his "little children" (the continually-recurring term), accords with the view that this Epistle was written in John's old age, perhaps about 90 A. D. In ch. 2, 18, "It is the last time," probably does not refer to any particular event, as the destruction of Jerusalem, which was now many years past, but refers to the nearness of the Lord's coming as proved by the rise of Antichristian teachers, the mark of the last time. It was the Spirit's purpose to keep the Church always expecting Christ as ready to come at any moment. The whole Christian age is the last time in the sense that no other dispensation is to arise till Christ comes. Cf. "these last days," Hebrews 1, 2. Ephesus may be conjectured to be the place whence it was written. The controversial allusion to the germs of Gnostic heresy accord with Asia Minor being the place, and the last part of the apostolic age the time, of writing this Epistle.

CONTENTS.—The leading subject of the whole is, fellowship with the Father and the Son (ch. 1, 3). Two principal divisions may be noted, (1.) ch. 1, 5; 2, 28: the theme of this portion is stated at the outset, "God is light, and in Him is no darkness at all;" consequently, in order to have fellowship with Him, we must walk in light; connected with which is the confession and subsequent forgiveness of our sins through Christ's propitiation and advocacy, without which forgiveness there could be no light or fellowship with God: a farther step in thus walking in the light is, positively keeping God's commandments, the sum of which is love, as opposed to hatred, the acme of disobedience to God's word: negatively, he exhorts them according to their several stages of spiritual growth, children, fathers, young men, in consonance with their privileges as forgiven, knowing the Father, and having overcome the wicked one, not to love the world, which is incompatible with the indwelling of the love of the Father, and to be on their guard against the Antichristian teachers already in the world, who were not of the Church, but of the world, against whom the true defence is, that his believing readers who have the anointing of God, should continue to abide in the Son and in the Father. (2.) The second division (ch. 2, 29 to 5, 5) discusses the theme with which it opens, "He is righteous;" consequently (as in the first division), "every one that doeth righteousness is born of Him." Sonship in us involves our purifying ourselves as He is pure, even as we hope to see, and therefore to be made like our Lord when He shall appear; in this second, as in the first division, both a positive and a negative side are presented of "doing righteousness as He is righteous," involving a contrast between the children of God and the children of the devil. Hatred marks the latter; love, the former: this love gives assurance of acceptance with God for ourselves and our prayers, accompanied as they are (v. 23) with obedience to His great commandment, to "believe on Jesus, and love one another:" the seal (v. 24) of His dwelling in us and assuring our hearts, is the Spirit which He hath given us. In contrast to this (as in the first division), he warns against false spirits, the notes of which are, denial of Christ, and adherence to the world. Sonship, or birth of God is, then, more fully described: its essential feature is unslavish, free love to God, because God first loved us, and gave His Son to die for us, and consequent love to the brethren, grounded on their being sons of God also like ourselves, and so victory over the world: this victory being gained only by the man who believes in Jesus as the Son of God. (3.) The conclusion establishes this last central truth, on which rests our fellowship with God, Christ's having come by the water of baptism, the blood of atonement, and the witnessing Spirit, which is truth. As in the opening he rested this cardinal truth on the apostles' witness of the eye, the ear, and the touch, so now at the close he rests it on God's witness, which is accepted by the believer, in contrast with the unbeliever, who makes God a liar. Then follows his closing statement of his reason for writing (ch. 5, 13; cf. the corresponding ch. 1, 4, at the beginning), namely, that believers in Christ the Son of God may know that they have (now already) eternal life (the source of "joy," ch. 1, 4; cf. similarly his object in writing the Gospel, John 20, 31), and so have confidence as to their prayers being answered (corresponding to ch. 3, 22 in the second part); for instance, their intercessions for a sinning brother (unless his sin be a sin unto death). He closes with a brief summing up of the instruction of the Epistle, the high dignity, sanctity, and safety from evil of the children of God in contrast to the sinful world, and a warning against idolatry, literal and spiritual: "Keep yourselves from idols."

Though the Epistle is not directly polemical, the occasion which suggested his writing was probably the rise of Antichristian teachers; and, because he knew the spiritual character of the several classes whom he addresses, children, youths, fathers, he feels it necessary to write to confirm them in the faith and joyful fellowship of the Father and Son, and to assure them of the reality of the things they believe, that so they may have the full privileges of believing.

STYLE.—His peculiarity is fondness for aphorism and repetition. His tendency to repeat his own phrases arises partly from the affectionate, hortatory character of the Epistle; partly, also, from its Hebraistic form, abounding in parallel clauses, as distinguished from the Grecian and more logical style of Paul; also, from his child-like simplicity of spirit, which, full of his one grand theme, repeats, and dwells on it with fond delight and enthusiasm. Moreover, as ALFORD well says, the appearance of uniformity is often produced by want of deep enough exegesis to discover the real differences in passages which seem to express the same. Contemplative, rather than argumentative, he dwells more on the general, than on the particular, on the inner, than on the outer Christian life. Certain fundamental truths he recurs again and again to, at one time enlarging on, and applying them, at another time repeating them in their condensed simplicity. The thoughts do not march onward by successive steps, as in the logical style of Paul, but rather in circle drawn round one central thought which he reiterates, ever reverting to it, and viewing it, now under its positive, now under its negative aspect. Many terms which in the Gospel are given as Christ's, in the Epistle appear as the favourite expressions of John, naturally adopted from the Lord. Thus the contrasted terms, "flesh" and "spirit," "light" and "darkness," "life" and "death," "abide in Him;" "fellowship with the Father and Son, and with one another," is a favourite phrase also, not found in the Gospel, but in Acts and Paul's Epistles. In him appears the harmonious union of opposites, adapting him for his high functions in the kingdom of God, contemplative repose of character, and at the same time ardent zeal, combined with burning, all-absorbing love; less adapted for active outward work, such as Paul's, than for spiritual service. He handles Christian verities not as abstract dogmas, but as living realities, personally enjoyed in fellowship with God in Christ, and with the brethren. Simple, and at the same time profound, his writing is in consonance with his spirit, unrhctorical and undialectic, gentle, consolatory, and loving; the reflection of the Spirit of Him in whose breast he lay at the last supper, and whose beloved disciple he was. EWALD in ALFORD, speaking of the "unruffled and heavenly repose" which characterizes this Epistle, says, "It appears to be the tone, not so much of a father talking with his beloved children, as of a glorified saint addressing mankind from a higher world. Never in any writing has the doctrine of heavenly love—a love working in stillness, ever unwearied, never exhausted—so thoroughly approved itself as in this Epistle."

JOHN'S PLACE IN THE BUILDING UP OF THE CHURCH.—As Peter founded and Paul propagated, so John completed the spiritual building. As the Old Testament puts prominently forward the fear of God, so John, the last writer of the New Testament, gives prominence to the love of God. Yet, as the Old Testament is not all limited to presenting the fear of God, but sets forth also His love, so John, as a representative of the New Testament, whilst breathing so continually the spirit of love, gives also the plainest and most awful warnings against sin, in accordance with his original character as Boanerges, "son of thunder." His mother was Salome, mother of the sons of Zebedee, probably sister to Jesus' mother (cf. John 19. 25, "His mother's sister," with Matthew 27. 56; Mark 15. 40), so that he was cousin to our Lord; to his mother, under God, he may have owed his first serious impressions. Expecting as she did the Messianic kingdom in glory, as appears from her petition (Matthew 20. 20-23), she doubtless tried to fill his young and ardent mind with the same hope. NEANDER distinguishes three leading tendencies in the development of the Christian doctrine, the Pauline, the Jacobean (between which the Petrine forms an intermediate link), and the Johannan. John, in common with James, was less disposed to the intellectual and dialectic cast of thought which distinguishes Paul. He had not, like the apostle of the Gentiles, been brought to faith and peace through severe conflict; but, like James, had reached his Christian individuality through a quiet development: James, however, had passed through a moulding in Judaism previously, which, under the Spirit, caused him to present Christian truth in connection with the law, in so far as the latter in its spirit, though not letter, is permanent, and not abolished, but established under the Gospel. But John, from the first, had drawn his whole spiritual development from the personal view of Christ, the model man, and from intercourse with Him. Hence, in his writings, everything turns on one simple contrast: divine life in communion with Christ; death in separation from Him, as appears from his characteristic phrases, "life, light, truth; death, darkness, lie." As James and Peter mark the gradual transition from spiritualized Judaism to the independent development of Christianity, and as Paul represents the independent development of Christianity in opposition to the Jewish stand-point, so the contemplative element of John reconciles the two, and forms the closing point in the training of the apostolic Church. [NEANDER.]

CHAPTER I.

Ver. 1-10. THE WRITER'S AUTHORITY AS AN EYE-WITNESS OF THE GOSPEL FACTS, HAVING SEEN, HEARD, AND HANDLED HIM WHO WAS FROM THE BEGINNING: HIS OBJECT IN WRITING: HIS MESSAGE. IF WE WOULD HAVE FELLOWSHIP WITH HIM, WE MUST WALK IN LIGHT, AS HE IS LIGHT. 1. Instead of a formal, John adopts a virtual address (cf. v. 4). To wish joy to the reader was the ancient customary address. The sentence begun in v. 1 is broken off by the parenthetical v. 2, and is resumed at v. 3 with the repetition of some words from v. 1. That which was—not "began to be," but was essentially (Greek en, not egeneto) before He was manifested (v. 2); answering to "Him that is from the beginning" (ch. 2. 13); so John's Gospel, 1. 1, "In the beginning was the Word." Proverbs 8. 23, "I was set up from everlasting, from the beginning, or ever the earth was." we—apostles, heard . . . seen . . . looked upon . . . handled—A series rising in gradation. Seeing is a more convincing proof than hearing of; hand- ling, than even seeing. "Have heard . . . have seen" (perfects), as a possession still abiding with us; but in Greek (not as English Version "have," but simply) "looked upon" (not perfect, as of a continuing thing, but aorist, past time) whilst Christ the incarnate Word was still with us. "Seen," viz., His glory, as revealed in the Transfiguration and in His miracles; and His passion and death in a real body of flesh and blood. "Looked upon" as a wondrous spectacle steadfastly, deeply, contemplatively; so the Greek. Appropriate to John's contemplative character. hands . . . handled—Thomas and the other disciples on distinct occasions after the resurrection. John himself had leant on Jesus' breast at the last supper. Contrast the wisest of the heathen feeling after (the same Greek as here; groping after WITH THE HANDS) if haply they might find God. This proves against Socinians he is here speaking of the personal incarnate Word, not of Christ's teaching from the beginning of His official life. of—"concerning;" following "heard." "Heard" is the verb most applying to the purpose of the Epistle, viz., the truth which John had heard concerning the Word of life, i. e., (Christ) the Word who is the life. "Heard," viz., from Christ Himself, including all Christ's teachings about Himself. Therefore he puts "of," or "concerning," before "the word of life," which is inapplicable to any of the verbs except "heard;" also "heard" is the only one of the verbs which he resumes at v. 5. 2. the life—Jesus, "the Word of life." was manifested—who had previously been "with the Father." show—translate as in v. 3, "declare" (cf. v. 5). Declare is the general term; write is the particular (v. 4). that eternal life—Greek, "the life which is eternal." As the Epistle begins, so it ends with "eternal life," which we shall ever enjoy with, and in, Him who is "the life eternal," which—Greek, "the which," the before-mentioned (v. 1) life which was with the Father "from the beginning" (cf. John 1. 1). This proves the distinctness of the First and Second Persons in the one Godhead. 3. That which we have seen and heard—Resumed from v. 1, wherein the sentence, being interrupted by v. 2, parenthesis, was left incomplete. declare we unto you—Oldest MSS. add also; unto you also who have not seen or heard Him. that ye also may have fellowship with us—that ye also who have not seen, may have the fellowship with us which we who have seen enjoy; what that fellowship consists in he proceeds to state, "Our fellowship is with the Father and with His Son." Faith realizes what we have not seen as spiritually visible; not till by faith we too have seen, do we know all the excellency of the true Solomon. He Himself is ours; He in us and we in Him. We are "partakers of the Divine nature." We know God only by having fellowship with Him; He may thus be known, but not comprehended. The repetition of "with" before the "Son," distinguishes the persons, whilst the fellowship or communion with both Father and Son, implies their unity. It is not added, "and with the Holy Ghost;" for it is by the Holy Ghost or Spirit of the Father and Son in us, that we are enabled to have fellowship with the Father and Son (cf. ch. 3. 24). Believers enjoy the fellowship of, but not WITH, the Holy Ghost. "Through Christ God closes up the chasm that separated Him from the human race, and imparts Himself to them in the communion of the Divine life." [NEANDER.] 4. these things—and none other, viz., this whole Epistle. write we unto you—Some oldest MSS. omit "unto you," and emphasize "we." Thus the antithesis is between "we" (apostles and eye-witnesses) and "your." We write thus, that your joy may be full. Other oldest MSS. and versions read "OUR joy," viz., that our joy may be filled full by bringing you also into fellowship with the Father and Son. Cf. John 4. 36, end; Philippians 2. 2, "Fulfil ye my joy," 16; and 4. 1; 2 John 8. It is possible that "your" may be a correction of transcribers to make this verse harmonize with John 15. 11; 16. 24; however, as John often repeats favourite phrases, he may do so here, so "your" may be from himself. So 2 John 12, "your" in oldest MSS. The authority of MSS. and versions on both sides here is almost evenly balanced. Christ Himself is the source, object, and centre of His people's joy (cf. v. 3, end); it is in fellowship with Him that we have joy, the fruit of faith. 5. First division of the body of the Epistle (cf. Introduction). declare—Greek, "announce;" report in turn; a different Greek word from v. 3. As the Son announced the message heard from the Father as His apostle, so the Son's apostles announce what they have heard from the Son. John nowhere uses the term "Gospel;" but the witness or testimony, the word, the truth, and here the message. God is light—What light is in the natural world, that God, the source of even material light, is in the spiritual, the fountain of wisdom, purity, beauty, joy, and glory. As all material life and growth depends on light, so all spiritual life and growth depends on God. As God here, so Christ, in ch. 2. 8, is called "the true light." no darkness at all—Strong negation; Greek, "No, not even one speck of darkness;" no ignorance, error, untruthfulness, sin, or death. John heard this from Christ, not only in express words, but in His acted words, viz., His whole manifestation in the flesh as "the brightness of the Father's glory." Christ Himself was the embodiment of "the message," representing fully in all His sayings, doings, and sufferings, Him who is LIGHT. 6. say—profess. have fellowship with him—(v. 3.) The essence of the Christian life. walk—in inward and outward action, whithersoever we turn ourselves. [BENJEL.] in darkness—Greek, "in the darkness;" opposed to "the light" (cf. ch. 2. 8, 11). he—(Ch. 2. 4.) do not—in practice, whatever we say. the truth—(Ephesians 4. 21; John 3. 21.) 7. Cf. Ephesians 5. 8, 11-14. "WE WALK;" "God is essentially in His very nature as 'the light,' (v. 5) in the light." WALKING in the light, the element in which God himself is, constitutes the test of fellowship with Him. Christ, like us, walked in the light (ch. 2. 6). ALFORD notices, Walking in the light as he is in the light, is no mere imitation of God, but an identity in the essential element of our daily walk with the essential element of God's eternal being. we have fellowship one with another—and of course with God (to be understood from v. 6), without having fellowship with whom there can be no true and Christian fellowship one with another (cf. v. 3). and—as the result of "walking in the light, as He is in the light," the blood of Jesus . . . cleanseth us from all sin—daily contracted through the sinful weakness of the flesh, and the power of Satan and the world. He is speaking not of justification through His blood once for all, but of the present sanctification ("cleanseth" is present) which the believer, walking in the light and having fellowship with God and the saints, enjoys as His privilege. Cf. John 13. 10, Greek, "He that has been bathed, needeth not save to wash his feet, but is clean every whit." Cf. v. 9, "cleanse us from all unrighteousness," a further step besides "forgiving us our sins." Christ's blood is the cleansing mean, whereby gradually, being already justified and in fellowship with God, we become clean from all sin which would mar our fellowship with God. Faith applies the cleansing, purifying blood. Some oldest MSS. omit "Christ," others retain it. 8. The confession of sins is a necessary consequence of "walking in the light" (v. 7). "If thou shalt confess thyself a sinner, the truth is in thee; for the truth is itself light. Not yet has thy life become perfectly light, as sins are still in thee, but yet thou hast already begun to be illuminated, because there is in thee confession of sins." [AUGUSTINE.] that we have no sin—"HAVE," not "have had," must refer not to the past sinful life whilst unconverted, but to the present state wherein believers have sin even still. Observe, "sin" is in the singular; "(confess our) sins" (v. 9) in the plural. Sin refers to the corruption of the old man still present in us, and the stain created by the actual sins flowing from that old nature in us. To confess our need of cleansing from present sin is essential to "walking in the light;" so far is the presence of some sin incompatible with our in the main "walking in light." But the believer hates, confesses, and longs to be delivered from all sin, which is darkness. "They who defend their sins, will see in the great day whether their sins can defend them." deceive ourselves—We cannot deceive God; we only make ourselves to err from the right path. the truth—(Ch. 2. 4.) True faith. "The truth respecting God's holiness and our sinfulness, which is the very first spark of light in us, has no place in us." [ALFORD.] 9. confess—with the lips, speaking from a contrite heart; involving also confession to our fellow-men of offences committed against them. he—God. faithful—to His own promises; "true" to His word. just—Not merely the mercy, but the justice or righteousness of God is set forth in the redemption of the penitent believer in Christ. God's promises of mercy, to which He is faithful, are in accordance with His justice, to—Greek, "in order that." His forgiving us our sins and cleansing us from, &c., is in furtherance of the ends of His eternal faithfulness and justice. forgive—remitting the guilt. cleanse—purify from all filthiness, so that henceforth we more and more become free from the presence of sin through the Spirit of sanctification (cf. Hebrews 9. 14; and above, Note, v. 7). unrighteousness—offensive to Him who "is just" or righteous; called "sin," v. 7, because "sin is the transgression of the law," and the law is the expression of God's righteousness so that sin is unrighteousness. 10. Parallel to v. 8. we have not sinned—referring to the commission of actual sins, even after regeneration and conversion; whereas in v. 8, “we have no sin,” refers to the present GUILT remaining (until cleansed) from the actual sins committed, and to the SIN of our corrupt old nature still adhering to us. The perfect “have . . . sinned” brings down the commission of sins to the present time, not merely sins committed before, but since, conversion. we make him a liar—A gradation; v. 6, “we lie;” v. 8, “we deceive ourselves;” worst of all, “we make Him a liar,” by denying His word that all men are sinners (cf. ch. 5. 10). his word is not in us—“His word,” which is “the truth” (v. 8), accuses us truly; by denying it we drive it from our hearts (cf. John 5. 38). Our rejection of “His word” in respect to our being sinners, implies as the consequence our rejection of His word and will revealed in the law and Gospel as a whole; for these throughout rest on the fact that we have sinned, and have sin.

CHAPTER II.

VER. 1-29. THE ADVOCACY OF CHRIST IS OUR ANTIDOTE TO SIN WHILST WALKING IN THE LIGHT; FOR TO KNOW GOD, WE MUST KEEP HIS COMMANDMENTS AND LOVE THE BRETHREN, AND NOT LOVE THE WORLD, NOR GIVE HEED TO ANTICHRISTS, AGAINST WHOM OUR SAFETY IS THROUGH THE INWARD ANOINTING OF GOD TO ABIDE IN GOD: SO AT CHRIST'S COMING WE SHALL NOT BE ASHAMED. 1. (Ch. 5. 18.) My little children—The diminutive expresses the tender affection of an aged pastor and spiritual father. My own dear children, i. e., sons and daughters (Note, v. 12). these things—(Ch. 1. 6-10.) My purpose in writing what I have just written is, not that you should abuse them as giving a license to sin; but, on the contrary, “in order that ye may not sin at all” (the Greek aorist implying the absence not only of the habit, but of single acts of sin [ALFORD]). In order to “walk in the light” (ch. 1. 5, 7), the first step is confession of sin (ch. 1. 9), the next (ch. 2. 1) is that we should forsake all sin. The Divine purpose has for its aim, either to prevent the commission of, or to destroy sin. [BENGEL.] And—Connected with the former; Furthermore, “if any man sin,” let him, whilst loathing and condemning it, not fear to go at once to God, the Judge, confessing it, for “we have an Advocate with Him.” He is speaking of a BELIEVER'S occasional sins of infirmity through Satan's fraud and malice. The use of “we” immediately afterwards implies that we all are liable to this, though not necessarily constrained to sin. we have an advocate—Advocacy is God's family blessing; other blessings He grants to good and bad alike, but justification, sanctification, continued intercession, and peace, He grants to His children alone. advocate—Greek, “paraclete,” the same term as is applied to the Holy Ghost, as the “other Comforter;” showing the unity of the Second and Third Persons of the Trinity. Christ is the Intercessor for us above; and, in His absence, here below the Holy Ghost is the other Intercessor in us. Christ's advocacy is inseparable from the Holy Spirit's comfort and working in us, as the spirit of intercessory prayer. righteous—As our “advocate,” Christ is not a mere suppliant petitioner. He pleads for us on the ground of justice, or righteousness, as well as mercy. Though He can say nothing good of us, He can say much for us. It is His righteousness, or obedience to the law, and endurance of its full penalty for us, on which He grounds His claim for our acquittal. The sense therefore is, “in that He is righteous;” in contrast to our sin (“if any man sin”). The Father, by raising Him from the dead, and setting Him at His own right, has once for all accepted Christ's claim for us. Therefore the accuser's charges against God's children are vain. “The righteousness of Christ stands on our side; for God's righteousness is, in Jesus Christ, ours.” [LUTHER.] 2. And he—Greek, “And Himself.” He is our all-prevailing Advocate, because He is Himself “the propitiation;” abstract, as in 1 Corinthians 1. 30: He is to us all that is needed for propitiation “in behalf of our sins;” the propitiatory sacrifice, provided by the Father's love, removing the estrangement, and appeasing the righteous wrath, on God's part, against

the sinner. “There is no incongruity that a father should be offended with that son whom he loveth, and at that time offended with him when he loveth him.” [BISHOP PEARSON.] The only other place in the New Testament where Greek propitiation occurs, is ch. 4. 10; it answers in LXX. to Hebrew caphar, to effect an atonement or reconciliation with God; and in Ezekiel 44. 20, to the sin-offering. In Romans 3. 25, Greek, it is “propitiatory,” i. e., the mercy-seat, or lid of the ark whereon God, represented by the Shekinah glory above it, met His people, represented by the high priest who sprinkled the blood of the sacrifice on it. and—Greek “yet.” ours—believers: not Jews, in contrast to Gentiles; for he is not writing to Jews (ch. 5. 21). also for the sins of the whole world—Christ's advocacy is limited to believers (v. 1; ch. 1. 7): His propitiation extends as widely as sin extends. Note, 2 Peter 2. 1, “Denying the Lord that bought them,” “The whole world” cannot be restricted to the believing portion of the world (cf. ch. 4. 14; and “the whole world,” ch. 5. 19). “Thou, too, art part of the world, so that thine heart cannot deceive itself and think, The Lord died for Peter and Paul, but not for me.” [LUTHER.] 3. hereby—Greek, “in this,” “It is herein, and herein only, that we know (present) that we have knowledge of (perfect; once-for-all obtained and continuing knowledge of) Him” (v. 4, 13, 14). Tokens whereby to discern grace are frequently given in this Epistle. The Gnostics, by the Spirit's present forewarning, are refuted, who boasted of knowledge, but set aside obedience. “Know Him,” viz., as “the righteous” (v. 1, 29); our “Advocate and Intercessor.” keep—John's favourite word, instead of do, lit., to watch, guard, and keep safe as a precious thing; observing so as to keep. So Christ Himself. Not faultless conformity, but hearty acceptance of, and willing subjection to, God's whole revealed will, is meant. commandments—injunctions of faith, love, and obedience. John never uses “the law” to express the rule of Christian obedience: he uses it as to the Mosala law. 4. I know—Greek, “I have knowledge of (perfect) Him.” Cf. with this verse ch. 1. 8. 5. Not merely repeating the proposition, v. 3, or asserting the merely opposite alternative to v. 4, but expanding the “know Him” of v. 3, into “in Him, verily (not as a matter of vain boasting) is the love of (i. e., towards) God perfected,” and “we are in Him.” Love here answers to knowledge in v. 3. In proportion as we love God, in that same proportion we know Him, and vice versa, until our love and knowledge shall attain their full maturity of perfection. his word—His word is one (Note, ch. 1. 5), and comprises His “commandments,” which are many (v. 3). hereby—in our progressing towards this ideal of perfected love and obedience. There is a gradation: v. 3, “know Him;” v. 5, “we are in Him;” v. 6, “abideth in Him;” respectively, knowledge, fellowship, abiding constancy. [BENGEL.] 6. abideth—Implying a condition lasting, without intermission, and without end. He that saith . . . ought—so that his deeds may be consistent with his words. even as he—believers readily supply the name, their hearts being full of Him (cf. John 20. 15). “Even as He walked” when on earth, especially in respect to love. John delights in referring to Christ as the model man, with the words, “Even as He,” &c. “It is not Christ's walking on the sea, but His ordinary walk, that we are called on to imitate.” [LUTHER.] 7. Brethren—The oldest MSS. and versions read instead, “Beloved,” appropriate to the subject here, love. no new commandment—viz., love, the main principle of walking as Christ walked (v. 6), and that commandment, of which one exemplification is presently given, v. 9, 10, the love of brethren. ye had from the beginning—from the time that ye first heard the Gospel word preached. 8. a new commandment—it was “old,” in that Christians as such had heard it from the first; but “new” (Greek, katina, not nea: new and different from the old legal precept), in that it was first clearly promulgated with Christianity; though the inner spirit of the law was love even to enemies, yet it was enveloped in some bitter precepts which caused it to be temporarily almost unrecognized, till the Gospel came. Christianity first put love to brethren on the new and highest MOTIVE, instinctive love to Him who your first loved us, constraining us to love all, even enemies, thereby walking in the steps of Him who loved us when enemies. So Jesus calls it "new." John 13. 34, 35, "Love one another as I have loved you" (the new motive); 15. 12. which thing is true in him and in you—"In Christ all things are always true, and were so from the beginning; but in Christ and in us conjointly the commandment [the love of brethren] is then true when we acknowledge the truth which is in Him, and have the same flourishing in us." [BENGEL.] ALFORD explains, "Which thing (the fact that the commandment is a new one) is true in Him and in you, because the darkness is passing away, and the true light is now shining, i. e., the commandment is a new one, and this is true both in the case of Christ and in the case of you; because in you the darkness is passing away, and in Him the true light is shining; therefore, on both accounts, the command is a new one: new as regards you, because you are newly come from darkness into light; new as regards Him, because He uttered it when He came into the world to lighten every man, and began that shining which even now continues." I prefer, as BENGEL, to explain, The new commandment finds its truth in its practical realization in the walk of Christians in union with Christ. Cf. the use of "verily," v. 5. John 4. 42, "indeed;" 6. 55. The repetition of "in" before "you," "in Him and in you," not "in Him and you," implies that the love-commandment finds its realization separately: first it did so "in Him," and then it does so "in us," in so far as we now "also walk even as He walked;" and yet it finds its realization also conjointly, by the two being united in one sentence, even as it is by virtue of the love-commandment having been first fulfilled in Him, that it is also now fulfilled in us, through His Spirit in us: cf. a similar case, John 20. 17, "My Father and your Father;" by virtue of His being "My Father," He is also your Father. darkness is past—rather, as in ch. 2. 17, "Is passing away." It shall not be wholly "past" until "the Sun of righteousness" shall arise visibly: "the light is now shining" already, though but partially until the day bursts forth. 9-11. There is no mean between light and darkness, love and hatred, life and death, God and the world: wherever spiritual life is, however weak, there darkness and death no longer reign, and love supplants hatred; and Luke 9. 50 holds good: wherever life is not, there death, darkness, the flesh, the world, and hatred, however glossed over and hidden from man's observation, prevail; and Luke 11. 23 holds good. "Where love is not, there hatred is; for the heart cannot remain a void." [BENGEL.] In the light—as his proper element, his brother—his neighbour, and especially those of the Christian brotherhood. The very title brother is a reason why love should be exercised. even until now—notwithstanding that "the true light already has begun to shine" (v. 8). 10. Abiding in love is abiding in the light; for the Gospel light not only illumines the understanding, but warms the heart into love. none occasion of stumbling—In contrast to "He that hateth his brother is in darkness, and walketh in darkness, and knoweth not whither he goeth, because that darkness hath blinded his eyes." "In him who loves there is neither blindness nor occasion of stumbling [to himself]: in him who does not love, there is both blindness and occasion of stumbling. He who hates his brother, is both a stumbling-block to himself, and stumbles against himself and everything within and without; he who loves has an impeded path." [BENGEL.] John has in mind Jesus' words, John 11. 9, 10. ALFORD well says, "The light and the darkness are within ourselves; admitted into us by the eye, whose singleness fills the whole body with light." 11. is in darkness . . . walketh—"is" marks his continuing STATE: he has never come out of "the (so Greek) darkness:" "walketh" marks his OUTWARD WALK and acts. whither—Greek, "where;" including not only the destination to which, but the way whereby. hath blinded—rather as Greek aorist, "blinded" of old. Darkness not only surrounds, but blinds him, and that a blindness of long standing. 12. little children—Greek, "little sons," or "dear sons and daughters," not the same Greek as in v. 13, "little children," "infants" (in age and standing). He calls ALL to whom he writes, "little sons" (ch. 2. 1, Greek; 2. 28; 3. 18; 4. 4; 5. 21); but only in v. 13 and 18 he uses the term "little children," or "infants." Our Lord, whose Spirit John so deeply drank into, used to His disciples (John 13. 33) the term "little sons," or dear sons and daughters; but in John 21. 5, "little children." It is an undesigned coincidence with the Epistle here, that in John's Gospel somewhat similarly the classification, "lambs, sheep, sheep," occurs. are forgiven—"have been, and are forgiven you:" ALL God's sons and daughters alike enjoy this privilege. 13, 14. All three classes are first addressed in the present, "I write;" then in the past (aorist) tense, "I wrote" (not "I have written;" moreover, in the oldest MSS. and versions, in the end of v. 13, it is past, "I wrote," not as English Version, "I write"). Two classes, "fathers" and "young men," are addressed with the same words each time (except that the address to the young men has an addition expressing the source and means of their victory); but the "little sons" and "little children" are differently addressed. have known—and do know: so the Greek perfect means. The "I wrote" refers not to a former Epistle, but to this Epistle. It was an idiom to put the past tense, regarding the time from the reader's point of view; when he should receive the Epistle the writing would be past. When he uses "I write," he speaks from his own point of view. him that is from the beginning—Christ: "that which was from the beginning." overcome—The fathers, appropriately to their age, are characterized by knowledge. The young men, appropriately to theirs, by activity in conflict. The fathers, too, have conquered; but now their active service is past, and they and the children alike are characterized by knowing (the fathers know Christ, "Him that was from the beginning;" the children know the Father). The first thing that the little children realize is that God is their Father; answering in the parallel clause to "little sons . . . your sins are forgiven you for His name's sake," the universal first privilege of all those really-dear sons of God. Thus this latter clause includes all, whereas the former clause refers to those more especially who are in the first stage of spiritual life, "little children." Of course these can only know the Father as theirs through the Son (Matthew 11. 27). It is beautiful to see how the fathers are characterized as reverting back to the first great truths of spiritual childhood, and the sum and ripest fruit of advanced experience, the knowledge of Him that was from the beginning (twice repeated, v. 13, 14). Many of them had probably known Jesus in person, as well as by faith. young men . . . strong—made so out of natural weakness, hence enabled to overcome "the strong man armed" through Him that is "stronger." Faith is the victory that overcomes the world. This term "overcome" is peculiarly John's, adopted from his loved Lord. It occurs sixteen times in the Apocalypse, six times in the First Epistle, only thrice in the rest of the New Testament. In order to overcome the world on the ground, and in the strength, of the blood of the Saviour, we must be willing, like Christ, to part with whatever of the world belongs to us: whence immediately after "ye have overcome the wicked one (the prince of the world)," it is added, "Love not the world, neither the things . . . in the world." and, &c.—the secret of the young men's strength: the Gospel word, clothed with living power by the Spirit who abideth permanently in them; this is "the sword of the Spirit" welded in prayerful waiting on God. Contrast the mere physical strength of young men, Isaiah 40. 30, 31. Oral teaching prepared these youths for the profitable use of the word when written. "Antichrist cannot endanger you (v. 18), nor Satan tear from you the word of God." the wicked one—who, as "prince of this world," enthralled "the world" (v. 15-17; ch. 5. 19, Greek, "the wicked one"), especially the young. Christ came to destroy this "prince of the world." Believers achieve the first grand conquest over him when they pass from darkness to light, but afterwards they need to maintain a continual keeping of themselves from his assaults, looking to God by whom alone they are kept safe. BENGEL thinks John refers specially to the remarkable constancy exhibited by youths in Domitian's persecution. Also to the young man whom John, after his return from Patmos, led with gentle, loving persuasion to repentance. This youth had been commended by John, in one of his tours of superintendency, as a promising disciple to the overseers of the Church; he had been, therefore, carefully watched up to baptism. But afterwards relying too much on baptismal grace, he joined evil associates, and fell from step to step down, till he became a captain of robbers. When John, some years after, revisited that Church, and heard of the youth's sad fall, he hastened to the retreat of the robbers, suffered himself to be seized and taken into the captain's presence. The youth, stung by conscience and the remembrance of former years, fled away from the venerable apostle. Full of love the aged father ran after him, called on him to take courage, and announced to him forgiveness of his sins in the name of Christ. The youth was recovered to the paths of Christianity, and was the means of inducing many of his bad associates to repent and believe. [CLEMENS ALEXANDRINUS, Quis dives salvus? c. 4. 2; EUSEBIUS, Ecclesiastical History, Book 3. 20; CHRYSOSTOM, 1 Exhortation to Theodore, 11.] 15. Love not the world—that lieth in the wicked one (ch. 5. 19), whom ye young men have overcome. Having once for all, through faith, overcome the world (ch. 4. 4; 5. 4), carry forward the conquest by not loving it. "The world" here means "man, and man's world" [ALFORD], in his and its state as fallen from God. "God loved [with the love of compassion] the world," and we should feel the same kind of love for the fallen world; but we are not to love the world with congeniality and sympathy in its alienation from God, we cannot have this latter kind of love for the God-estranged world, and yet have also "the love of the Father in" us. neither—Greek, "nor yet." A man might deny in general that he loved the world, whilst keenly following some one of THE THINGS IN IT: its riches, honours, or pleasures; this clause prevents him escaping from conviction, any man—therefore the warning, though primarily addressed to the young, applies to all. love of—i. e., towards "the Father." The two, God and the (sinful) world, are so opposed, that both cannot be congenially loved at once. 16. all that is in the world—can be classed under one or other of the three; the world contains these and no more. lust of the flesh—i. e., the lust which has its seat and source in our lower animal nature. Satan tried this temptation the first on Christ: Luke 4. 3, "Command this stone that it be made bread." Youth is especially liable to fleshly lusts. lust of the eyes—the avenue through which outward things of the world, riches, pomp, and beauty, inflame us. Satan tried this temptation on Christ when he showed Him the kingdoms of the world in a moment. By the lust of the eyes David (2 Samuel 11. 2) and Achan fell (Joshua 7. 21). Cf. David's prayer, Psalm 119. 37; Job's resolve, Psalm 31. 1; Matthew 5. 23. The only good of worldly riches to the possessor is the beholding them with the eyes. Cf. Luke 14. 18, "I must go and SEE it." pride of life—lit., arrogant assumption: vainglorious display. Pride was Satan's sin whereby he fell, and forms the link between the two foes of man, the world (answering to the lust of the eyes) and the devil (as the lust of the flesh is the third foe). Satan tried this temptation on Christ in setting Him on the temple pinnacle that, in spiritual pride and presumption, on the ground of His Father's cure, He should cast Himself down. The same three foes appear in the three classes of soil on which the Divine seed falls: The wayside hearers, the devil; the thorns, the world; the rocky under-soil, the flesh. The world's awful antitrichinity, the "lust of the flesh, the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life," similarly is presented in Satan's temptation of Eve: "When she saw that the tree was good for food, pleasant to the eyes, and a tree to be desired to make one wise" (one manifestation of "the pride of life," the desire to know above what God has revealed, Colossians 2. 8, the pride of un sanctified knowledge). of—does not spring from "the Father" (used in relation to the preceding

"little children," v. 12, or "little sons"). He who is born of God alone turns to God; he who is of the world turns to the world; the sources of love to God and love to the world, are irreconcilably distinct. 17. the world—with all who are of the world worldly. passeth away—Greek, "is passing away" even now. the lust thereof—in its threefold manifestation (v. 16). he that doeth the will of God—not his own fleshy will, or the will of the world, but that of God (v. 3, 6), especially in respect to love. abideth for ever—"even as God also abideth for ever" (with whom the godly is one; cf. Psalm 55. 19, "God, even He that abideth of old"); a true comment, which CYPRIAN and LUCIFER have added to the text without support of Greek MSS. In contrast to the three passing lusts of the world, the doer of God's will has three abiding goods, "riches, honour, and life" (Proverbs 22. 4). 18. Little children—Same Greek as v. 13; children in age. After the fathers and young men were gone, "the last time" with its "many Antichrists" was about to come suddenly on the children. "In this last hour we all even still live." [BENGEL.] Each successive age has had in it some of the signs of "the last time" which precedes Christ's coming, in order to keep the Church in continual waiting for the Lord. The connection with v. 15-17 is, There are coming those seducers who are of the world (ch. 4. 5), and would tempt you to go out from us (v. 19) and deny Christ (v. 22). as ye have heard—from the apostles, preachers of the Gospel (e. g., 2 Thessalonians 2. 3-10; and in the region of Ephesus, Acts 20. 29, 30). shall come—Greek, "cometh," viz., out of his own place. Antichrist is interpreted in two ways: a false Christ (Matthew 24. 5, 24), lit., "instead of Christ;" or an adversary of Christ, lit., "against Christ." As John never uses pseudo-Christ, or "false Christ," for Antichrist, it is plain he means an adversary of Christ, claiming to himself what belongs to Christ, and wishing to substitute himself for Christ as the supreme object of worship. He denies the Son, not merely, like the pope, acts in the name of the Son. 2 Thessalonians 2. 4, "Who opposeth himself (Greek, ANTI-keimenos) [to] all that is called God," decides this. For God's great truth, "God is man," he would substitute his own lie, "man is God." [TRENCH.] are there—Greek, "there have begun to be;" there have arisen. These "many Antichrists" answer to "the spirit of lawlessness (Greek) doth already work." The Antichristian principle appeared then, as now, in evil men and evil teachings and writings; but still "THE Antichrist" means a hostile person, even as "THE Christ" is a personal Saviour. As "cometh" is used of Christ, so here of Antichrist, the embodiment in his own person of all the Antichristian features and spirit of those "many Antichrists" which have been, and are, his forerunners. John uses the singular of him. No other New Testament writer uses the term. He probably answers to "the little horn having the eyes of a man, and speaking great things" (Daniel 7. 8, 20); "the man of sin, son of perdition" (2 Thessalonians 2); "the beast ascending out of the bottomless pit" (Revelation 11. 7; 17. 8), or rather, "the false prophet," the same as "the second beast coming up out of the earth" (Revelation 13. 11-18; 16. 13). 19. out from us—from our Christian communion. Not necessarily a formal secession or going out: thus Rome has spiritually gone out, though formally still of the Christian Church. not of us—by spiritual fellowship (ch. 1. 3). "They are like bad humours in the body of Christ, the Church: when they are vomited out, then the body is relieved; the body of Christ is now still under treatment, and has not yet attained the perfect soundness which it shall have only at the resurrection." [AUGUSTINE, Ep. John, Tract 3. 4.] they would . . . have continued—implying the indefectibility of grace in the elect. "Where God's call is effectual, there will be sure perseverance." [CALVIN.] Still, it is no fatal necessity, but a "voluntary necessity" (DIDYMUS), which causes men to remain, or else go from the body of Christ. "We are either among the members, or else among the bad humours. It is of his own will that each is either an Antichrist, or in Christ." [AUGUSTINE.] Still God's actings in eternal election harmonize in a way inexplicable to us, with man's free agency and responsibility. It is men's own evil will that chooses the way to hell; it is God's free and sovereign grace that draws any to Himself and to heaven. To God the latter shall ascribe wholly their salvation from first to last; the former shall reproach themselves alone, and not God's decree, with their condemnation (ch. 3. 9; 5. 18). that they were not all of us—This translation would imply that some of the Antichrists are of us! Translate, therefore, "That all (who are for a time among us) are not of us." Cf. 1 Corinthians 11. 19, "There must be heresies among you, that they which are approved may be made manifest among you." For "were" some of the oldest MSS. read "are." Such occasions test who are, and who are not, the Lord's people. 20. But—Greek, "And." He here states the means which they as believers have wherewith to withstand Antichrists (v. 18), viz., the chrisim (so the Greek: a play upon similar sounds), or "anointing unguent," viz., the Holy Spirit (more plainly mentioned further on, as in John's style, ch. 3. 24; 4. 13; 5. 6), which they ("ye" is emphatical in contrast to those apostates, v. 19) have "from the Holy One, Christ (John 1. 33; 3. 34; 15. 26; 16. 14): "the righteous" (v. 1), "pure" (ch. 3. 3), "the Holy One" (Acts 3. 14) "of God;" Mark 1. 24. Those anointed of God in Christ alone can resist those anointed with the spirit of Satan, Antichrists, who would sever them from the Father and from the Son. Believers have the anointing Spirit from the Father also, as well as from the Son; even as the Son is anointed therewith by the Father. Hence the Spirit is the token that we are in the Father and in the Son; without it a man is none of Christ's. The material unguent of costliest ingredients, poured on the head of priests and kings, typified this spiritual unguent, derived from Christ, the Head, to us, His members. We can have no share in Him as Jesus, except we become truly Christians, and so be in Him as Christ, anointed with that unction from the Holy One. The Spirit poured on Christ the Head, is by Him diffused through all the members. "It appears that we all are the body of Christ, because we all are anointed: and we all in Him are both Christ's and Christ, because in some measure the whole Christ is Head and body." and—therefore, ye know all things—needful for acting aright against Antichrist's seductions, and for Christian life and godliness. In the same measure as one hath the Spirit, in that measure (no more or no less) he knows all these things. 21. because ye know it, and that, &c.—Ye not only know what is the truth (concerning the Son and the Father, v. 13), but also are able to detect a lie as a thing opposed to the truth. For right (a straight line) is the index of itself and of what is crooked. [ESTRIUS.] The Greek is susceptible of ALFORD'S translation, "Because ye know it, and because no lie is of the truth" (lit., "every lie is excluded from being of the truth"), I therefore wrote (in this Epistle) to point out what the lie is, and who the liars are. 22. a—Greek, "Who is the liar?" viz., guilty of the lie just mentioned (v. 21). that Jesus is the Christ—the grand central truth. this is Antichrist—Greek, "the Antichrist;" not however here personal, but in the abstract; the ideal of Antichrist is "he that denieth the Father and the Son." To deny the latter is virtually to deny the former. Again, the truth as to the Son must be held in its integrity; to deny that Jesus is the Christ, or that He is the Son of God, or that He came in the flesh, invalidates the whole (Matthew 11. 27). 23. Greek, "Every one who denieth the Son, hath not the Father either" (ch. 4. 2, 3): "inasmuch as God hath given Himself to us wholly to be enjoyed in Christ." [CALVIN.] he—that acknowledgeth the Son hath the Father also—These words ought not to be in italics, as though they were not in the original; for the oldest Greek MSS. have them. hath—viz., in his abiding possession as his "portion;" by living personal "fellowship." acknowledgeth—by open confession of Christ. 24. Let that—truth respecting the Father and the Son, regarded as a seed not merely dropped in, but having taken root (ch. 3. 9). ye—In the Greek standing emphatically at the beginning of the sentence. YE, therefore, acknowledge the Son, and so shall ye have the Father also (v. 23). from the be- ginning—from the time of your first hearing the Gospel. remain—translate as before, "abide." ye also—in your turn, as distinguished from "that which ye have heard," the seed abiding in you. Cf. v. 27, "the anointing abideth in you . . . ye shall abide in Him." Having taken into us the living seed of the truth concerning the Father and the Son, we become transformed into the likeness of Him whose seed we have taken into us. 25. this is the promise—Eternal life shall be the permanent consummation of thus abiding in the Son and in the Father (v. 24). he—Greek, "Himself," Christ, "the Son" (cf. ch. 1. 1). promised—(John 3. 15, 36; 6. 40, 47, 57; 17. 2, 3). 26. these things—(v. 18-25.) have I written—Resumed from v. 21 and 14. seduce you—i. e., are trying to seduce or lead you into error. 27. But—Greek, "And you (contrasting the believing readers with the seducers; the words and you stand prominent, the construction of the sentence following being altered, and no verb agreeing with 'and you,' until 'need not') . . . the anointing," &c. (resumed from v. 20). received of him—(John 1. 16.) So we "are unto God a sweet savour of Christ." abideth in you—he tacitly thus admonishes them to say, when tempted by seducers, "The anointing abideth in us; we do not need a teacher [for we have the Holy Spirit as our teacher, Jeremiah 31. 34; John 6. 45; 16. 13]; it teaches us the truth; in that teaching we will abide." [BENGEL.] and—and therefore. God is sufficient for them who are taught of Him; they are independent of all others, though, of course, not declining the Christian counsel of faithful ministers. "Mutual communication is not set aside, but approved of, in the case of those who are partakers of the anointing in one body." [BENGEL.] the same anointing—which ye once for all received, and which now still abides in you. of—"concerning." all things—essential to salvation; the point under discussion. Not that the believer is made infallible, for no believer here receives the Spirit in all its fulness, but only the measure needful for keeping him from soul-destroying error. So the Church, though having the Spirit in her, is not infallible (for many fallible members can never make an infallible whole), but is kept from ever wholly losing the saving truth. no lie—as Antichristian teaching. ye shall abide in him—(v. 24, end)—even as "the anointing abideth in you." The oldest MSS. read the imperative, "Abide in Him." 28. little children—Greek, "little sons," as in v. 12; believers of every stage and age. abide in him—Christ. John repeats his monition with a loving appellation, as a father addressing dear children. when—lit., "if;" the uncertainty is not as to the fact, but the time. appear—Greek, "be manifested." we—both writer and readers. ashamed before him—lit., "from Him;" shrink back from Him ashamed. Contrast "boldness in the day of judgment," ch. 4. 17; cf. ch. 3. 21; 5. 14. In the Apocalypse (written, therefore, BENGEL thinks, subsequently), Christ's coming is represented as put off to a greater distance. 29. The heading of the second division of the Epistle: "God is righteous; therefore, every one that doeth righteousness is born of Him." Love is the grand feature and principle of "righteousness" selected for discussion, ch. 2. 29 to 3. 3. If ye know . . . ye know—Distinct Greek verbs: "If ye are aware (are in possession of the knowledge) . . . ye discern or apprehend also that." &c. Ye are already aware that God ("He" includes both "the Father," of whom the believer is born [end of this verse, and ch. 3. 1], and "the Son," v. 1, 23) is righteous, ye must necessarily, thereby, perceive also the consequence of that truth, viz., "that every one that doeth righteousness (and he alone; lit., the righteousness such as the righteous God approves) is born of Him." The righteous produceth the righteous. We are never said to be born again of Christ, but of God, with whom Christ is one. HOLLAZ in ALFORD defines the righteousness of God, "It is the Divine energy by whose power God wills and does all things which are conformable to His eternal law, prescribes suitable laws to His creatures, fulfils His promises to men, rewards the good, and punishes the ungodly." doeth—"For the graces (virtues) are practical, and have their being in being produced (in being exercised); for when they have ceased to act, or are only about to act, they have not even being." [ÆCUMENIUS.] "God is righteous, and therefore the source of righteousness; when then a man doeth righteousness, we know that the source of his righteousness is God, that consequently he has acquired by new birth from God that righteousness which he had not by nature. We argue from his doing righteousness, to his being born of God. The error of Pelagians is to conclude that doing righteousness is a condition of becoming a child of God." [ALFORD most truly.] Cf. Luke 7. 47, 50; Her much love evinced that her sins were already forgiven; not, were the condition of her sins being forgiven.

CHAPTER III.

Ver. 1-24. DISTINGUISHING MARKS OF THE CHILDREN OF GOD AND THE CHILDREN OF THE DEVIL. BROTHERLY LOVE THE ESSENCE OF TRUE RIGHTEOUSNESS. 1. Behold—Calling attention, as to some wonderful exhibition, little as the world sees to admire. This verse is connected with the previous ch. 2. 29, thus: All our doing of righteousness is a mere sign that God, of His matchless love, has adopted us as children; it does not save us, but is a proof that we are saved of His grace. what manner of—of what surpassing excellence, how gracious on His part, how precious to us. love . . . bestowed—He does not say that God hath given us some gift, but love itself and the fountain of all honours, the heart itself, and that not for our works or efforts, but of His grace. [LUTHER.] that—"what manner of love;" resulting in, proved by, our being, &c. The immediate effect aimed at in the bestowal of this love is, "that we should be called children of God." should be called—should have received the privilege of such a glorious title (though seeming so imaginary to the world), along with the glorious reality. With God to call is to make really to be. Who so great as God? What nearer relationship than that of sons? The oldest MSS. add, "And we ARE so" really. therefore—"on this account," because "we are (really) so." us—the children, like the Father. it knew him not—viz., the Father. "If they who regard not God, hold thee in any account, feel alarmed about thy state." [BEN-GEL.] Contrast ch. 5. 1. The world's whole course is one great act of non-recognition of God. 2. Beloved—by the Father, and therefore by me. now—In contrast to "not yet." We now already are really sons, though unrecognized as such by the world, and (as the consequence) we look for the visible manifestation of our sonship, which not yet has taken place. doth not yet appear—Greek, "it hath not yet (at any time, Greek aorist) been visibly manifested what we shall be"—what further glory we shall attain by virtue of this our sonship. The "what" suggests a something inconceivably glorious. but—Omitted in the oldest MSS. Its insertion in English Version gives a wrong antithesis. It is not, "We do not yet know manifestly what, &c., but we know," &c. Believers have some degree of the manifestation already, though the world has not. The connection is, The manifestation to the world of what we shall be, has not yet taken place; we know (in general; as a matter of well-assured knowledge; so the Greek) that when (lit., "if;" expressing no doubt as to the fact, but only as to the time; also implying the coming preliminary fact, on which the consequence follows, Malachi 1. 6; John 14. 3) He (not "it," viz., that which is not yet manifested [ALFORD]) shall be manifested (v. 5; ch. 2. 28), we shall be like Him (Christ; all sons have a substantial resemblance to their father, and Christ, whom we shall be like, is "the express image of the Father's person," so that in resembling Christ, we shall resemble the Father). We wait for the manifestation (lit., the apocalypse; the same term as is applied to Christ's own manifestation of the sons of God. After our natural birth, the new birth into the life of grace is needed, which is to be followed by the new birth into the life of glory; the two latter alike are termed "the regeneration" (Matthew 19. 28). The resurrection of our bodies is a kind of coming out of the womb of the earth, and being born into another life. Our first temptation was that we should be like God in knowledge, and by that we fell; but being raised by Christ, we become truly like Him, by knowing Him as we are known, and by seeing Him as He is. [PEARSON, Creed.] As the first immortality which Adam lost was to be able not to die, so the last shall be not to be able to die. As man's first free choice or will was to be able not to sin, so our last shall be not to be able to sin. [AUGUSTINE, Civil. Dei, B. 22, c. 30.] The devil fell by aspiring to God's power; man, by aspiring to his knowledge; but aspiring after God's goodness, we shall ever grow in His likeness. The transition from God the Father to "He," "Him," referring to Christ (who alone is ever said in Scripture to be manifested; not the Father, John 1. 18), implies the entire unity of the Father and the Son. for, &c.—Continual beholding generates likeness (2 Corinthians 3. 18); as the face of the moon being always turned towards the sun, reflects its light and glory. see him—not in His innermost Godhead, but as manifested in Christ. None but the pure can see the infinitely Pure One. In all these passages the Greek is the same verb, opsomai; not denoting the action of seeing, but the state of him to whose eye or mind the object is presented; hence the Greek verb is always in the middle or reflexive voice, to perceive and inwardly appreciate. [TITTMANN.] Our spiritual bodies will appreciate and recognize spiritual beings hereafter, as our natural bodies now do natural objects. 3. this hope—of being hereafter "like Him." Faith and love, as well as hope, occur v. 11, 23. in—rather, "(resting) upon Him;" grounded on His promises. purifieth himself—by Christ's Spirit in him (John 15. 5, end). "Thou purifiest thyself, not of thyself, but of Him who comes that He may dwell in thee." [AUGUSTINE.] One's justification through faith is presupposed. as he is pure—unsullied with any uncleanness. The Second Person, by whom both the Law and Gospel were given. 4. Sin is incompatible with birth from God (v. 1-3). John often sets forth the same truth negatively, which he had before set forth positively. He had shown, birth from God involves self-purification; he now shows where sin, i. e., the want of self-purification, is, there is no birth from God. Whosoever—Greek, "Every one who," &c. committeth sin—In contrast to v. 3, "Every man that hath this hope in Him purifieth himself;" and v. 7, "He that doeth righteousness," transgresseth . . . the law—Greek, "committeth transgression of law." God's law of purity; and so shows he has no such hope of being hereafter pure as God is pure, and, therefore, that he is not born of God. for—Greek, "and," sin is . . . transgression of . . . law—definition of sin in general. The Greek having the article to both, implies that they are convertible terms. The Greek "sin" (hamartia) is lit., a missing of the mark, God's will being that mark to be ever aimed at. "By the law is the knowledge of sin." The crookedness of a line is shown by being brought into juxtaposition with a straight ruler. 5. Additional proof of the incompatibility of sin and sonship; the very object of Christ's manifestation in the flesh was to take away (by one act, and entirely, aorist) all sins, as the scapegoat did typically. and—another proof of the same. in him is no sin—not "was," but "is," as in v. 7, "He is righteous," and v. 3, "He is pure." Therefore we are to be so. 6. He reasons from Christ's own entire separation from sin, that those in him must also be separate from it. abideth in him—as the branch in the vine, by vital union living by His life. sinneeth not—in so far as he abides in Christ, so far as he is free from all sin. The ideal of the Christian. The life of sin and the life of God mutually exclude one another, just as darkness and light. In matter of fact, believers do fall into sins (ch. 1. 8-10; 2. 1, 2); but all such sins are alien from the life of God, and need Christ's cleansing blood, without application to which the life of God could not be maintained. He sinneth not so long as he abideth in Christ. whosoever sinneth hath not seen him—Greek perfect, "has not seen, and does not see Him." Again the ideal of Christian intuition and knowledge is presented (Matthew 7. 23). All sin as such is at variance with the notion of one regenerated. Not that "whosoever is betrayed into sins has never seen, nor known God;"

but in so far as sin exists, in that degree the spiritual intuition and knowledge of God do not exist in him. neither—"not even." To see spiritually is a further step than to know; for by knowing we come to seeing by vivid realization and experimentally. 7, 8. The same truth stated, with the addition that he who sins is, so far as he sins, "of the devil." let no man deceive you—as Antinomians try to mislead men. righteousness—Greek, "the righteousness," viz., of Christ or God. he that doeth . . . is righteous—not his doing makes him righteous, but his being righteous (justified by the righteousness of God in Christ, Romans 10, 3-10) makes him to do righteousness; an inversion common in familiar language, logical in reality, though not in form, as in Luke 7, 47; John 8, 47. Works do not justify, but the justified man works. We infer from his doing righteousness that he is already righteous (i. e., has the true and only principle of doing righteousness, viz., faith), and is therefore born of God (v. 9); just as we might say, The tree that bears good fruit is a good tree, and has a living root; not that the fruit makes the tree and its root to be good, but it shows that they are so. he—Christ. 8. He that committeth sin is of the devil—in contrast to "He that doeth righteousness," v. 7. He is a son of the devil (v. 10; John 8, 44). John does not, however, say, "born of the devil," as he does "born of God," for "the devil begets none, nor does he create any; but whoever imitates the devil, becomes a child of the devil by imitating him, not by proper birth." [AUGUSTINE, Tract., 4, 10.] From the devil there is not generation, but corruption. [BENGE.] sinneth from the beginning—from the time that any began to sin [ALFORD]; from the time that he became what he is, the devil. He seems to have kept his first estate only a very short time after his creation. [BENGE.] Since the fall of man [at the beginning of our world] the devil is (ever) sinning (this is the force of "sinneth;" he has sinned from the beginning, is the cause of all sins, and still goes on sinning; present). As the author of sin, and prince of this world, he has never ceased to seduce man to sin. [LUECKE.] destroy—break up and do away with; bruising and crushing the serpent's head. works of the devil—sin, and all its awful consequences. John argues, Christians cannot do that which Christ came to destroy. 9. Whosoever is born of God—lit., "Every one that is begotten of God." doth not commit sin—his higher nature, as one born or begotten of God, doth not sin. To be begotten of God and to sin, are states mutually excluding one another. In so far as one sins, he makes it doubtful whether he be born of God. his seed—the living word of God, made by the Holy Spirit the seed in us of a new life and the continual mean of sanctification. remaineth—abideth in him (Note, cf. v. 6; John 5, 38). This does not contradict ch. 1, 8, 9; the regenerate show the utter incompatibility of sin with regeneration, by cleansing away every sin into which they may be betrayed by the old nature, at once in the blood of Christ. cannot sin, because he is born of God—"because it is of God that he is born" (so the Greek order, as compared with the order of the same words in the beginning of the verse); not "because he was born of God" (the Greek is perfect, which is present in meaning, not aorist); it is not said, because a man was once for all born of God he never afterwards can sin; but, because he is born of God, the seed abiding now in Him, he cannot sin; so long as it energetically abides, sin can have no place. Cf. Genesis 39, 9, Joseph, "How CAN I do this great wickedness and sin against God?" The principle within me is at utter variance with it. The regenerate life is incompatible with sin, and gives the believer a hatred for sin in every shape, and an unceasing desire to resist it. "The child of God in this conflict receives indeed wounds daily, but never throws away his arms or makes peace with his deadly foe." [LUTHER.] The exceptional sins into which the regenerate are surprised, are owing to the new life-principle being for a time suffered to lie dormant, and to the sword of the Spirit not being drawn instantly. Sin is ever active, but no longer reigns. The normal direction of the believer's energies is against sin; the law of God after the inward man is the ruling principle of his true self, though the old nature, not yet fully deadened, rebels and sins. Contrast ch. 5, 18 with John 8, 34; cf. Psalm 18, 22, 23; 32, 2, 3; 119, 113, 176. The magnetic needle, the nature of which is always to point to the pole, is easily turned aside, but always reseeks the pole. children of the devil—(Note, v. 8; Acts 13, 10.) There is no middle class between the children of God and the children of the devil. doeth not righteousness—Contrast ch. 2, 29. he that loveth not his brother—(Ch. 4, 8)—a particular instance of that love which is the sum and fulfilment of all righteousness, and the token (not loud professions, and even seemingly good works) that distinguishes God's children from the devil's. 11. the message—"announcement," as of something good; not a mere command, as the law. The Gospel message of Him who loved us, announced by His servants, is, that we love the brethren; not here all mankind, but those who are our brethren in Christ, children of the same family of God, of whom we have been born anew. 12. who—not in the Greek. of that wicked one—translate, "evil one," to accord with "Because his own works were evil." Cf. v. 8, "of the devil," in contrast to "of God," v. 10. slaw . . . him; because his own works were evil, and his brother's righteous—through envy and hatred of his brother's piety, owing to which God accepted Abel's, but rejected Cain's offering. Enmity from the first existed between the seed of the woman and the seed of the serpent. 13. Marvel not—The marvel would be if the world loved you. the world—of whom Cain is the representative (v. 12). hate you—as Cain hated even his own brother, and that to the extent of murdering him. The world feels its bad works tacitly reproved by your good works. 14. We—Emphatical; hated though we be by the world, we know what the world knows not. know—as an assured fact. passed—changed our state. Colossians 1, 13, "from the power of darkness . . . translated into the kingdom of His dear Son." from death unto life—lit., "out of the death (which enthrals the unregenerate) into the life" (of the regenerate). A palpable coincidence of language and thought, the beloved disciple adopting his Lord's words. because we love the brethren—the ground, not of our passing over out of death into life, but of our knowing that we have so. Love, on our part, is the evidence of our justification and regeneration, not the cause of them. "Let each go to his own heart; if he find there love to the brethren, let him feel assured that he has passed from death unto life. Let him not mind that his glory is only hidden; when the Lord shall come, then shall he appear in glory. For he has vital energy, but it is still winter-time; the root has vigour, but the branches are as it were dry; within there is marrow which is vigorous, within are leaves, within fruits, but they must wait for summer." [AUGUSTINE.] He that loveth not—Most of the oldest MSS. omit "his brother," which makes the statement more general. abideth—still. in death—"in the (spiritual) death" (ending in eternal death) which is the state of all by nature. His want of love evidences that no saving change has passed over him. 15. hateth—equivalent to "loveth not" (v. 14); there is no medium between the two. "Love and hatred, like light and darkness, life and death, necessarily replace, as well as necessarily exclude, one another." [ALFORD.] is a murderer—because indulging in that passion, which, if followed out to its natural consequences, would make him one. "Whereas, v. 16 desires us to lay down our lives for the brethren; duels require one (awful to say!) to risk his own life, rather than not deprive another of life." [BENGE.] God regards the inward disposition as tantamount to the outward act which would flow from it. Whomsoever one hates, one wishes to be dead. hath—such a one still "abideth in death." It is not his future state, but his present, which is referred to. He who hates (i. e., loveth not) his brother (v. 14), cannot in this his present state have eternal life abiding in him. 16. What true love to the brethren is, illustrated by the love of Christ to us. hereby—Greek, "herein." the love of God—The words "of God" are not in the original. Translate, "We arrive at the knowledge of love;" we apprehend what true love is. he—Christ. and we—on our part, if absolutely needed for the glory of God, the good of the Church, or the salvation of a brother. lives—Christ alone laid down His one life for us all: we ought to lay down our lives severally for the lives of the brethren; if not actually, at least virtually, by giving our time, care, labours, prayers, substance: "Nou nobis, sed omnibus." Our life ought not to be dearer to us than God's own Son was to Him. The apostles and martyrs acted on this principle. 17. this world's goods—lit., "liveliness" or substance. If we ought to lay down our lives for the brethren (v. 16), how much more ought we not to withhold our substance? seeth—not merely casually, but deliberately contemplates as a spectator; Greek, "beholds." shuteth up his bowels of compassion—which had been momentarily opened by the spectacle of his brother's need. "The bowels" mean the heart, the seat of compassion. how—How is it possible that "the love of (i. e., to) God dwelleth (Greek, abideth) in him?" Our superfluities should yield to the necessities; our comforts, and even our necessities in some measure, should yield to the extreme wants of our brethren. "Faith gives Christ to me; love flowing from faith gives me to my neighbour." 18. When the venerable John could no longer walk to the meetings of the Church, but was borne thither by his disciples, he always uttered the same address to the Church; he reminded them of that one commandment which he had received from Christ Himself, as comprising all the rest, and forming the distinction of the new covenant, "My little children, love one another." When the brethren present, wearied of hearing the same thing so often, asked why he always repeated the same thing, he replied, "Because it is the commandment of the Lord, and if this one thing be attained it is enough." [JEROME.] 18. in word—Greek, "with word . . . with tongue, but in deed and truth." 19. hereby—Greek, "herein;" in our loving in deed and in truth (v. 18). we know—The oldest MSS. have "we shall know," viz., if we fulfil the command (v. 18). of the truth—that we are real disciples of, and belonging to, the truth, as it is in Jesus: begotten of God with the word of truth. Having herein the truth radically, we shall be sure not to love merely in word and tongue (v. 18). assure—lit., persuade, viz., so as to cease to condemn us; satisfy the questionings and doubts of our consciences as to whether we be accepted before God or not (cf. Matthew 23. 14; Acts 12. 20, "Having made Blasius their friend," lit., "persuaded"). The "heart," as the seat of the feelings, is our inward judge; the conscience, as the witness, acts either as our justifying advocate, or our condemning accuser, before God even now. John 8. 9, has "conscience," but the passage is omitted in most old MSS. John nowhere else uses the term conscience. Peter and Paul alone use it. before him—as in the sight of Him, the omniscient Searcher of hearts. Assurance is designed to be the ordinary experience and privilege of the believer. 20. LUTHER and BENJEL take this verse as consoling the believer whom his heart condemns; and who, therefore, like Peter, appeals from conscience to Him who is greater than conscience, "Lord, thou knowest all things: thou knowest that I love thee." Peter's conscience, though condemning him of his sin in denying the Lord, assured him of his love; but fearing the possibility, owing to his past fall, of deceiving himself, he appeals to the all-knowing God: so Paul, 1 Corinthians 4. 3, 4. So if we be believers, even if our heart condemn us of sin in general, yet having the one sign of sonship, love, we may still assure our hearts (some oldest MSS. read heart, v. 19, as well as v. 20), as knowing that God is greater than our heart, and knoweth all things. But thus the same Greek is translated "because" in the beginning, and "(we know) that" in the middle of the verse, and if the verse were consolatory, it probably would have been, "Because EVEN if our heart condemn us," &c. Therefore translate, "Because (rendering the reason why it has been stated in v. 19 to be so important to 'assure our hearts before Him') if our heart condemn (Greek, 'know [ought] against us') answering by contrast to 'we shall know that we are of the truth') us (it is) because God is greater than our heart and knoweth all things." If our heart judges us unfavourably, we may be sure that He, knowing more than our heart knows, judges us more unfavourably still. [ALFORD.] A similar ellipsis ("it is") occurs 1 Corinthians 14. 27; 2 Corinthians 1. 6; 8. 23. The condemning testimony of our conscience is not alone, but is the echo of the voice of Him who is greater and knoweth all things. Our hypocrisy in loving by word and tongue, not in deed and truth, does not escape even our conscience, though weak and knowing but little, how much less God who knows all things! Still the consolatory view may be the right one. For the Greek for "we shall assure our hearts" (see Note, v. 19), is gain over, persuade so as to be stilled, implying that there was a previous state of self-condemnation by the heart (v. 20), which, however, is got over by the consolatory thought, "God is greater than my heart" which condemns me, and "knows all things" (Greek ginosket, "knows," not kataginosket, "condemns"), and therefore knows my love and desire to serve Him, and knows my frame so as to pity my weakness of faith. This gaining over of the heart to peace is not so advanced a stage as the having CONFIDENCE towards God which flows from a heart condemning us not. The first "because" thus applies to the two alternate cases, v. 20, 21 (giving the ground of saying, that having love we shall gain over, or assure our minds before Him, v. 19); the second "because" applies to the first alternate alone, viz., if our heart condemn us. When he reaches the second alternate, v. 21, he states it independently of the former "because" which had connected it with v. 19. Inasmuch as CONFIDENCE toward God is a farther stage than persuading our hearts, though always preceded by it. 21. Beloved—There is no But contrasting the two cases, v. 20, 21, because "Beloved" sufficiently marks the transition to the case of the brethren walking in the full confidence of love (v. 18). The two results of our being able to "assure our hearts before Him" (v. 19), and of "our heart condemning us not" (of insincerity as to the truth in general, and as to LOVE in particular) are, (1.) confidence toward God; (2.) a sure answer to our prayers. John does not mean that all whose heart does not condemn them, are therefore safe before God; for some have their conscience seared, others are ignorant of the truth, and it is not only sincerity, but sincerity in the truth which can save men. Christians are those meant here: knowing Christ's precepts and testing themselves by them. 22. we receive—as a matter of fact, according to His promise. Believers, as such, ask only what is in accordance with God's will; or if they ask what God wills not, they bow their will to God's will, and so God grants them either their request, or something better than it. because we keep his commandments—Cf. Psalm 66. 18; 34. 15; 145. 18, 19. Not as though our merits earned a hearing for our prayers, but when we are believers in Christ, all our works of faith being the fruit of His Spirit in us, are "pleasing in God's sight;" and our prayers being the voice of the same Spirit of God in us, naturally and necessarily are answered by Him. 23. Summing up of God's commandments under the Gospel dispensation in one commandment. this is his commandment—singular: for faith and love are not separate commandments, but are indissolubly united. We cannot truly love one another without faith in Christ, nor can we truly believe in Him without love. believe—once for all; Greek aorist. on the name of his Son—on all that is revealed in the Gospel concerning Him, and on Himself in respect to His person, offices, and atoning work. as he—as Jesus gave us commandment. 24. dwelleth in him—The believer dwelleth in Christ, and he in him—Christ in the believer. Reciprocity. "Thus he returns to the great key-note of the Epistle, abide in Him, with which the former part concluded" (ch. 2. 23). hereby—"herein we (believers) know that He abideth in us, viz., from (the presence in us of) the Spirit which He hath given us." Thus he prepares, by the mention of the true Spirit, for the transition to the false "spirit," ch. 4. 1-6; after which he returns again to the subject of love.

CHAPTER IV.

Ver. 1-21. TESTS OF FALSE PROPHETS. LOVE, THE TEST OF BIRTH FROM GOD, AND THE NECESSARY FRUIT OF KNOWING HIS GREAT LOVE IN CHRIST TO US. 1. Beloved—The affectionate address wherewith he calls their attention, as to an important subject. every spirit—which presents itself in the person of a prophet. The Spirit of truth, and the spirit of error, speak by men's spirits as their organs. There is but one Spirit of truth, and one spirit of Antichrist. try—by the tests (v. 2, 3). All believers are to do so: not merely ecclesiastics. Even an angel's message should be tested by the word of God: much more men's teachings, however holy the teachers may seem. because, &c.—the reason why we must "try," or test the spirits. many false prophets—Not "prophets" in the sense "foretellers," but organs of the spirit that inspires them, teaching accordingly either truth or error: "many Antichrists." are gone out—as if from God. into the world—said alike of good and bad prophets (2 John 7). The world is easily seduced (v. 4, 5). 2. "Herein." know . . . the Spirit of God—whether he be, or not, in those teachers professing to be moved by Him. Every spirit—i. e., Every teacher claiming inspiration by THE HOLY SPIRIT. confesseth—the truth is taken for granted as established. Man is required to confess it, i. e., in his teaching to profess it openly. Jesus Christ is come in the flesh—a twofold truth confessed, that Jesus is the Christ, and that He is come (the Greek perfect implies not a mere past historical fact, as the aorist would, but also the present continuance of the fact and its blessed effects) in the flesh ("clothed with flesh;" not with a mere seeming humanity, as the Docetæ afterwards taught: He therefore was, previously, something far above flesh). His flesh implies His death for us, for only by assuming flesh could He die (for as God He could not), Hebrews 2, 9, 10, 14, 16; and His death implies His Love for us (John 15, 13). To deny the reality of His flesh is to deny His love, and so cast away the root which produces all true love on the believer's part (v. 9-11, 19). Rome, by the doctrine of the immaculate conception of the Virgin Mary, denies Christ's proper humanity. 3. confesseth not that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh—IRENEUS (3, 8), LUCIFER, ORIGEN, on Matthew 25, 14, and Vulgate read, "Every spirit which destroys (sets aside, or does away with) Jesus (Christ)." CYPRIAN and POLYCARP support English Version text. The oldest extant MSS., which are, however, centuries after POLYCARP, read, "Every spirit that confesseth not (i. e., refuses to confess) Jesus" (in His person, and all His offices and divinity), omitting "is come in the flesh." ye have heard—from your Christian teachers. already is it in the world—in the person of the false prophets (v. 1). 4. Ye—Emphatical: Ye who confess Jesus: in contrast to "them," the false teachers. overcome them—(ch. 5, 4, 5)—instead of being "overcome and brought into (spiritual) bondage" by them (2 Peter 2, 19). John 10, 8, 5, "The sheep did not hear them:" "A stranger will they not follow, but will flee from him: for they know not the voice of strangers." he that is in you—God, of whom ye are, he that is in the world—the spirit of Antichrist, the Devil, "the prince of this world." 5. of the world—they derive their spirit and teaching from the world, "unregenerate human nature, ruled over and possessed by Satan, the prince of this world." [ALFORD.] speak . . . of the world—they draw the matter of their conversation from the life, opinions and feelings of the world. the world heareth them—(John 15, 13, 19.) The world loves its own. 6. We—True teachers of Christ: in contrast to them. are of God—and therefore speak of God: in contrast to "speak they of the world," v. 5. knoweth God—as his Father, being a child "of God" (ch. 2, 13, 14). heareth us—Cf. John 18, 37, "Every one that is of the truth, heareth my voice." Hereby—(v. 2-6)—By their confessing, or not confessing, Jesus; by the kind of reception given them respectively by those who know God, and by those who are of the world and not of God. spirit of truth—the Spirit which comes from God and teaches truth. spirit of error—the spirit which comes from

Satan and seduces into error. 7. Resumption of the main theme (ch. 2, 29). Love, the sum of righteousness, is the test of our being born of God. Love flows from a sense of God's love to us: cf. v. 9 with ch. 3, 16, which v. 9 resumes; and v. 13 with ch. 3, 24, which similarly v. 13 resumes. At the same time, v. 7-21 is connected with the immediately preceding context, v. 2 setting forth Christ's incarnation, the great proof of God's love (v. 10). Beloved—an address appropriate to his subject, "love." love—all love is from God as its fountain: especially that embodiment of love, God manifest in the flesh. The Father also is love (v. 8). The Holy Ghost sheds love as its first fruit abroad in the heart. knoweth God—spiritually, experimentally, and habitually. 8. knoweth not—Greek aorist: not only knoweth not now, but never knew, has not once for all known God. God is love—There is no Greek article to love, but to God; therefore we cannot translate, Love is God. God is fundamentally and essentially LOVE: not merely is loving, for then John's argument would not stand; for the conclusion from the premises then would be this, This man is not loving: God is loving; therefore he knoweth not God IN SO FAR AS GOD IS LOVING; still he might know Him in His other attributes. But when we take love as God's essence, the argument is sound: This man doth not love, and therefore knows not love: God is essentially love, therefore he knows not God. 9. toward us—Greek, "in our case." sent—Greek, "hath sent." into the world—A proof against Socinians, that the Son existed before He was "sent into the world." Otherwise, too, He could not have been our life (v. 9), our "propitiation" (v. 10), or our "Saviour" (v. 14). It is the grand proof of God's love, His having sent His only-begotten Son, that we might live through Him, who is the Life, and who has redeemed our forfeited life; and it is also the grand motive to our mutual love. 10. Herein is love—love in the abstract; Love, in its highest ideal, is herein. The love was all on God's side, none on ours. not that we loved God—though so altogether worthy of love. he loved us—though so altogether unworthy of love. The Greek aorist expresses, Not that we did any act of love at any time to God, but that He did the act of love to us in sending Christ. 11. God's love to us is the grand motive for our love to one another (ch. 3, 16). If—as we all admit as a fact. we . . . also—as being born of God, and therefore resembling our Father who is love. In proportion as we appreciate God's love to us, we love Him and also the brethren, the children (by regeneration) of the same God, the representatives of the unseen God. 12. God, whom no man hath seen at any time, hath appointed His children as the visible recipients of our outward kindness which flows from love to Himself, "whom not having seen, we love," cf. note, v. 11, 19, 20. Thus v. 12 explains why, instead (in v. 11) of saying, "If God so loved us, we ought also to love God," he said, "We ought also to love one another." If we love one another, God dwelleth in us—for God is love; and it must have been from Him dwelling in us that we drew the real love we bear to the brethren (v. 8, 16). John discusses this, v. 13-16. his love—rather, "the love of (i. e., to) Him" (ch. 2, 5), evinced by our love to His representatives, our brethren. is perfected in us—John discusses this, v. 17-19. Cf. ch. 2, 5, "Is perfected," i. e., attains its proper maturity. 13. "Herein." The token vouchsafed to us of God's dwelling (Greek, "abide") in us, though we see Him not, is this, that He hath given us "of His Spirit" (ch. 3, 24). Where the Spirit of God is, there God is. ONE SPIRIT dwells in the Church: each believer receives a measure "of" that Spirit in the proportion God thinks fit. Love is His first fruit (Galatians 5, 22). In Jesus alone the Spirit dwelt without measure (John 3, 34). 14. And we—Primarily, we apostles, Christ's appointed eye-witnesses to testify to the facts concerning Him. The internal evidence of the indwelling Spirit (v. 13) is corroborated by the external evidence of the eye-witnesses to the fact of the Father having "sent His Son to be the Saviour of the world." seen—Greek, "contemplated;" "attentively beheld" (Note, ch. 1, 1). sent—Greek, "hath sent;" not an entirely past fact (aorist), but one of which the effects continue (perfect). 15. shall confess—once for all:

so the Greek aorist means. that Jesus is the Son of God—and therefore “the Saviour of the world” (v. 14). 16. And we—John and his readers (not as v. 14, the apostles only). known and believed—True faith, according to John, is a faith of knowledge and experience: true knowledge is a knowledge of faith. [LUECKE.] to us—Greek, “in our case” (Note, v. 9). dwelleth—Greek, “abideth.” Cf. with this verse, v. 7. 17, 18. (Cf. ch. 3. 19-21.) our love—rather as the Greek, “LOVE (in the abstract, the principle of love [ALFORD]) is made perfect (in its relations) with us.” Love dwelling in us advances to its consummation “with us,” i. e., as it is concerned with us: so Greek. Luke 1. 58, “Showed mercy upon (lit., with) her;” 2 John 2, “the truth shall be with us for ever.” boldness—“confidence:” the same Greek as ch. 3. 21, to which this passage is parallel. The opposite to “fear,” v. 18. Herein is our love perfected, viz., in God dwelling in us, and our dwelling in God (v. 16), involving as its result “that we can have confidence (or boldness) in the day of judgment” (so terrible to all other men, Acts 24. 25; Romans 2. 16). because, &c.—The ground of our “confidence” is, “because even as He (Christ) is, we also are in this world” (and He will not, in that day, condemn those who are like Himself), i. e., we are righteous as He is righteous, especially in respect to that which is the sum of righteousness, love (ch. 3. 14). Christ is righteous, and love itself, in heaven: so are we, His members, who are still “in this world.” Our oneness with Him even now in His exalted position above (Ephesians 2. 6), so that all that belongs to Him of righteousness, &c., belongs to us also by perfect imputation and progressive impartation, is the ground of our love being perfected so that we can have confidence in the day of judgment. We are in, not of, this world. 18. Fear has no place in love. Bold confidence (v. 17), based on love, cannot coexist with fear. Love, which, when perfected, gives bold confidence, casts out fear (cf. Hebrews 2. 14, 15). The design of Christ’s propitiatory death was to deliver from this bondage of fear. but—“nay.” [ALFORD.] fear hath torment—Greek, punishment. Fear is always revolving in the mind the punishment deserved. [ESRIUS.] Fear, by anticipating punishment [through consciousness of deserving it], has it even now, i. e., the foretaste of it. Perfect love is incompatible with such a self-punishing fear. Godly fear of offending God is quite distinct from slavish fear of consciously-deserved punishment. The latter fear is natural to us all until love casts it out. “Men’s states vary: one is without fear and love; another, with fear without love; another, with fear and love; another, without fear with love.” [BENGEL.] 19. him—Omitted in the oldest MSS. Translate, “We (emphatical: WE on our part) love (in general: love alike Him, and the brethren, and our fellow-men), because He (emphatical: answering to “we;” because it was He who) first loved us in sending His Son (Greek aorist of a definite act at a point of time). He was the first to love us: this thought ought to create in us love casting out fear (v. 18). 20. loveth not . . . brother whom he hath seen, how can he love God whom he hath not seen—It is easier for us, influenced as we are here by sense, to direct love towards one within the range of our senses than towards One unseen, appreciable only by faith. “Nature is prior to grace; and we by nature love things seen, before we love things unseen.” [ESRIUS.] The eyes are our leaders in love. “Seeing is an incentive to love.” [ECUMENIUS.] If we do not love the brethren, the visible representatives of God, how can we love God, the invisible One, whose children they are? The true ideal of man, lost in Adam, is realized in Christ, in whom God is revealed as He is, and man as he ought to be. Thus, by faith in Christ, we learn to love both the true God, and the true man, and so to love the brethren as bearing His image. hath seen—and continually sees. 21. Besides the argument (v. 20) from the common feeling of men, he here adds a stronger one from God’s express commandment (Matthew 22. 39). He who loves, will do what the object of his love wishes. he who loveth God—he who wishes to be regarded by God as loving Him.

CHAPTER V.

Ver. 1-21. WHO ARE THE BRETHREN ESPECIALLY TO BE LOVED (ch. 4. 21); OBEDIENCE, THE TEST OF LOVE, EASY THROUGH FAITH, WHICH OVERCOMES THE WORLD. LAST PORTION OF THE EPISTLE. THE SPIRIT’S WITNESS TO THE BELIEVER’S SPIRITUAL LIFE. TRUTHS REPEATED AT THE CLOSE: FAREWELL WARNING. 1. Reason why our “brother” (ch. 4. 21) is entitled to such love, viz., because he is “born (begotten) of God:” so that if we want to show our love to God, we must show it to God’s visible representative. Whosoever—Greek, “Every one that.” He could not be our “Jesus” (God-Saviour) unless He were “the Christ;” for He could not reveal the way of salvation, except He were a prophet: He could not work out that salvation, except He were a priest: He could not confer that salvation upon us, except He were a king: He could not be prophet, priest, and king, except He were the Christ. [PEARSON on the Creed.] born—translate, “begotten,” as in the latter part of the verse, the Greek being the same. Christ is the “only-begotten Son” by generation; we become begotten sons of God by regeneration and adoption. every one that loveth him that begat—sincerely, not in mere profession (ch. 4. 20). loveth him also that is begotten of him—viz., “his brethren” (ch. 4. 21). 2. By—Greek, “In this.” As our love to the brethren is the sign and test of our love to God, so (John here says) our love to God (tested by our “keeping his commandments”) is, conversely, the ground and only true basis of love to our brother. we know—John means here, not the outward criteria of genuine brotherly love, but the inward spiritual criteria of it, consciousness of love to God manifested in a hearty keeping of His commandments. When we have this inwardly and outwardly confirmed love to God, we can know assuredly that we truly love the children of God. “Love to one’s brother is prior, according to the order of nature (Note, ch. 4. 20); love to God is so, according to the order of grace (ch. 5. 2). At one time the former is more immediately known, at another time the latter, according as the mind is more engaged in human relations or in what concerns the Divine honour.” [ESRIUS.] John shows what true love is, viz., that which is referred to God as its first object. As previously John urged the effect, so now he urges the cause. For he wishes mutual love to be so cultivated among us, as that God should always be placed first. [CALVIN.] 3. this is—the love of God consists in this. not grievous—as so many think them. It is “the way of the transgressor” that “is hard.” What makes them to the regenerate “not grievous,” is faith which “overcometh the world” (v. 4): in proportion as faith is strong, the grievousness of God’s commandments to the rebellious flesh is overcome. The reason why believers feel any degree of irksomeness in God’s commandments is, they do not realize fully by faith the privileges of their spiritual life. 4. For—(Note, v. 3.) The reason why “His commandments are not grievous.” Though there is a conflict in keeping them, the issue for the whole body of the regenerate is victory over every opposing influence; meanwhile there is a present joy to each believer in keeping them which makes them “not grievous.” whatsoever—Greek, “all that is begotten of God.” The neuter expresses the universal whole, or aggregate of the regenerate, regarded as one collective body John 3. 6; 6. 37, 39, ‘where BENGEL remarks, that in Jesus’ discourses, what the Father has given Him is called, in the singular number and neuter gender, all whatsoever; those who come to the Son are described in the masculine gender and plural number, they all, or singular, every one. The Father has given, as it were, the whole mass to the Son, that all whom He gave may be one whole: that universal whole the Son singly evolves, in the execution of the Divine plan,’ overcometh—habitually. the world—all that is opposed to keeping the commandments of God, or draws us off from God, in this world, including our corrupt flesh, on which the world’s blandishments or threats act, as also including Satan, the prince of this world. this is the victory that overcometh

—Greek aorist: "... that hath (already) overcome the world:" the victory (where faith is) hereby is implied as having been already obtained (ch. 2.13; 4.4). 5. Who—"Who" else "but he that believeth that Jesus is the Son of God"—"the Christ" (v. 1)? Confirming, by a triumphant question defying all contradiction, as an undeniable fact, v. 4, that the victory which overcomes the world is faith. For it is by believing that we are made one with Jesus the Son of God, so that we partake of His victory over the world, and have dwelling in us One greater than he who is in the world (ch. 4.4). "Survey the whole world, and show me even one of whom it can be affirmed with truth that he overcomes the world, who is not a Christian, and endowed with this faith." [EPISCOPUS in ALFORD.] 6. This—The Person mentioned in v. 5. This Jesus, he that came by water and blood—"by water," when His ministry was inaugurated by baptism in the Jordan, and He received the Father's testimony to His Messiahship and Divine Sonship. Cf. v. 5, "Believeth that Jesus is the Son of God," with John 1.33, 34, "The Spirit remaining on Him... I saw and bare record that this is the Son of God;" and v. 8, below, "There are three that bear witness in earth, the Spirit, and the water, and the blood." Corresponding to this is the baptism of water and the Spirit which He has instituted as a standing seal and mean of initiatory incorporation with Him, and blood—He came by "the blood of His cross" (so "by" is used, Hebrews 9.12: "By," i. e., with, "His own blood He entered in once into the holy place"); a fact seen and so solemnly witnessed to by John. "These two past facts in the Lord's life are this abiding testimony to us, by virtue of the permanent application to us of their cleansing and atoning power." Jesus Christ—Not a mere appellation, but a solemn assertion of the Lord's Person and Messiahship, not by—Greek, "not IN the water only, but IN the water and IN (so oldest MSS, add) the blood." As "by" implies the mean through, or with, which He came: so "in," the element in which He came. "The" implies that the water and the blood were sacred and well-known symbols. John Baptist came only baptizing with water, and therefore was not the Messiah. Jesus came first to undergo Himself the double baptism of water and blood, and then to baptize us with the Spirit-cleansing, of which water is the sacramental seal, and with His atoning blood, the efficacy of which, once-for-all shed, is perpetual in the Church; and therefore is the Messiah. It was His shed blood which first gave water-baptism its spiritual significance. We are baptized into His death: the grand point of union between us and Him, and, through Him, between us and God. It is the Spirit, &c.—the Holy Spirit is an additional witness (cf. v. 7), besides the water and the blood, to Jesus' Sonship and Messiahship. The Spirit attested these truths at Jesus' baptism by descending on Him, and throughout His ministry by enabling Him to speak and do what man never before or since has spoken or done; and "it is the Spirit that beareth witness" of Christ, now permanently in the Church: both in the inspired New Testament Scriptures, and in the hearts of believers, and in the spiritual reception of baptism and the Lord's Supper, because the Spirit is truth—It is His essential truth which gives His witness such infallible authority. 7. three—two or three witnesses were required by law to constitute adequate testimony. The only Greek MSS, in any form which support the words, "in heaven, the Father, the Word, and the Holy Ghost, and these three are one; and there are three that bear witness in earth," are the Montfortianus of Dublin, copied evidently from the modern Latin Vulgate; the Ravianus, copied from the Complutensian Polyglot; a MS. at Naples, with the words added in the margin by a recent hand; Ottobonianus, 298, of the fifteenth century, the Greek of which is a mere translation of the accompanying Latin. All the old versions omit the words. The oldest MSS. of the Vulgate omit them: the earliest Vulgate MS. which has them being Wizanburgensis, 99, of the eighth century. A scholium quoted in Mathæi, shows that the words did not arise from fraud; for in the words in all Greek MSS., "there are three that bear record," as the Schollast notices, the word "three" is masculine, because the three things (the Spirit, the water, and the blood) are SYMBOLS OF THE TRINITY. To this Cyprian, 196, also refers, "Of the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, it is written, 'And these three are one' (a unity)." There must be some mystical truth implied in using "three" (Greek) in the masculine, though the antecedents, "Spirit, water, and blood," are neuter. That the TRINITY was the truth meant is a natural inference: the triad specified pointing to a still Higher Trinity; as is plain also from v. 9, "the witness of God," referring to the Trinity alluded to in the Spirit, water and blood. It was therefore first written as a marginal comment to complete the sense of the text, and then, as early at least as the eighth century, was introduced into the text of the Latin Vulgate. The testimony, however, could only be borne on earth to men, not in heaven. The marginal comment, therefore, that inserted "in heaven," was inappropriate. It is on earth that the context evidently requires the witness of the three, the Spirit, the water, and the blood, to be borne: mystically setting forth the Divine triune witnesses, the Father, the Spirit, and the Son. LUECKE notices as internal evidence against the words, John never uses "the Father" and "the Word" as correlates, but, like other New Testament writers, associates "the Son" with "the Father," and always refers "the Word" to "God" as its correlate, not "the Father." VIGLIUS, at the end of the fifth century, is the first who quotes the disputed words as in the text; but no Greek MS. earlier than the fifteenth is extant with them. The term "Trinity" occurs first in the third century in TERTULLIAN, adversus Praxean, 3. 8. agree in one—"tend unto one result;" their agreeing testimony to Jesus' Sonship and Messiahship they give by the sacramental grace in the water of baptism, received by the penitent believer, by the atoning efficacy of His blood, and by the internal witness of His Spirit (v. 10): answering to the testimony given to Jesus' Sonship and Messiahship by His baptism, His crucifixion, and the Spirit's manifestations in Him (Note, v. 6). It was by His coming by water (i. e., His baptism in Jordan) that Jesus was solemnly inaugurated in office, and revealed Himself as Messiah; this must have been peculiarly important in John's estimation, who was first led to Christ by the testimony of the Baptist. By the baptism then received by Christ, and by His redeeming blood-shedding, and by that which the Spirit of God, whose witness is infallible, has effected, and still effects, by Him, the Spirit, the water, and the blood, unite, as the threefold witness, to verify His Divine Messiahship. [NEANDER.] 9. If, &c.—We do accept (and rightly so) the witness of veracious men, fallible though they be, much more ought we to accept the infallible witness of God (the Father). "The testimony of the Father is, as it were, the basis of the testimony of the Word and of the Holy Spirit; just as the testimony of the Spirit is, as it were, the basis of the testimony of the water and the blood." [BENGEL.] for—This principle applies in the present case, FOR, &c. which—In the oldest MSS., "Because He hath given testimony concerning His Son." What that testimony is we find above in v. 1. 5, "Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God;" and below in v. 10. 11. hath the witness—of God, by His Spirit (v. 8). in himself—God's Spirit dwelling in him and witnessing that "Jesus is the Lord," "the Christ," and "the Son of God" (v. 1. 5). The witness of the Spirit in the believer himself to his own sonship is not here expressed, but follows as a consequence of believing the witness of God to Jesus' Divine Sonship, believeth not God—credits not His witness, made him a liar—a consequence which many who virtually, or even avowedly, do not believe, may well startle back from as fearful blasphemy and presumption (ch. 1. 10). believeth not the record—Greek, "believeth not IN the record, or witness." Refusal to credit God's testimony ("believeth not God") is involved in refusal to believe IN (to rest one's trust in) Jesus Christ, the object of God's record or testimony. "Divine faith is an assent unto something as credible upon the testimony of God. This is the highest kind of faith; because the object hath the highest credibility, because grounded upon the testimony of God, which is infallible." [PEARSON on Creed.] "The authority on which we believe is Divine; the doctrine which we follow is Divine." [LEO.—Greek, "hath testified, and now testifies." of—concerning. 11. hath given—Greek aorist: "Gave" once for all. Not only "promised" it. life is in his Son—essentially (John 1. 4; 11. 25; 14. 6); bodily (Colossians 2. 9); operatively (2 Timothy 1. 10). [LANGE in ALFORD.] It is in the second Adam, the Son of God, that this life is secured to us, which, if left to depend on us, we should lose, like the first Adam. 12. the Son . . . life—Greek, "THE life." BENGEL remarks. The verse has two clauses: in the former the Son is mentioned without the addition "of God," for believers know the Son: in the second clause the addition "of God" is made, that unbelievers may know thereby what a serious thing it is not to have Him. In the former clause "has" bears the emphasis; in the second, life. To have the Son is to be able to say as the bride, "I am my Beloved's, and my Beloved is mine." Faith is the mean whereby the regenerate HAVE Christ as a present possession, and in having Him have life in its germ and-reality now, and shall have life in its fully-developed manifestation hereafter. Eternal life here is (1.) initial, and is an earnest of that which is to follow; in the intermediate state (2.) partial, belonging but to a part of a man, though that is his nobler part, the soul separated from the body; at and after the resurrection (3.) perfectional. This life is not only natural, consisting of the union of the soul and the body (as that of the reprobate in eternal pain, which ought to be termed death eternal, not life), but also spiritual, the union of the soul to God, and supremely blessed for ever (for life is another term for happiness). [PEARSON on Creed.] 13. These things—This Epistle. He, towards the close of his Gospel (John 20. 30, 31), wrote similarly, stating his purpose in having written. In ch. 1. 4 he states the object of his writing this Epistle to be, "that your joy may be full." To "know that we have eternal life" is the sure way to "joy in God." 13. The oldest MSS. and versions read, "These things have I written unto you [omitting that believe on the name of the Son of God] that ye may know that ye have eternal life (cf. v. 11), THOSE (of you I mean) who believe (not as English Version reads, and that ye may believe) on the name of the Son of God." English Version, in the latter clause, will mean, "that ye may continue to believe," &c. (cf. v. 12). 14. the confidence—"boldness" (ch. 4. 17) in prayer, which results from knowing that we have eternal life (v. 13; ch. 3. 19-22). according to his will—which is the believer's will, and which is therefore no restraint to his prayers. In so far as God's will is not our will, we are not abiding in faith, and our prayers are not accepted. ALFORD well says, If we knew God's will thoroughly, and submitted to it heartily, it would be impossible for us to ask anything for the spirit or for the body which He should not perform; it is this ideal state which the apostle has in view. It is the Spirit who teaches us inwardly, and Himself in us asks according to the will of God. 15. hear—Greek, "that He heareth us." we have the petitions that we desired of him—we have, as present possessions, everything whatsoever we desired (asked) from Him. Not one of our past prayers offered in faith, according to His will, is lost. Like Hannah, we can rejoice over them as granted even before the event; and can recognize the event when it comes to pass, as not from chance, but obtained by our past prayers. Cf. also Jehoshaphat's believing confidence in the issue of his prayers, so much so that he appointed singers to praise the Lord beforehand. 16. If any . . . see—on any particular occasion; Greek aorist, his brother—a fellow-Christian. sinning—in the act of sinning, and continuing in the sin: present. not unto death—provided that it is not unto death. he shall give—The asker shall be the means, by his intercessory prayer, of God giving life to the sinning brother. Kindly reproof ought to accompany his intercessions. Life was in process of being forfeited by the sinning brother, when the believer's intercession obtained its restoration. for them—Resuming the proviso put forth in the beginning of the verse, "Provided that the sin is not unto death." "Shall give life," I say, to, i. e., obtain life "for" (in the case of) them that sin not unto death." I do not say that he shall pray for it—The Greek for "pray" means a REQUEST as of one on an equality, or at least on terms of familiarity, with him from whom the favour is sought. "The Christian intercessor for his brethren, St. John declares, shall not assume the authority which would be implied in making request for a sinner who has sinned the sin unto death (1 Samuel 15. 35; 16. 1; Mark 3. 29), that it might be forgiven him." [TRENCH, Synonyms of New Testament.] Cf. Deuteronomy 3. 26. Greek "ask" implies the humble petition of an inferior; so that our Lord never uses it, but always uses (Greek) "request." Martha, from ignorance, once uses "ask" in His case (John 11. 22). "Asking" for a brother sinning not unto death, is a humble petition in consonance with God's will. To "request" for a sin unto death [intercede, as it were, authoritatively for it, as though we were more merciful than God] would savour of presumption; prescribing to God in a matter which lies out of the bounds of our brotherly yearning (because one sinning unto death would thereby be demonstrated not to be, nor ever to have been, truly a brother, ch. 2. 19), how He shall inflict and withhold His righteous judgments. Jesus Himself intercedes, not for the world which hardens itself in unbelief, but for those given to Him out of the world. 17. "Every unrighteousness (even that of believers, cf. ch. 1. 9; 3. 4. Every coming short of right) is sin;" (but) not every sin is the sin unto death. and there is a sin not unto death—in the case of which, therefore, believers may intercede. Death and life stand in correlative opposition (v. 11-13). The sin unto death must be one tending "towards" (so the Greek), and so resulting in, death. ALFORD makes it to be an appreciable ACT of sin, viz., the denying Jesus to be the Christ, the Son of God (in contrast to confess this truth, v. 1. 5), ch. 2. 19, 22; 4. 2, 3; 5. 10. Such wilful deniers of Christ are not to be received into one's house, or wished "God speed." Still, I think with BENGEL, not merely the act, but also the state of apostasy accompanying the act, is included—a "state of soul in which faith, love, and hope, in short, the new life, is extinguished. The chief commandment is faith and love. Therefore, the chief sin is that by which faith and love are destroyed. In the former case is life; in the latter, death. As long as it is not evident (Note, 'see,' v. 16) that it is a sin unto death, it is lawful to pray. But when it is deliberate rejection of grace, and the man puts from him life thereby, how can others procure for him life?" Contrast James 5. 14-18. Cf. Matthew 12. 31, 32 as to the wilful rejection of Christ, and resistance to the Holy Ghost's plain testimony to Him as the Divine Messiah. Jesus, on the cross, pleaded only for those who KNEW NOT what they were doing in crucifying Him, not for those wilfully resisting grace and knowledge. If we pray for the impenitent, it must be with humble reference of the matter to God's will, not with the intercessory request which we should offer for a brother when erring. 18. (Ch. 3. 9.) We know—Thrice repeated emphatically, to enforce the three truths which the words preface, as matters of the brethren's joint experimental knowledge. This v. 18 warns against abusing v. 16, 17, as warranting carnal security. whosoever—Greek, "every one who," &c. Not only advanced believers, but every one who is born again, "sinneth not." he that is begotten—Greek aorist, "has been (once for all in past time) begotten of God;" in the beginning of the verse it is perfect. "Is begotten," or "born," as a continuing state. keepeth himself—The Vulgate translates, "The having been begotten of God keepeth HIM" (so one of the oldest MSS. reads); so ALFORD. Lit., "He having been begotten of God (nominative pendent), it (the Divine generation implied in the nominative) keepeth him." So ch. 3. 9, "His seed remaineth in him." Still, in English Version reading, God's working by His Spirit inwardly, and man's working under the power of that Spirit as a responsible agent, is what often occurs elsewhere. That God must keep us, if we are to keep ourselves from evil, is certain. Cf. John 17. 15 especially with this verse. that wicked one toucheth him not—so as to hurt him. In so far as he realizes his regeneration-life, the prince of this world hath nothing in him to fasten his deadly temptations on, as in Christ's own case. His Divine regeneration has severed once for all his connection with the prince of this world. 19. world lieth in wickedness—rather, "lieth in the wicked one," as the Greek is translated v. 18; ch. 2. 13, 14; cf. ch. 4. 4; John 17. 14, 15. The world lieth in the power of, and abiding in, the wicked one, as the resting-place and lord of his slaves; cf. "abideth in death," ch. 3. 14; contrast v. 20, "We are in Him that is true." Whilst the believer has been delivered out of his power, the whole world lieth helpless and motionless still in it, just as it was; including the wise, great, respectable, and all who are not by vital union in Christ. 20. Summary of our Christian privileges, is come—is present, having come. "HE IS HERE—all is full of Him—His incarnation, work, and abiding presence, is to us a living fact." [ALFORD.] given us an understanding—Christ's office is to give the inner spiritual understanding to discern the things of God. that we may know—Some oldest MSS. read, "(So) that we know." him that is true—God, as opposed to every kind of idol or false god (v. 21). Jesus, by virtue of His oneness with God, is also "He that is true" (Revelation 3. 7). even—"we are in the true" God, by virtue of being "in His Son Jesus Christ." This is the true God—"This Jesus Christ (the last-named Person) is the true God" (identifying Him thus with the Father in His attribute, "the only true God," John 17. 3, primarily attributed to the Father). and eternal life—Predicated of the Son of God; ALFORD wrongly says, He was the life, but not eternal life. The Father is indeed eternal life as its source, but the Son also is that eternal life manifested, as the very passage (ch. 1. 2) which ALFORD quotes, proves against him. Cf. also v. 11, 13. Plainly it is as the Mediator of ETERNAL LIFE to us that Christ is here contemplated. The Greek is, "The true God and eternal life is this" Jesus Christ, i. e., In believing in Him we believe in the true God, and have eternal life. The Son is called "He that is TRUE," Revelation 3. 7, as here. This naturally prepares the way for warning against false gods (v. 21). Jesus Christ is the only "express image of God's person" which is sanctioned, the only true visible manifestation of God. All other representations of God are forbidden as idols. Thus the Epistle closes as it began (ch. 1. 1, 2). 21. Affectionate parting caution, from idols—Christians were then everywhere surrounded by idolaters, with whom it was impossible to avoid intercourse. Hence the need of being on their guard against any even indirect compromise or act of communion with idolatry. Some at Pergamos, in the region whence John wrote, fell into the snare of eating things sacrificed to idols. The moment we cease to abide "in Him that is true (by abiding in Jesus Christ)," we become part of "the world that lieth in the wicked one," given up to spiritual, if not in all places literal, idolatry (Ephesians 5. 5; Colossians 3. 5).

THE SECOND EPISTLE GENERAL OF

JOHN.

INTRODUCTION TO THE SECOND AND THIRD EPISTLES.

AUTHENTICITY.—That these two Epistles were written by the same author appears from their similarity of tone, style, and sentiments. That John, the beloved disciple, was the author of the Second and Third Epistles, as of the First Epistle, appears from IRENÆUS, Adversus Hæreses, 1. 16. 3, who quotes 2 John 10. 11; and in 3. 16. 8, he quotes 2 John 7, mistaking it, however, as if occurring in 1 John. CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA (A. D. 192), Stromata, 2. 66, implies his knowledge of other Epistles of John besides the First Epistle; and in fragments of his Adumbrations (p. 101), he says, "John's Second Epistle which was written to the virgins (Greek parthenous); perhaps Parthos is what was meant) is the simplest; but it was written to a certain Babylonian named the Elect lady." DIONYSIUS OF ALEXANDRIA (in EUSEBIUS, Ecclesiastical History, 7. 25) observes that John never names himself in his Epistles, "not even in the Second and Third Epistles, although they are short Epistles, but simply calls himself the presbyter," a confutation of those who think John the apostle distinct from John the presbyter. ALEXANDER OF ALEXANDRIA cites 2 John 10. 11, as John's (SOCRATES, Historia Ecclesiastica, 1. 6). CYPRIAN, De Hæreticis Baptizandis, in referring to the bishops at the Council of Carthage, says, "John the apostle, in His Epistle, has said, If any come to you" (2 John 10.); so that this Epistle, and therefore its twin sister, 3 John, was recognized as apostolic in the North African Church. THE MURATORI fragment is ambiguous. The Second and Third Epistles were not in the Peschito or old Syriac version; and COSMAS INDICOPLEUSTES in the sixth century says, that in his time the Syriac Church only acknowledged three out of the Catholic Epistles, 1 Peter, 1 John, and James. But EPHREM SYRUS quotes the Second Epistle of John. EUSEBIUS (Ecclesiastical History) reckons both Epistles among the Antilegomena or controverted Scriptures, as distinguished from the Homologomena or universally acknowledged from the first. Still his own opinion was that the two minor Epistles were genuine, remarking, as he does in Demonstratio Evangelica, 3. 5, that in John's "Epistles" he does not mention his own name, nor call himself an apostle or evangelist, but an "elder" (2 John 1.; 3 John 1.). ORIGEN (IN EUSEBIUS, Ecclesiastical History, 6. 25) mentions the Second and Third Epistles, but adds, "not all admit [implying that most authorities do] their genuineness." JEROME (De Viris Illustribus, 9) mentions the two latter Epistles as attributed to John the presbyter, whose sepulchre was shown among the Ephesians in his day. But the designation "elder" was used of the apostles by others (e. g., PAPIAS, in EUSEBIUS, Ecclesiastical History, 3. 39), and is used by St. Peter, an apostle, of himself (1 Peter 5. 1). Why, then, should not John also use this designation of himself, in consonance with the humility which leads him not to name himself or his apostleship even in the First Epistle? The Antilegomena were generally recognized as canonical soon after the Council of Nice (A. D. 325). Thus CYRIL OF JERUSALEM, A. D. 349, enumerates fourteen Epistles of Paul, and seven Catholic Epistles. So GREGORY OF NAZIANZEN, in A. D. 389. The Councils of Hippo, 393, and Carthage, 397, adopted a catalogue of New Testament books exactly agreeing with our canon. So our oldest extant Greek MSS. The Second and Third Epistles of John, from their brevity (which ORIGEN notices), and the private nature of their contents, were less generally read in the earliest Christian assemblies, and were also less quoted by the Fathers; hence arose their non-universal recognition at the first. Their private nature makes them the less likely to be spurious; for there seems no purpose in their forgery. The style and colouring too accord with the style of the First Epistle.

TO WHOM ADDRESSED.—The Third Epistle is directed to Galus or Calus; whether Galus of Macedonia (Acts 19. 29), or Galus of Corinth (Romans 16. 23; 1 Corinthians 1. 14), or Galus of Derbe (Acts 20. 4), it is hard to decide. MILL believes Galus, bishop of Pergamos (Apostolic Constitutions, 7. 40), to be the person addressed in 3 John.

The address of the Second Epistle is more disputed. It opens, "The Elder unto the Elect lady." And it closes, "The children of thy elect sister greet thee." Now, 1 Peter 1. 1, 2, addresses the elect in Asia, &c., and closes (1 Peter 5. 13), "The Church that is at Babylon, elect together with you, saluteth you." Putting together these facts, with the quotations (above) from CLEMENT of ALEXANDRIA, and the fact that the word "Church" comes from a Greek word (kyriake) cognate to the Greek for "lady" (kyria, belonging to the Lord, kyrios), WORDSWORTH'S view is probable. As Peter in Babylon had sent the salutations of the elect Church in the then Parthian (see above on CLEMENT of ALEXANDRIA) Babylon to her elect sister in Asia, so John, the metropolitan president of the elect Church in Asia, writes to the elect lady, i. e., Church, in Babylon. NEANDER, ALFORD, &c., think the Greek kyria not to mean "lady," but to be her proper name; and that she had a "sister, a Christian matron," then with John.

DATE AND PLACE OF WRITING.—EUSEBIUS (Ecclesiastical History, 3. 25) relates that John, after the death of Domitian, returned from his exile in Patmos to Ephesus, and went on missionary tours into the heathen regions around, and also made visitations of the churches around, and ordained bishops and clergy. Such journeys are mentioned, 2 John 12; 3 John 10, 14. If EUSEBIUS be right, both Epistles must have been written after the Apocalypse, in his old age, which harmonizes with the tone of the Epistles, and in or near Ephesus. It was on one of his visitation tours that he designed to rebuke Diotrephes (3 John 9, 10).

Ver. 1-13. ADDRESS: GREETING: THANKSGIVING FOR THE ELECT LADY'S FAITHFULNESS IN THE TRUTH: ENJOINS LOVE: WARNS AGAINST DECEIVERS, LEST WE LOSE OUR REWARD: CONCLUSION. 1. The elder—In a familiar letter John gives himself a less authoritative designation than "apostle;" so 1 Peter 5. 1. 1. lady—BENGE takes the Greek as a proper name Kyria, answering to the Hebrew "Martha." Being a person of influence, "deceivers" (v. 7) were insinuating themselves into her family to seduce her and her children from the faith [TRINUS], whence John felt it necessary to write a warning to her. (But see my Introduction, and 1 Peter 5. 13.) A particular Church, probably that at Babylon, was intended. "Church" is derived from Greek Kyriake, akin to Kuria, or Kyria here; the latter word among the Romans and Athenians means the same as ecclesia, the term appropriated to designate the Church assembly. love in the truth—Christian love rests on the Christian truth (v. 3, end). Not merely "I love in truth," but "I love in the truth." all—All Christians form one fellowship, rejoicing in the spiritual prosperity of one another. "The communion of love is as wide as the communion of faith." [ALFORD.] 2. For the truth's sake—Joined with "I love," v. 1. "They who love in the truth, also love on account of the truth." dwelleth in us, and shall be with us for ever—in consonance with Christ's promise. 3. Grace be with you—One of the oldest MSS. and several versions have "us" for you. The Greek is lit., "Grace shall be with us," i. e., with both you and me. A prayer, however, is implied besides a confident affirmation. grace . . . mercy . . . peace—"Grace" covers the sins of men; "mercy," their miseries. Grace must first do away with man's guilt before his misery can be relieved by mercy. Therefore grace stands before mercy. Peace is the result of both, and therefore stands third in order. Casting all our care on the Lord, with thanksgiving, maintains this peace. the Lord—The oldest MSS. and most of the oldest versions omit "the Lord." John never elsewhere uses this title in his Epistles, but "the Son of God." in truth and love—The element or sphere in which alone grace, mercy, and peace, have place. He mentions truth in v. 4; love, in v. 5. Paul uses FAITH and love; for faith and truth are close akin. 4. I found—probably in one of his missionary tours of superintendence. See Introduction, at the end, and v. 12; 3 John 10, 14. of thy children—some, in truth—i. e., in the Gospel truth, as—even as. "The Father's commandment" is the standard of "the truth." 5. I beseech—Rather (cf. Note, 1 John 5. 16), "I request thee," implying some degree of authority. not . . . new commandment—It was old in that Christians heard it from the first in the Gospel preaching; new, in that the Gospel rested love on the new principle of filial imitation of God who first loved us, and gave Jesus to die for us; and also in that love is now set forth with greater clearness than in the Old Testament dispensation. Love performs both tables of the law, and is the end of the law and the Gospel alike (cf. Note, 1 John 2. 7, 8). that we—Implying that he already had love, and urging her to join him in the same Christian grace. This verse seems to me

to decide that a Church, not an individual lady, is meant. For a man to urge a woman ("THEE;" not thee and thy children) that he and she should love one another, is hardly like an apostolic precept, however pure may be the love enjoined; but all is clear if "the lady" represent a Church. 6. "Love is the fulfilling of the law," and the fulfilling of the law is the sure test of love. This is the commandment—Greek, "The commandment is this," viz., love, in which all God's other commandments are summed up. 7. As love and truth go hand in hand (v. 3, 4), he feels it needful to give warning against teachers of untruth. For—Giving the reason why he dwelt on truth and on love, which manifests itself in keeping God's commandments (v. 6). many—(1 John 2. 18; 4. 1.) are entered—The oldest MSS. read, "have gone forth," viz., from us. confess not . . . Jesus . . . in the flesh—the token of Antichrist. is come—Greek, "coming." He who denies Christ's coming in the flesh, denies the possibility of the Incarnation; he who denies that he has come, denies its actuality. They denied the possibility of a Messiah's appearing, or coming, in the flesh. [NEANDER.] I think the Greek present participle implies both the first and the second advent of Christ. He is often elsewhere called the Coming One (Greek), Matthew 11. 3; Hebrews 10. 37. The denial of the reality of His manifestation in the flesh, at His first coming, and of His personal advent again, constitutes Antichrist. "The world turns away from God and Christ, busily intent upon its own husks; but to OPPOSE God and Christ is of the heaven of Satan." [BENGE.] This is a—Greek, "This (such a one as has been just described) is the deceiver and the Antichrist." The many who in a degree fulfil the character, are forerunners of the final personal Antichrist, who shall concentrate in himself all the features of previous Antichristian systems. 8. Look to yourselves—amidst the widespread prevalence of deception so many being led astray. So Christ's warning, Matthew 24. 4, 5, 24. we lose not . . . we receive—The oldest MSS. and versions read, "That ye lose not, but that ye receive." which we have wrought—So one oldest MS. reads. Other very old MSS., versions, and Fathers, read, "which ye have wrought." The we being seemingly the more difficult reading is less likely to have been a transcriber's alteration. Look that ye lose not the believing state of "truth and love," which we (as God's workmen, 2 Corinthians 6. 1; 2 Timothy 2. 15) were the instruments of working in you. a full reward—of grace not of debt. Fully consummated glory. If "which ye have wrought" be read with very old authorities, the reward meant is, that of their "work (of faith) and labour of love." There are degrees of heavenly reward proportioned to the degrees of capability of receiving heavenly blessedness. Each vessel of glory hanging on Jesus shall be fully happy. But the larger the vessel, the greater will be its capacity for receiving heavenly bliss. He who with one pound made ten, received authority over ten cities. He who made five pounds received five cities; each according to his capacity of rule, and in proportion to his faithfulness. Cf. 1 Corinthians 15. 41. "There is no half reward of the saints. It is either lost altogether, or received in full; in full communion with God." [BENGEL.] Still no service of minister or people shall fail to receive its reward. 9. The loss (v. 8) meant is here explained: the not having God, which results from abiding not in the doctrine of Christ. transgresseth—The oldest MSS. and versions read, "Every one who takes the lead;" lit., goes, or leads on before; cf. John 10. 4, "He goeth before them" (not the same Greek). Cf. 3 John 9, "Loveth to have the pre-eminence." hath not God—(1 John 2. 23; 5. 15.) The second "of Christ" is omitted in the oldest MSS., but is understood in the sense. he—Emphatical: He and He alone. 10. If there come any—as a teacher or brother. The Greek is indicative, not subjunctive; implying that such persons do actually come, and are sure to come; when any comes, as there will. True love is combined with hearty renunciation and separation from all that is false, whether persons or doctrines. receive him not . . . neither bid him God speed—This is not said of those who were always aliens from the Church, but of those who wish to be esteemed brethren, and subvert the true doctrine. [GROTIUS.] The greeting salutation forbidden in the case of such a one is that usual among Christian brethren in those days, not a mere formality, but a token of Christian brotherhood. 11. By wishing a false brother or teacher "God (or good) speed," you imply that he is capable as such of good speed and joy (the lit. meaning of the Greek), and that you wish him it whilst opposing Christ; so you identify yourself with "his evil deeds." The Greek of "partaker" is "having communion with." We cannot have communion with saints and with Antichrist at once. Here we see John's naturally fiery zeal directed to a right end. POLYCARP, the disciple of John, told contemporaries of IRENÆUS, who narrates the story on their authority, that on one occasion when John was about to bathe, and heard that Cerinthus, the heretic, was within, he retired with abhorrence, exclaiming, Surely the house will fall in ruins since the enemy of the truth is there. 12. I would not write—A heart full of love pours itself out more freely face to face, than by letter. paper—made of Egyptian papyrus. Pens were then reeds split. ink—made of soot and water, thickened with gum. Parchment was used for the permanent MSS. in which the Epistles were preserved. Writing tablets were used merely for temporary purposes, as our slates. face to face—lit., "mouth to mouth." full—Greek, "filled full." Your joy will be complete in hearing from me in person the joyful Gospel truths which I now defer communicating till I see you. On other occasions his writing the glad truths was for the same purpose. 13. ALFORD confesses, The non-mention of the "lady" herself here seems rather to favour the hypothesis that a Church is meant.

THE THIRD EPISTLE OF

JOHN.

Ver. 1-14. ADDRESS: WISH FOR GAIUS' PROSPERITY: JOY AT HIS WALKING IN THE TRUTH. HIS HOSPITALITY TO THE BROTHERN AND STRANGERS THE FRUIT OF LOVE. DIOTREPHES' OPPOSITION AND AMBITION. PRAISE OF DEMETRIUS. CONCLUSION. 1. I—Emphatical: I personally, for my part. On Gaius or Caius, see Introduction before Second Epistle. love in the truth—(2 John 1.) "Be loved" is repeated often in this Epistle, indicating strong affection (v. 1, 2, 5, 11). 2. above all things—Greek, "concerning all things:" so ALFORD: in all respects. But WAHL justifies English Version (cf. 1 Peter 4. 8). Of course, since his soul's prosperity is presupposed, "above all things" does not imply that John wishes Caius' bodily health above that of his soul, but as the first object to be desired next after spiritual health. I know you are prospering in the concerns of your soul. I wish you similar prosperity in your body. Perhaps John had heard from the brethren (v. 3) that Caius was in bad health, and was tried in other ways (v. 10), to which the wish, v. 2, refers. prosper—in general. be in health—in particular. testified of the truth that is in thee—Greek, "of (or to) thy truth:" thy share of that truth in which thou walkest. [ALFORD.] even as thou—In contrast to Diotrephes (v. 9). 4. my children—members of the Church; confirming the view that the elect lady is a Church. 5. faithfully—an act becoming a faithful man. whatsoever thou doest—A distinct Greek word from the former "doest:" translate, "workest:" whatsoever work, or labour of love, thou dost perform. So Matthew 28. 10, "She hath wrought a good work upon me." and to strangers—The oldest MSS., "And that (i. e., and those brethren) strangers." The fact of the brethren whom thou didst entertain being "strangers," enhances the love manifested in the act. 6. borne witness of thy charity before the Church—to stimulate others by the good example. The brethren so entertained by Caius were missionary evangelists (v. 7); and, probably, in the course of narrating their missionary labours for the edification of the Church where John then was, incidentally mentioned the loving hospitality shown them by Caius. bring forward on their journey—"If thou (continue to) forward on their journey" by giving them provisions for

the way. after a godly sort—Greek, "in a manner worthy of God," whose ambassadors they are, and whose servant thou art. He who honours God's missionary servants (v. 7), honours God. 7. his name's sake—Christ's. went forth—as missionaries, taking nothing—refusing to receive aught by way of pay, or maintenance, though justly entitled to it, as Paul at Corinth and at Thessalonica. Gentiles—the Christians just gathered out by their labours from among the heathen. As Caius himself was a Gentile convert, "the Gentiles" here must mean the converts just made from the heathen, the Gentiles to whom they had gone forth. It would have been inexpedient to have taken aught (the Greek meden implies, not that they got nothing, though they had desired it, but that it was of their own choice they took nothing) from the infant churches among the heathen: the case was different in receiving hospitality from Caius. 8. We—In contradistinction to "the Gentiles" or "heathen" referred to, v. 7. therefore—as they take nothing from the Gentiles or heathen. receive—The oldest MSS. read, "take up." As they take nothing from the Gentiles, we ought to take them up so as to support them. fellow-helpers—with them. to the truth—i. e., to promote the truth. 9. I wrote—The oldest MSS. add "something:" a communication, probably, on the subject of receiving the brethren with brotherly love (v. 8, 10). That Epistle was not designed by the Spirit for the universal Church, or else it would have been preserved. unto the Church—of which Caius is a member. loveth . . . pre-eminence—through ambition. Evidently occupying a high place in the Church where Caius was (v. 10). among them—over the members of the Church. receiveth us not—virtually, viz., by not receiving with love the brethren whom we recommended to be received (v. 8, 10; cf. Matthew 10. 40). 10. if I come—(V. 14.) I will remember—lit., "I will bring to mind" before all by stigmatizing and punishing. prating—with mere silly tattle. neither doth he . . . receive the brethren—with hospitality. "The brethren" are the missionaries on their journey. forbiddeth them that would receive them. casteth them—those that would receive the brethren, by excommunication from the Church, which his influence, as a leading man (v. 9) in it, enabled him to do. NEANDER thinks that the missionaries were JEWS by birth, whence it is said in their praise they took nothing from THE GENTILES: in contrast to other Jewish missionaries who abused ministers' right of maintenance elsewhere, as Paul tells us, 2 Corinthians 11. 22; Philippians 3. 2, 5, 19. Now in the Gentile churches there existed an ultra-Pauline party of anti-Jewish tendency, the forerunners of Marcion; Diotrefes possibly stood at the head of this party, which fact, as well as his domineering spirit, may account for his hostility to the missionaries, and to the apostle John, who had, by the power of love, tried to harmonize the various elements in the Asiatic churches. At a later period, Marcion, we know, attached himself to Paul alone, and paid no deference to the authority of John. 11. follow not that which is evil—as manifested in Diotrefes (v. 9, 10). but . . . good—as manifested in Demetrius (v. 12). is of God—is born of God, who is good. hath not seen God—spiritually, not literally. 12. of all men—who have had opportunity of knowing his character. of the truth itself—The Gospel standard of truth bears witness to him that he walks conformably to it, in acts of real love, hospitality to the brethren (in contrast to Diotrefes), &c. Cf. John 3. 21, "He that doeth truth cometh to the light, that his deeds may be made manifest that they are wrought in God." we also—besides the testimony of "a 1 men," and "of the truth itself." ye know—The oldest MSS. read, "thou knowest." 13. I will not—rather a Greek, "I wish not . . . to write" more. 14. face to face—Greek, "mouth to mouth." peace—Peace inward of conscience, peace fraternal of friendship, peace supernal of glory. [LYRA.] friends—a title seldom used in the New Testament, as it is absorbed in the higher titles of "brother, brethren." Still Christ recognizes the relation of friend also, based on the highest grounds, obedience to Him from love, and entailing the highest privileges, admission to the intimacy of the holy and glorious God, and sympathizing Saviour; so Christians have "friends" in Christ. Here in a friendly letter, mention of "friends" appropriately occurs. by name—no less than if their names were written. [BENGEI.]

JUDE.

INTRODUCTION.

AUTHOR.—He calls himself in the address "the servant of Jesus Christ, and brother of James." See Introduction to the Epistle of James, in proof of James the apostle, and James the Lord's brother, the bishop of Jerusalem, being one and the same person. Galatians 1. 19 alone seems to me to prove this. Similarly, Jude the brother of our Lord, and Jude the apostle, seem to be one and the same. JEROME, Contra Helvidium, rightly maintains that by the Lord's brethren are meant his cousins, children of Mary and Cleophas (the same as Alphaeus). From 1 Corinthians 9. 5 (as "brethren of the Lord" stands between "other apostles" and "Cephas"), it seems natural to think that the brethren of the Lord are distinguished from the apostles only because all his brethren were not apostles, but only James and Jude. Jude's reason for calling himself "brother of James," was that James, as bishop of Jerusalem, was better known than himself. Had he been, in the strict sense, brother of our Lord, he probably would have so entitled himself. His omission of mention of his apostleship is no proof that he was not an apostle; for so also James omits it in his heading; and Paul, in his Epistles to the Philippians, Thessalonians, and Philemon, omits it. Had the writer been a counterfeiter of the apostle Jude, he would doubtless have called himself an "apostle." He was called also Lebbæus and Thaddeus, probably to distinguish him from Judas Iscariot, the traitor. Lebbæus, from Hebrew leeb, "heart," means courageous. Thaddeus is the same as Theudas, from Hebrew thad, the "breast." Luke and John, writing later than Matthew, when there would be no confusion between him and Judas Iscariot, give his name Judas. The only circumstance relating to him recorded in the Gospels occurs John 14. 22, "Judas saith unto him, not Iscariot, Lord, how is it that thou wilt manifest thyself unto us, and not unto the world?" &c. JEROME (Annotationes in Mattheum) says, that he was sent to Edessa, to Abgarus, king of Osroene, or Edessa, and that he preached in Syria, Arabia, Mesopotamia, and Persia, in which last country he suffered martyrdom. The story is told on EUSEBIUS' authority, that Abgarus, on his sick bed, having heard of Jesus' power to heal, sent to beg Him to come and cure him, to which the Lord replied, praising his faith, that though he had not seen the Saviour, he yet believed; adding, "As for what thou hast written, that I should come to thee, it is necessary that all those things for which I was sent should be fulfilled by me in this place, and that having filled them I should be received up to Him that sent me. When, therefore, I shall be received into heaven, I will send unto thee some one of my disciples who shall both heal thy distemper and give life to thee and those with thee." Thomas is accordingly said to have been inspired to send Thaddeus for the cure and baptism of Abgarus. The letters are said to have been shown Thaddeus among the archives of Edessa. It is possible such a message was verbally sent, and the substance of it registered in writing afterwards (cf. 2 Kings 5.; and Matthew 15. 22). HEGESIPUS (in EUSEBIUS, Ecclesiastical History, 3. 20) states, that when Domitian inquired after David's posterity, some grandsons of Jude, called the Lord's brother, were brought into his presence. Being asked as to their possessions, they said that they had thirty-nine acres of the value of 9000 denarii, out of which they paid him taxes, and lived by the labour of their hands, a proof of which they gave by showing the hardness of their hands. Being interrogated as to Christ and His kingdom, they replied, that it was not of this world, but heavenly; and that it would be manifested at the end of the world, when He would come in glory to judge the living and the dead.

AUTHENTICITY.—EUSEBIUS, Ecclesiastical History, 3. 25, reckons it among the Antilegomena or controverted Scriptures, "though recognized by the majority." The reference to the contest of Michael, the archangel, with the devil, for the body of Moses, not mentioned elsewhere in the Old Testament, but found in the apocryphal "Book of Enoch," probably raised doubts as to its authenticity, as JEROME (Catalogus Scriptorum Ecclesiasticorum, 4) says. Moreover, its not being addressed to one particular Church, or individual, caused it not to be so immediately recognized as canonical. A counterfeiter would have avoided using what did not occur in the Old Testament, and which might be regarded as apocryphal.

As to the book of Enoch, if quoted by Jude, his quotation of a passage from it gives an inspired sanction only to the truth of that passage, not to the whole book; just as Paul, by inspiration, sanctions particular sentiments from Aratus, Epimenides, and Menander, but not all their writings. I think, rather, as there is some slight variation between Jude's statement and that of the book of Enoch, that Jude, though probably not ignorant of the book of Enoch, stamps with inspired sanction the current tradition of the Jews as to Enoch's prophecies; just as Paul mentions the names of the Egyptian magicians, "Jannes and Jambres," not mentioned in the Old Testament. At all events, the prophecy ascribed to Enoch by Jude was really his, being sanctioned as such by this inspired writer. So also the narration as to the archangel Michael's dispute with Satan concerning the body of Moses, is by Jude's inspired authority (v. 9) declared true. The book of Enoch is quoted by JUSTIN MARTYR, IRENEUS, CLEMENS OF ALEXANDRIA, &c. Bruce, the Abyssinian traveler, brought home three copies of it in Ethiopic, from Alexandria, of which Archbishop Lawrence, in 1821, gave an English translation. The Ethiopic was a version from the Greek, and the Greek doubtless a version from the Hebrew, as the names of the angels in it show. The Apostolic Constitutions, ORIGEN (Contra Celsum), JEROME, and AUGUSTINE, pronounce it not canonical. Yet it is in the main edifying, vindicating God's government of the world, natural and spiritual, and contradicting none of the Scripture statements. The name Jesus never occurs, though "Son of man," so often given to Messiah in the Gospels, is frequent, and terms are used expressive of His dignity, character, and acts, exceeding the views of Messiah in any other Jewish book. The writer seems to have been a Jew who had become thoroughly imbued with the sacred writings of Daniel. And, though many coincidences occur between his sentiments and the New Testament, the Messianic portions are not distinct enough to prove that the writer knew the New Testament. Rather, he seems to have immediately preceded Christ's coming, about the time of Herod the Great, and so gives us a most interesting view of believing Jews' opinions before the advent of our Lord. The Trinity is recognized, 60, 13, 14. Messiah is "the elect One" existing from eternity, 48, 2, 3, 5; "All kings shall fall down before Him, and worship and fix their hopes on this Son of man," 61, 10-13. He is the object of worship, 43, 3, 4; He is the supreme Judge, 60, 10, 11; 63, 38, 39. There shall be a future state of retribution, 93, 8, 9; 94, 2, 4; chs. 95, 96, 99, 103. The eternity of future punishment, 103, 5. VOLKMAR, in ALFORD, thinks the book was written at the time of the sedition of Barchochebas (A. D. 132), by a follower of Rabbi Akiba, the upholder of that impostor. This would make the book Antichristian in its origin. If this date be correct, doubtless it copied some things from Jude, giving them the Jewish, not the Christian, colouring.

EUSEBIUS (Demonstratio Evangelica, 3, 5) remarks, it accords with John's humility that in 2 and 3 John he calls himself "the elder." For the same reason James and Jude call themselves "servants of Jesus Christ." CLEMENS ALEXANDRINUS (Adumbrations, in Ep. Jud., p. 1007) says, "Jude, through reverential awe, did not call himself brother, but servant, of Jesus Christ, and brother of James."

TERTULLIAN (De Cultu Fœminarum, c. 3) cites the Epistle as that of the apostle James. CLEMENS ALEXANDRINUS quotes it (v. 3, 17) as Scripture, Stromata 3., 2, 11; and (v. 5) in Pædagogus 3., 8, 44. The MURATORI fragment asserts its canonicity. [ROUTH, Reliquiæ Sacræ, 1, 306.] ORIGEN (Commentary on Matthew 13, 55) says, "Jude wrote an Epistle of few lines, but one filled full of the strong words of heavenly grace." Also, in Commentary on Matthew 22, 23, he quotes v. 6; and on Matthew 18, 10, he quotes v. 1. He calls the writer "Jude the apostle," in the Latin remains of his works (cf. DAVIDSON, Introduction III, 498). JEROME (Catalogus Scriptorum Ecclesiasticorum 4) reckons it among the Scriptures. Though the oldest MSS. of the Peschito omit it, Ephrem Syrus recognizes it. WORDSWORTH reasons for its genuineness thus: St. Jude, we know, died before St. John, i. e., before the beginning of the second century. Now EUSEBIUS (Ecclesiastical History 3, 32) tells us that St. James was succeeded in the bishopric of Jerusalem by Symeon his brother: and also that Symeon sat in that see till A. D. 107, when as a martyr he was crucified in his 120th year. We find that the Epistle to Jude was known in the East and West in the second century; it was therefore circulated in Symeon's lifetime. It never would have received currency such as it had, nor would Symeon have permitted a letter bearing the name of an apostle, his own brother Jude, brother of his own apostolical predecessor, St. James, to have been circulated, if it were not really St. Jude's.

TO WHOM ADDRESSED.—The references to Old Testament history, v. 5, 7, and to Jewish tradition, v. 14, &c., make it likely that Jewish Christians are the readers to whom Jude mainly (though including also all Christians, v. 1) writes, just as the kindred Epistle, 2 Peter, is addressed primarily to the same class; cf. Introductions to 1 and 2 Peter. The persons stigmatized in it were not merely libertines (as ALFORD thinks), though no doubt that was one of their prominent characteristics, but heretics in doctrine, "denying the only Lord God, and our Saviour Jesus Christ." Hence he urges believers "earnestly to contend for the faith once delivered unto the saints." Insubordination, self-seeking, and licentiousness, the fruit of Antinomian teachings, were the evils against which Jude warns his readers; reminding them that, to build themselves in their most holy faith, and to pray in the Holy Ghost, are the only effectual safeguards. The same evils, along with mocking skepticism, shall characterize the last days before the final judgment, even as in the days when Enoch warned the ungodly of the coming flood. As Peter was in Babylon in writing 1 Peter 5, 13, and probably also in writing 2 Peter (cf. Introductions to 1 and 2 Peter), it seems not unlikely that Jude addressed his Epistle primarily to the Jewish Christians in and about Mesopotamian Babylon (a place of great resort to the Jews in that day), or else to the Christian Jews dispersed in Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia, the persons addressed by Peter. For Jude is expressly said to have preached in Mesopotamia (JEROME, Annotations in Matthæum), and his Epistle, consisting of only twenty-five verses, contains in them no less than eleven passages from 2 Peter (see the list in my Introduction to 2 Peter). Probably in v. 4 he witnesses to the fulfilment of Peter's prophecy, "There are certain men crept in unawares, who were before of old ordained (rather as Greek, 'forewritten,' i. e., announced beforehand by the apostle Peter's written prophecy) to this condemnation, ungodly men denying the only Lord God, and our Lord Jesus Christ." Cf. 2 Peter 2, 1, "There shall be false teachers among you who privily shall bring in damnable heresies, even denying the Lord that bought them, and bring upon themselves swift destruction." Also v. 17, 18 plainly refers to the very words of 2 Peter 3, 3, "Remember the words which were spoken before of the apostles of our Lord Jesus; how they told you there should be mockers in the last time who should walk after their own ungodly lusts." This proves, in opposition to ALFORD, that Jude's Epistle is later than Peter's (whose inspiration he thus confirms, just as Peter confirms Paul's, 2 Peter 3, 15, 16), not vice versa.

TIME AND PLACE OF WRITING.—ALFORD thinks, that, considering St. Jude was writing to Jews and citing signal instances of Divine vengeance, it is very unlikely he would have omitted to allude to the destruction of Jerusalem if he had written after that event which uprooted the Jewish polity and people. He conjectures that the tone and references that the writer lived in Palestine. But as to the former, negative evidence is doubtful; for neither does John allude in his Epistles, written after the destruction of Jerusalem, to that event. MILL fixes on A. D., 90, after the death of all the apostles save John. I incline to think from v. 17, 18 that some time had elapsed since the Second Epistle of Peter (written probably about A. D. 68 or 69) when Jude wrote, and, therefore, that the Epistle of Jude was written after the destruction of Jerusalem.

Ver. 1-25. ADDRESS: GREETING: HIS OBJECT IN WRITING: WARNING AGAINST SEDUCERS IN DOCTRINE AND PRACTICE FROM GOD'S VENGEANCE ON APOSTATES, ISRAEL, THE FALLEN ANGELS, SODOM AND GOMORRAH. DESCRIPTION OF THESE BAD MEN, IN CONTRAST TO MICHAEL—LIKE CAIN, BALAAM, AND CORE: ENOCH'S PROPHECY AS TO THEM: THE APOSTLES' FOREWARNING: CONCLUDING EXHORTATION AS TO PRESERVING THEIR OWN FAITH, AND TRYING TO SAVE OTHERS: DOXOLOGY. 1. servant of Jesus Christ—as His minister and apostle. brother of James—who was more widely known as bishop of Jerusalem and “brother of the Lord” (i. e., either cousin, or stepbrother, being son of Joseph by a former marriage; for ancient traditions universally agree that Mary, Jesus' mother, continued perpetually a virgin). Jude therefore calls himself modestly “brother of James.” See my Introduction. to them . . . sanctified by God the Father—The oldest MSS. and versions, ORIGEN, LUCIFER, &c., read, “beloved” for sanctified. If English Version be read, cf. Colossians 1. 12; 1 Peter 1. 2. The Greek is not “by,” but “in.” God the Father's love is the element in which they are “beloved.” Thus the conclusion, v. 21, corresponds, “Keep yourselves in the love of God.” Cf. “Beloved of the Lord” 2 Thessalonians 2. 13. preserved in Jesus Christ—“kept.” Translate not “in,” but as Greek “FOR Jesus Christ.” “Kept continually (so the Greek perfect participle means) by God the Father for Jesus Christ,” against the day of His coming. Jude, beforehand, mentions the source and guarantee for the final accomplishment of believers' salvation; lest they should be disheartened by the dreadful evils which he proceeds to announce. [BENGEI.] and called—Predicated of “them that are beloved in God the Father, and preserved in Jesus Christ: who are called.” God's effectual calling in the exercise of His Divine prerogative, guarantees their eternal safety. 2. Mercy—In a time of wretchedness. Therefore mercy stands first; the mercy of Christ (v. 21). peace—in the Holy Ghost (v. 20). love—of God (v. 21). The three answer to the Divine Trinity. be multiplied—in you and towards you. 3. Design of the Epistle (cf. v. 20, 21). all diligence—(2 Peter 1. 5.) As the minister is to give all diligence to admonish, so the people should, in accordance with his admonition, give all diligence to have all Christian graces, and to make their calling sure, the common salvation—wrought by Christ. Cf. Note, “obtained LIKE precious faith,” 2 Peter 1. 1. This community of faith, and of the object of faith, salvation, forms the ground of mutual exhortation by appeals to common hopes and fears. It was needful for me—rather, “I felt it necessary to write (now at once; so the Greek aorist means; the present infinitive ‘to write,’ which precedes, expresses merely the general fact of writing) exhorting you.” The reason why he felt it necessary “to write with exhortation,” he states, v. 4, “For there are certain men crept in,” &c. Having intended to write generally of the common salvation, he found it necessary from the existing evils in the Church, to write specially that they should contend for the faith against those evils. earnestly contend—Cf. Philippians 1. 27, “striving together for the faith of the Gospel.” once—Greek, “once for all delivered,” &c. No other faith or revelation is to supersede it. A strong argument for resisting heretical innovators (v. 4). Believers, like Nehemiah's workmen, with one hand “build themselves up in their most holy faith,” with the other they “contend earnestly for the faith” against its foes. the saluts—all Christians, holy (i. e., consecrated to God) by their calling, and in God's design. 4. crept in unawares—stealthily and unlawfully. Note, 2 Peter 2. 1, “privily shall bring in damnable heresies.” certain men—Implying disparagement. before . . . ordained—Greek, “forewritten,” viz., in Peter's prophecy, v. 17, 18; and in Paul's before that, 1 Timothy 4. 1; 2 Timothy 3. 1; and by implication in the judgments which

overtook the apostate angels. The disobedient Israelites, Sodom and Gomorrah, Balaam and Core, and which are written “for an example” (v. 7, and 5, 6, 11). God's eternal character as the Punisher of sin, as set forth in Scripture “of old,” is the ground on which such apostate characters are ordained to condemnation. Scripture is the reflection of God's book of life in which believers are “written among the living.” “Forewritten” is applied also in Romans 15. 4 to the things written in Scripture. Scripture itself reflects God's character from everlasting, which is the ground of His decrees from everlasting. BENGEI explains it as an abbreviated phrase for, “They were of old foretold by Enoch (v. 14, who did not write his prophecies), and afterwards marked out by the written word.” to this condemnation—Jude graphically puts their judgment as it were present before the eyes, “THIS.” Enoch's prophecy comprises the “ungodly men” of the last days before Christ's coming to judgment, as well as their forerunners, the “ungodly men” before the flood, the type of the last judgment (Matthew 24. 37-39; 2 Peter 3. 3-7). The disposition and the doom of both correspond. the grace of our God—A phrase for the Gospel especially sweet to believers who appropriate God in Christ as “our God,” and so rendering the more odious the vile perversity of those who turn the Gospel state of grace and liberty into a ground of licentiousness, as if their exemption from the law gave them a license to sin. denying the only Lord—The oldest MSS., versions, and Fathers omit “God,” which follows in English Version. Translate as the Greek, “the only Master;” here used of Jesus Christ, who is at once Master and “Lord” (a different Greek word). So 2 Peter 2. 1, Note. By virtue of Christ's perfect oneness with the Father, He, as well as the Father, is termed “the ONLY” God and “MASTER.” Greek, “Master,” implies God's absolute ownership to dispose of His creatures as He likes. 5. (Hebrews 3. 16; 4. 13.) therefore—Other oldest MSS. and Vulgate read, “But;” in contrast to the ungodly, v. 4. though ye once—rather, “once for all.” Translate, “I wish to remind you, as knowing ALL (viz., that I am referring to. So the oldest MSS., versions, and Fathers) once for all.” As already they know all the facts once for all, he needs only to “remind” them. the Lord—The oldest MSS. and versions read, “Jesus.” So “Christ” is said to have accompanied the Israelites in the wilderness; so perfectly is Jesus one with the God of the Israelite theocracy. saved—brought safely, and into a state of safety and salvation. afterward—Greek, “secondly;” in the next instance “destroyed them that believed not,” as contrasted with His in the first instance having saved them. 6. (2 Peter 2. 4.) kept not their first estate—Vulgate translates, “their own principality,” which the fact of angels being elsewhere called “principalities,” favours: “their own” implies that, instead of being content with the dignity once for all assigned to them under the Son of God, they aspired higher. ALFORD thinks the narrative in Genesis 6. 2 is alluded to, not the fall of the devil and his angels, as he thinks “giving themselves over to fornication” (v. 7) proves; cf. Greek, “in like manner to these,” viz., to the angels (v. 6). It seems to me more natural to take “sons of God” (Genesis 6. 2) of the Sethites, thun of angels, who, as “spirits,” do not seem capable of carnal connection. The parallel, 2 Peter 2. 4, plainly refers to the fall of the apostate angels. And “in like manner to these,” v. 7, refers to the inhabitants of Sodom and Gomorrah, “the cities about them” slung “in like manner” as they did. [ESTIUS and CALVIN.] Even if Greek “these,” v. 7, refer to the angels, the sense of “in like manner as these” will be, not that the angels carnally fornicated with the daughters of men, but that their ambition, whereby their affections went away from God and they fell, is in God's view a sin of like kind spiritually as Sodom's going away from God's order of nature after strange flesh; the sin of the apostate angels after their kind is analogous to that of the human Sodomites after their kind. Cf. the somewhat similar spiritual connection of whoremongers and covetousness. The apocryphal book of Enoch interprets Genesis 6. 2 as ALFORD. But though Jude accords with it in some particulars, it does not follow that he accords with it in all. The Hebrews name the fallen angels Aza and Azael. left—of their own accord. their own—Greek, "their proper." habitation—Heaven, all bright and glorious, as opposed to the "darkness" to which they now are doomed. Their ambitious designs seem to have had a peculiar connection with this earth, of which Satan before his fall may have been God's vicegerent, whence arises his subsequent connection with it as first the Tempter, then "the prince of this world." reserved—As the Greek is the same, and there is an evident reference to their having "kept not their first estate," translate, "He hath kept." Probably what is meant is, He hath kept them in His purpose; that is their sure doom; moreover, as yet, Satan and his demons roam at large on the earth. An earnest of their doom is their having been cast out of heaven, being already restricted to "the darkness of this present world," the "air" that surrounds the earth, their peculiar element now. They lurk in places of gloom and death, looking forward with agonizing fear to their final torment in the bottomless pit. He means not literal chains and darkness, but figurative in this present world where, with restricted powers and liberties, shut out from heaven, they, like condemned prisoners, await their doom. 7. Even as—ALFORD translates, "(I wish to remind you, v. 5) that," &c. Sodom, &c.—(2 Peter 2. 6.) giving themselves over to fornication—following fornication extraordinarily, i. e., out of the order of nature. On "in like manner to them" (Greek), cf. Note, v. 6. Cf. on spiritual fornication, "go a whoring from thee," Psalm 73. 27. going after strange flesh—departing from the course of nature, and going after that which is unnatural. In later times the most enlightened heathen nations indulged in the sin of Sodom without compunction or shame. are set forth—before our eyes. suffering—undergoing to this present time; alluding to the marks of volcanic fire about the Dead Sea. the vengeance—Greek, "righteous retribution." eternal fire—The lasting marks of the fire that consumed the cities irrevocably, is a type of the eternal fire to which the inhabitants have been consigned. BENGEL translates as the Greek will admit, "Suffering (the) punishment (which they endure) as an example or sample of eternal fire (viz., that which shall consume the wicked)." Ezekiel 16. 53-55 shows that Sodom's punishment, as a nation, is not eternal. Cf. also 2 Peter 2. 6. 8. also—rather, "In like manner nevertheless" (notwithstanding these warning examples). [ALFORD.] these . . . dreamers—The Greek has not "filthy" of English Version. The clause, "these men dreaming" (i. e., in their dreams), belongs to all the verbs, "defile," &c.; "despise," &c.; "speak evil," &c. All sinners are spiritually asleep, and their carnal activity is as it were a dream (1 Thessalonians 5. 6, 7). Their speaking evil of dignities is because they are dreaming, and know not what they are speaking evil of (v. 10). "As a man dreaming seems to himself to be seeing and hearing many things, so the natural man's lusts are agitated by joy, distress, fear, and the other passions. But he is a stranger to self-command. Hence, though he bring into play all the powers of reason, he cannot conceive the true liberty which the sons of light, who are awake and in the daylight, enjoy." [BENGEL.] defile the flesh—(V. 7.) dominion—"lordship." dignities—lit., "glories." Earthly and heavenly dignities. 9. Michael, the archangel—Nowhere in Scripture is the plural used, "archangels;" but only ὁ ἀρχάγγελος, "archangel." The only other passage in the New Testament where it occurs, is 1 Thessalonians 4. 16, where Christ is distinguished from the archangel, with whose voice He shall descend to raise the dead; they therefore err who confound Christ with Michael. The name means, Who is like God? In Daniel 10. 13 he is called "One (Margin, the first) of the chief princes." He is the champion angel of Israel. In Revelation 12. 7 the conflict between Michael and Satan is again alluded to. durst not—from reverence for Satan's former dignity (v. 8). railing accusation—Greek, "judgment of blasphemy," or evil-speaking. Peter said, Angels do not, in order to avenge themselves, rail at dignities, though ungodly, when they have to contend with them: Jude says, that the archangel Michael himself did not rail even at the time when he fought with the Devil, the prince of evil spirits—not from fear of him, but from reverence of God, whose delegated power in this world Satan once had, and even in some degree still has. From the word "disputed," or debated in controversy, it is plain it was a judicial contest. about the body of Moses—his literal body. Satan, as having the power of death, opposed the raising of it again, on the ground of Moses' sin at Meribah, and his murder of the Egyptian. That Moses' body was raised, appears from his presence with Elijah and Jesus (who were in the body) at the Transfiguration; the sample and earnest of the coming resurrection-kingdom, to be ushered in by Michael's standing up for God's people. Thus in each dispensation a sample and pledge of the future resurrection was given: Enoch in the patriarchal dispensation, Moses in the Levitical, Elijah in the prophetic. It is noteworthy that the same rebuke is recorded here, as was used by the Angel of the Lord, or Jehovah the Second Person, in pleading for Joshua, the representative of the Jewish Church, against Satan, in Zechariah 3. 2; whence some have thought that also here "the body of Moses" means the Jewish Church accused by Satan, before God, for its filthiness, on which ground he demands that Divine justice should take its course against Israel, but is rebuked by the Lord who has "chosen Jerusalem;" thus, as "the body of Christ" is the Christian Church, so "the body of Moses" is the Jewish Church. But the literal body is evidently here meant (though, secondarily, the Jewish Church is typified by Moses' body, as it was there represented by Joshua the high priest); and Michael, whose connection seems to be so close with Jehovah-Messiah on the one hand, and with Israel on the other, naturally uses the same language as his Lord. As Satan (adversary in court) or the Devil (accuser) accuses alike the Church collectively and "the brethren" individually, so Christ pleads for us as our Advocate. Israel's, and all believers' full justification, and the accuser's being rebuked finally, is yet future. JOSEPHUS, Antiquities, 4. 8, states that God hid Moses' body, lest, if it had been exposed to view, it would have been made an idol of. Jude, in this account, either adopts it from the apocryphal "assumption of Moses" (as ORIGEN, concerning Principalities, 3. 2, thinks), or else from the ancient tradition on which that work was founded. Jude, as inspired, could distinguish how much of the tradition was true, how much false. We have no such means of distinguishing, and therefore can be sure of no tradition, save that which is in the written word. 10. (2 Peter 2. 12.) those things which—Greek, "all things whatsoever they understand not," viz., the things of the spiritual world. but what . . . naturally—Connect thus, "Whatever (so the Greek) things naturally (by natural, blind instinct), as the unreasoning (so the Greek) animals, they know," &c. The Greek for the former "know" implies deeper knowledge; the latter "know," the mere perception of the "animal senses and faculties." 11. Woe—Note, 2 Peter 2. 14, "cursed children." Cain—the murderer: the root of whose sin was hatred and envy of the godly, as it is the sin of these seducers. ran greedily—lit., "have been poured forth" like a torrent that has burst its banks. Reckless of what it costs, the loss of God's favour and heaven, and their rush after gain like Balaam. perished in the gainsaying of Core—(Cf. Note, v. 12.) When we read of Korah perishing by gainsaying, we read virtually also of these perishing in like manner through the same: for the same seed bears the same harvest. 13. spots—So 2 Peter 2. 13, Greek, spiloi; but here the Greek is spilades, which elsewhere, in secular writers, means rocks, viz., on which the Christian love-feasts were in danger of being shipwrecked. The oldest MS. prefixes the article emphatically, "THE rocks." The reference to "clouds . . . winds . . . waves of the sea," accords with this image of rocks. Vulgate seems to have been misled by the similar sounding word to translate, as English Version, "spots;" cf. however, v. 23, which favours English Version, if the Greek will bear it. Two oldest MSS., by the transcriber's effort to make Jude say the same as Peter, read here "deceivings" for "love-feasts," but the weightiest MS. and authorities support English Version reading. The love-feast accompanied the Lord's Supper (1 Corinthians 11., end). Korah the Levite, not satisfied with his ministry, aspired to the sacrificing priesthood also: so ministers in the Lord's Supper have sought to make it a sacrifice, and themselves the sacrificing priests, usurping the function of our only Christian sacerdotal Priest, Christ Jesus. Let them beware of Korah's doom! without fear—Join these words not as English Version, but with "feast." Sacred feasts especially ought to be celebrated with fear. Feasting is not faulty in itself [BENGEL], but it needs to be accompanied with fear of forgetting God, as Job in the case of his sons' feasts. feeding themselves—Greek, "pasturing (tending) themselves." What they look to is the pampering of themselves, not the feeding of the flock. clouds—from which one would expect refreshing rains. 2 Peter 2. 17, "wells without water." Professors without practice. carried about—The oldest MSS. have "carried aside," i. e., out of the right course (cf. Ephesians 4. 14). trees whose fruit withereth—rather, "trees of the late (or waning) autumn," viz., when there are no longer leaves or fruits on the trees [BENGEL], &c. without fruit—having no good fruit of knowledge and practice; sometimes used of what is positively bad. twice dead—First when they cast their leaves in autumn, and seem during winter dead, but revive again in spring; secondly, when they are "plucked up by the roots." So these apostates, once dead in unbelief, and then by profession and baptism raised from the death of sin to the life of righteousness, but now having become dead again by apostasy, and so hopelessly dead. There is a climax. Not only without leaves, like trees in late autumn, but without fruit: not only so, but dead twice; and to crown all, "plucked up by the roots." 13. Raging—Wild. Jude has in mind Isaiah 57. 20. shame—plural in Greek, "shames" (cf. Philipians 3. 19). wandering stars—instead of moving on in a regular orbit, as lights to the world, bursting forth on the world like erratic comets, or rather meteors of fire, with a strange glare, and then doomed to fall back again into the blackness of gloom. 14. See Introduction on the source whence Jude derived this prophecy of Enoch. The Holy Spirit, by Jude, has sealed the truth of this much of the matter contained in the book of Enoch, though probably that book, as well as Jude, derived it from tradition (cf. Note, v. 9). There are reasons given by some for thinking the book of Enoch copied from Jude rather than vice versa. It is striking how, from the first, prophecy hastened towards its consummation. The earliest prophecies of the Redeemer dwell on His second coming in glory, rather than His first coming in lowliness (cf. Genesis 3. 15 with Romans 16. 20). Enoch in his translation without death, illustrated that truth which he all his life preached to the unbelieving world, the certainty of the Lord's coming, and the resurrection of the dead, as the only effectual antidote to their skepticism and self-wise confidence in nature's permanence. And—Greek, "Moreover, also Enoch," &c. of these—in relation to these. The reference of his prophecies was not to the antediluvians alone, but to all the ungodly (v. 15). His prophecy applied primarily indeed to the flood, but ultimately to the final judgment. seventh from Adam—Seven is the sacred number. In Enoch, freedom from death and the sacred number are combined: for every seventh object is most highly valued. Jude thus shows the antiquity of the prophecies. Cf. "of old," Note, v. 4. There were only five fathers between Enoch and Adam. The seventh from Adam prophesied the things which shall close the seventh age of the world. [BENGEL.] cometh—lit., "came." Prophecy regards the future as certain as if it were past. saints—Holy angels

(cf. Deuteronomy 33. 2; Daniel 7. 10; Zechariah 14. 5; Matthew 25. 31; Hebrews 12. 22). 15. This verse and the beginning of Enoch's prophecy is composed in Hebrew poetic parallelism, the oldest specimen extant. Some think Lamech's speech, which is also in poetic parallelism, was composed in mockery of Enoch's prophecy: as Enoch foretold Jehovah's coming to judgment, so Lamech presumes on impunity in polygamy and murder (just as Cain the murderer seemed to escape with impunity). convince—convict. hard speeches—such as are noticed in v. 8, 10, 16; Malachi 3. 13, 14; contrast 16. 17. ungodly sinners—not merely sinners, but proud despisers of God: impious. against him—They who speak against God's children are regarded by God as speaking against Himself. 16. murmurers—in secret: muttering murmurs against God's ordinances and ministers in Church and state. Cf. v. 8, "speak evil of dignities;" 15, "hard speeches;" against the Lord. complainers—never satisfied with their lot (Numbers 11. 1; cf. the penalty, Deuteronomy 28. 47, 48). walking after their own lusts—(v. 18.) The secret of their murmuring and complaining is the restless insatiability of their desires. great swelling words—(2 Peter 2. 18.) men's persons—their mere outward appearance and rank. because of advantage—for the sake of what they may gain from them. While they talk great swelling words, they are really mean and fawning towards those of wealth and rank. 17. But ye, beloved—in contrast to those reprobates, v. 20, again. remember—Implying that his readers had been contemporaries of the apostles. For Peter uses the very same formula in reminding the contemporaries of himself and the other apostles. spoken before—spoken already before now. the apostles—Peter (Notes, 2 Peter 3. 2, 3), and Paul before Peter (Acts 20. 29; 1 Timothy 4. 1; 2 Timothy 3. 1). Jude does not exclude himself from the number of the apostles here, for in v. 18, immediately after, he says, "they told you," not us (rather as Greek, "used to tell you:)" implying that Jude's readers were contemporaries of the apostles, who used to tell them. 18. mockers—In the parallel, 2 Peter 3. 3, the same Greek is translated "scorners." The word is found nowhere else in the New Testament. How ALFORD can deny that 2 Peter 3. 2, 3 is referred to (at least in part), I cannot imagine, seeing that Jude quotes the very words of Peter as the words which the apostles used to speak to his (Jude's) readers. walk after their own ungodly lusts—lit., "after (according to) their own lusts of ungodliness." 19. These be they—Showing that their characters are such as Peter and Paul had foretold. separate themselves—from Church communion in its vital, spiritual reality: for outwardly they took part in Church ordinances (v. 12). Some oldest MSS. omit "themselves;" then understand it, "separate," cast out members of the Church by excommunication (Isaiah 65. 5; 66. 5; Luke 6. 22; John 9. 34; cf. "casteth them out of the Church," 3 John 10). Many, however, understand "themselves," which indeed is read in some of the oldest MSS. as English Version has it. Arrogant setting up of themselves, as having greater sanctity and a wisdom and peculiar doctrine, distinct from others, is implied. sensual—lit., "animal-souled;" as opposed to the spiritual, or "having the Spirit." It is translated "the natural man," 1 Corinthians 2. 14. In the threefold division of man's being, body, soul, and spirit, the due state in God's design is, that "the spirit," which is the recipient of the Holy Spirit uniting man to God, should be first, and should rule the soul, which stands intermediate between the body and spirit; but in the animal, or natural man, the spirit is sunk into subserviency to the animal soul, which is earthly in its motives and aims. The "carnal" sink somewhat lower, for in these the flesh, the lowest element and corrupt side of man's bodily nature, reigns paramount. having not the Spirit—In the animal and natural man the spirit, his higher part, which ought to be the receiver of the Holy Spirit, is not so; and therefore, his spirit not being in its normal state, he is said not to have the spirit (cf. John 3. 5, 6). In the completion of redemption the parts of redeemed man shall be placed in their due relation: whereas in the ungodly, the soul severed from the spirit shall have for ever animal life without union to God and heaven—a living death. 20. Resuming v. 17. building up yourselves—the opposite to the “separate themselves” (v. 19): as “in the Holy Ghost” is opposed to “Having not the Spirit,” on—as on a foundation. Building on the FAITH is equivalent to building on Christ, the object of faith. praying in the Holy Ghost—(Romans 8. 26; Ephesians 6. 18.) The Holy Spirit teaches what we are to pray for, and how. None can pray aright save by being in the Spirit, i. e., in the element of His influence. CHRYSOSTOM states that, among the charisms bestowed at the beginning of the New Testament dispensation, was the gift of prayer, bestowed on some one who prayed in the name of the rest, and taught others to pray. Moreover, their prayers so conceived and often used, were received and preserved among Christians, and out of them forms of prayer were framed. Such is the origin of liturgies. [HAMMOND.] 21. In v. 20, 21, Jude combines the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost: and faith, hope and love. Keep yourselves—not in your own strength, but “in the love of God,” i. e., God's love to you and all His believing children, the only guarantee for their being kept safe. Man's need of watching is implied; at the same time he cannot keep himself, unless God in His love keep him. looking for—in hope, the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ—to be fully manifested at His coming. Mercy is usually attributed to the Father: here to the Son; so entirely one are they. 22, 23. None but those who “keep themselves” are likely to “save” others. have compassion—So one oldest MS. reads. But two oldest MSS., Vulgate, &c., read, “convict;” “reprove to their conviction;” “confute, so as to convince.” making a difference—The oldest MSS. and versions read the accusative for the nominative, “when separating themselves” [WAHL], referring to v. 19; or “when contending with you,” as the Greek is translated, v. 9. 23. save with fear—The oldest MSS. do not read “with fear” in this position: but after “snatching them out of the fire” (with which, cf. Amos 4. 11; 1 Corinthians 3. 15; Zechariah 3. 2, said of a most narrow escape), they add the following words, forming a THIRD class, “and others compassionate with (IN) fear.” Three kinds of patients require three kinds of medical treatment. Ministers and Christians are said to “save” those whom they are made the instruments of saving; the Greek for “save” is present, therefore meaning “try to save.” Jude already (v. 9) had reference to the same passage (Zechariah 3. 1-3). The three classes are: (1.) Those who contend with you (accusative in oldest MSS.), whom you should convict; (2.) those who are as brands already in the fire, of which hell-fire is the consummation: these you should try to save by snatching them out; (3.) those who are objects of compassion, whom accordingly you should compassionate (and help if occasion should offer), but at the same time not let pity degenerate into connivance at their error. Your compassion is to be accompanied “with fear” of being at all defiled by them. hating—Even hatred has its legitimate field of exercise. Sin is the only thing which God hates: so ought we. even the garment—a proverbial phrase: avoiding the most remote contact with sin, and hating that which borders on it. As garments of the apostles wrought miracles of good in healing, so the very garment of sinners metaphorically, i. e., anything brought into contact with their pollution, is to be avoided. Cf. as to lepers and other persons defiled, Leviticus 13. 52-57; 15. 4-17: the garments were held polluted; and any one touching them was excluded, until purified, from religious and civil communion with the sanctified people of Israel. Christians who received at baptism the white garment in token of purity, are not to defile it by any approach to what is defiled. 24, 25. Concluding doxology. Now—Greek, “But,” you—ALFORD, on inferior authority, reads, “them.” You is in contradistinction to those ungodly men mentioned above. keep . . . from falling—rather, “guard . . . (so as to be) without falling,” or stumbling. before the presence of his glory—i. e., before Himself, when He shall be revealed in glory. faultless—Greek, “blameless,” with exceeding joy—lit., “with exultation” as of those who leap for joy. To the only . . . God our Saviour—The oldest MSS. add, “through Jesus Christ our Lord.” The transcribers, fancying that “Saviour” applied to Christ alone, omitted the words. The sense is, To the only God (the Father) who is our Saviour through (i. e., by the mediation of) Jesus Christ our Lord. dominion—Greek, “might,” power—authority: legitimate power. The oldest MSS. and Vulgate, after “power,” have “before all the age,” i. e., before all time as to the past; “and now,” as to the present; “and to all the ages,” i. e., for ever, as to the time to come.

OF ST. JOHN THE DIVINE.

INTRODUCTION.

AUTHENTICITY.—The author calls himself John (ch. 1. 1, 4, 9; 22. 8). JUSTIN MARTYR (Dialogue, p. 308, A. D. 139-161) quotes from the Apocalypse, as John the apostle's work, the prophecy of the millennium of the saints, to be followed by the general resurrection and judgment. This testimony of Justin is referred to also by EUSEBIUS, Ecclesiastical History 4. 18. JUSTIN, in the early part of the second century, held his controversy with Trypho, a learned Jew, at Ephesus, where John had been living thirty or thirty-five years before; he says that “the Revelation had been given to John, one of the twelve apostles of Christ.” MELITO, bishop of Sardis (about 171 A. D.), one of the seven churches addressed, a successor, therefore, of one of the seven angels, is said by EUSEBIUS (Ecclesiastical History 4. 26) to have written treatises on the Apocalypse of John. The testimony of the bishop of Sardis is the more impartial, as Sardis is one of the churches severely reprov'd (ch. 3. 1). So also THEOPHILUS of ANTIOCH (about 180 A. D.), according to EUSEBIUS 4. 26, quoted testimonies from the Apocalypses of John. EUSEBIUS says the same of Apollonius, who lived in Asia Minor in the end of the second century. IRENEUS (about 180 A. D.), a hearer of Polycarp, the disciple of John, and supposed by ARCHBISHOP USHER to be the angel of the Church of Smyrna, is most decidedly again and again in quoting the Apocalypse as the work of the apostle John (Hæreses 4., 20. 11; 4., 21. 3; 4., 30. 4; 5., 36. 1; 5., 30. 3; 5., 35. 2). In 5., 30. 1, alluding to the mystical number of the beast, 666 (ch. 13. 18), found in all old copies, he says, “We do not hazard a confident theory as to the name of Antichrist; for if it had been necessary that his name should be proclaimed openly at the present time, it would have been declared by him who saw the apocalyptic vision; for it was seen at no long time back, but almost in our generation, towards the end of Domitian's reign.” In his work against heresies, published ten years after Polycarp's martyrdom, he quotes the Apocalypse twenty times, and makes long extracts from it, as inspired Scripture. These testimonies of persons contemporary with John's immediate successors, and more or less connected with the region of the seven churches to which Revelation is addressed, are most convincing. TERTULLIAN, of North Africa (about 220 A. D.), Adversus Marcion 3, 14, quotes the apostle John's description in the Apocalypse of the sword proceeding out of the Lord's mouth (ch. 19, 15), and 24, the heavenly city (ch. 21). Cf. De Resurrectione 27; De Anima 8, 9, &c.; De Præscriptione Hæreticorum 83. The MURATORI fragment of the canon (about A. D. 200) refers to John the apostle writing to the seven churches. HIPPOLYTUS, bishop of Ostia, near Rome (about 240 A. D.), De Antichristo, p. 67, quotes ch. 17, 1-18, as the writing of John the apostle. Among Hippolytus' works, there is specified in the catalogue on his statue, a treatise "on the Apocalypse and Gospel according to John." CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA (about 200 A. D.), Stromata 6, 13, alludes to the twenty-four seats on which the elders sit as mentioned by John in the Apocalypse (ch. 4, 5); also, in Quis dives Salvus, sec. 42, he mentions John's return from Patmos to Ephesus on the death of the Roman tyrant. ORIGEN (about 233 A. D.), Commentary on Matthew, in EUSEBIUS (Ecclesiastical History 6, 25), mentions John as the author of the Apocalypse, without expressing any doubts as to its authenticity; also, in Commentary on Matthew, tom. 16, 6, he quotes ch. 1, 9, and says, "John seems to have beheld the Apocalypse in the island of Patmos." VICTORINUS, bishop of Pettau in Pannonia, who suffered martyrdom under Diocletian in 303 A. D., wrote the earliest extant commentary on the Apocalypse. Though the Old Syriac Peschito version does not contain the Apocalypse, yet EPHREM SYRUS (about 378 A. D.) frequently quotes the Apocalypse as canonical, and ascribes it to John.

Its canonicity and inspiration (according to a scholium of ANDREAS OF CAPPADOCIA) are attested by PAPIAS, a hearer of John, and associate of POLYCARP. PAPIAS was bishop of Hierapolis, near Laodicea, one of the seven churches. WORDSWORTH conjectures that a feeling of shame, on account of the rebukes of Laodicea in Revelation, may have operated on the Council of Laodicea, so as to omit Revelation from its list of books to be read publicly. (?) The Epistle of the churches of Lyons and Vienne to the churches of Asia and Phrygia (in EUSEBIUS, Ecclesiastical History 5, 1-3), in the persecution under M. Aurelius, A. D. 177, quotes ch. 1, 5; 3, 14; 14, 4, and 22, 11, as Scripture. CYPRIAN (about 250 A. D.) also, in Ep. 13, quotes ch. 2, 5 as Scripture; and in Ep. 25 he quotes ch. 3, 21, as of the same authority as the Gospel. (For other instances, see ALFORD'S Prolegomena, from whom mainly this summary of evidence has been derived.) ATHANASIUS, in his Festival Epistle, enumerates the Apocalypse among the canonical Scriptures, to which none must add, and from which none must take away. JEROME (in Epistola ad Paulinum) includes in the canon the Apocalypse, adding, "It has as many mysteries as words. All praise falls short of its merits. In each of its words lie hid manifold senses." Thus an unbroken chain of testimony down from the apostolic period confirms its canonicity and authenticity.

The ALOGI (Epiphanius Hæreses 51), and CAIUS the Roman presbyter (EUSEBIUS 3, 28), towards the end of the second and beginning of the third century, rejected St. John's Apocalypse on mere captious grounds. CAIUS, according to JEROME, De Viris Illustribus, about 210 A. D., attributed it to Cerinthus, on the ground of its supporting the millennial reign on earth. DIONYSIUS OF ALEXANDRIA mentions many before his time who rejected it because of its obscurity, and because it seemed to support Cerinthus' dogma of an earthly and carnal kingdom; whence they attributed it to Cerinthus. This DIONYSIUS, scholar of ORIGEN, and bishop of Alexandria (A. D. 247), admits its inspiration (in EUSEBIUS, Ecclesiastical History 7, 10), but attributes it to some John distinct from John the apostle, on the ground of its difference of style and character, as compared with St. John's Gospel and Epistle, as also because the name John is several times mentioned in the Apocalypse, which is always kept back in both the Gospel and Epistle; moreover, neither does the Epistle make any allusion to the Apocalypse, nor the Apocalypse to the Epistle; and the style is not pure Greek, but abounds in barbarisms and solecisms. EUSEBIUS wavers in opinion (Ecclesiastical History 24, 39) as to whether it is, or is not, to be ranked among the undoubtedly canonical Scriptures. His antipathy to the millennial doctrine would give an unconscious bias to his judgment on the Apocalypse. CYRIL OF JERUSALEM (A. D. 386), Catechesis 4, 35, 36, omits the Apocalypse in enumerating the New Testament Scriptures to be read privately as well as publicly. "Whatever is not read in the churches, that do not even read by thyself; the apostles and ancient bishops of the Church who transmitted them to us were far wiser than thou art." Hence, we see that, in his day, the Apocalypse was not read in the churches. Yet in Catechesis 1, 4 he quotes ch. 2, 7, 17; and in Catechesis 1, 15, 13 he draws the prophetic statement from ch. 17, 11, that the king who is to humble the three kings (Daniel 7, 8, 20) is the eighth king. In c. 15, and 27, he similarly quotes from ch. 12, 3, 4. ALFORD conjectures that CYRIL had at some time changed his opinion, and that these references to the Apocalypse were slips of memory whereby he retained phraseology which belonged to his former, not his subsequent views. The sixtieth canon (if genuine) of the Laodicean Council in the middle of the fourth century omits the Apocalypse from the canonical books. The Eastern Church in part doubted, the Western Church, after the fifth century, universally recognized, the Apocalypse. CYRIL OF ALEXANDRIA, De Adoratione 146, though implying the fact of some doubting its genuineness, himself undoubtedly accepts it as the work of St. John. ANDREAS OF CÆSAREA, in Cappadocia, recognized as genuine and canonical, and wrote the first entire and connected commentary on, the Apocalypse. The sources of doubt seem to have been, (1.) the antagonism of many to the millennium, which is set forth in it; (2.) its obscurity and symbolism having caused it not to be read in the churches, or to be taught to the young. But the most primitive tradition is unequivocal in its favour. In a word, the objective evidence is decidedly for it; the only arguments against it seem to have been subjective.

The personal notices of John in the Apocalypse occur ch. 1, 1, 4, 9; 22, 8. Moreover, the writer's addresses to the churches of Proconsular Asia (ch. 2, 1) accord with the concurrent tradition, that after John's return from his exile in Patmos, at the death of DOMITIAN, under Nerva, he resided for long, and died at last in Ephesus, in the time of Trajan (EUSEBIUS, Ecclesiastical History 3, 20, 23). If the Apocalypse were not the inspired work of John, purporting as it does to be an address from their superior to the seven churches of Proconsular Asia, it would have assuredly been rejected in that region; whereas the earliest testimonies in those churches are all in its favour. One person alone was entitled to use language of authority such as is addressed to the seven angels of the churches—namely, John, as the last surviving apostle and superintendent of all the churches. Also, it accords with John's manner to assert the accuracy of his testimony both at the beginning and end of his book (cf. ch. 1, 2, 3, and 22, 8, with John 1, 14; 21, 24; 1 John 1, 1, 2). Again, it accords with the view of the writer being an inspired apostle that he addresses the angels or presidents of the several churches in the tone of a superior addressing inferiors. Also, he commends the Church of Ephesus for trying and convicting "them which say they are apostles, and are not," by which he implies his own undoubted claim to apostolic inspiration (ch. 2, 2), as declaring in the seven epistles Christ's will revealed through him.

As to the difference of style, as compared with the Gospel and Epistle, the difference of subject in part accounts for it, the visions of the seer, transported as he was above the region of sense, appropriately taking a form of expression abrupt, and unbound by the grammatical laws which governed his writings of a calmer and more deliberate character.

Moreover, as being a Galilean Hebrew, John, in writing a Revelation akin to the Old Testament prophecies, naturally reverted to their Hebraistic style. ALFORD notices, among the features of resemblance between the styles of the Apocalypse and John's Gospel and Epistle, (1.) the characteristic appellation of our Lord, peculiar to John exclusively, "the Word of God" (ch. 19. 13; cf. John 1, 1; 1 John 1. 1). (2.) the phrase, "he that overcometh" (ch. 2, 7, 11, 17; 3, 5, 12, 21; 12, 11; 15, 2; 17, 14; 21, 7; cf. John 16. 33; 1 John 2, 13, 14; 4, 4; 5, 4, 5). (3.) The Greek term (alēthinos) for "true," as opposed to that which is shadowy and unreal (ch. 3, 7, 14; 6, 10; 15, 3; 16, 7; 19, 2, 9, 11; 21, 5; 22, 6). This term, found only once in St. Luke (Luke 16, 11), four times in St. Paul (1 Thessalonians 1, 9; Hebrews 8, 2; 9, 24; 10, 22), is found nine times in St. John's Gospel (John 1, 9; 4, 23, 37; 6, 32; 7, 23; 8, 16; 15, 1; 17, 3; 19, 35), four times in John's First Epistle (1 John 2, 8; 5, 20), and ten times in Revelation (ch. 3, 7, 14; 6, 10; 15, 3; 16, 7; 19, 2, 9, 11; 21, 5; 22, 6). (4.) The Greek diminutive for "Lamb" (arnion, lit., "lambkin") occurs twenty-nine times in the Apocalypse, and the only other place where it occurs is John 21, 15. In John's writings alone is Christ called directly "the Lamb" (John 1, 29, 36). In 1 Peter 1, 19, He is called "as a lamb without blemish," in allusion to Isaiah 53, 7. So the use of "witness," or "testimony" (ch. 1, 2, 9; 6, 9; 11, 7, &c.; cf. John 1, 7, 8, 15, 19, 32; 1 John 1, 2; 4, 14; 5, 6-11). "Keep the word," or "commandments" (ch. 3, 8, 10; 12, 17, &c.; cf. John 8, 51, 55; 14, 15). The assertion of the same thing positively and negatively (ch. 2, 2, 6, 8, 13; 3, 8, 17, 18; cf. John 1, 3, 6, 7, 20; 1 John 2, 27, 28). Cf. also 1 John 2, 20, 27 with ch. 3, 18, as to the spiritual anointing. The seeming solecisms of style are attributable to that inspired elevation which is above mere grammatical rules, and are designed to arrest the reader's attention by the peculiarity of the phrase, so as to pause and search into some deep truth lying beneath. The vivid earnestness of the inspired writer, handling a subject so transcending all others, raises him above all servile adherence to ordinary rules, so that at times he abruptly passes from one grammatical construction to another, as he graphically sets the thing described before the eye of the reader. This is not due to ignorance of grammar, for he "has displayed a knowledge of grammatical rules in other much more difficult constructions." [WINEK.] The connection of thought is more attended to than mere grammatical connection. Another consideration to be taken into account is, that two-fifths of the whole being the recorded language of others, he moulds his style accordingly. Cf. TREGELLES' Introduction to Revelation from Heathen Authorities.

TREGELLES well says (New Testament Historic Evidence), "There is no book of the New Testament for which we have such clear, ample, and numerous testimonies in the second century as we have in favour of the Apocalypse. The more closely the witnesses were connected with the apostle John (as was the case with Irenæus), the more explicit is their testimony. That doubts should prevail in after ages must have originated either in ignorance of the earlier testimony, or else from some supposed intimation of what an apostle ought to have written. The objections on the ground of internal style can weigh nothing against the actual evidence. It is in vain to argue, a priori, that St. John could not have written this book, when we have the evidence of several competent witnesses that he did write it."

RELATION OF THE APOCALYPSE TO THE REST OF THE CANON.—GREGORY NYSSEN, tom. 3, p. 601, calls Revelation "the last book of grace." It completes the volume of inspiration, so that we are to look for no further revelation till Christ Himself shall come. Appropriately the last book completing the canon was written by John, the last survivor of the apostles. The New Testament is composed of the historical books, the Gospels and Acts, the doctrinal Epistles, and the one prophetic book, Revelation. The same apostle wrote the last of the Gospels, and probably the last of the Epistles, and the only prophetic book of the New Testament. All the books of the New Testament had been written, and were read in the Church assemblies, some years before John's death. His life was providentially prolonged that he might give the final attestation to Scripture. About the year 100 A. D., the bishops of Asia (the angels of the seven churches) came to John at EPHEBUS, bringing him copies of the three Gospels, Matthew, Mark, and Luke, and desired of him a statement of his apostolical judgment concerning them; whereupon he pronounced them authentic, genuine, and inspired, and at their request added his own Gospel to complete the fourfold aspect of the Gospel of Christ (cf. MURATORI'S Canon; EUSEBIUS 3, 24; JEROME, Proœmium in Mattheum; VICTORINUS on the Apocalypse; THEODORET, Mopsuestia). A Greek divine, quoted in ALLATIUS, calls Revelation "the seal of the whole Bible." The canon would be incomplete without Revelation. Scripture is a complete whole, its component books, written in a period ranging over 1500 years, being mutually connected. Unity of aim and spirit pervades the entire, so that the end is the necessary sequence of the middle, and the middle of the beginning. Genesis presents before us man and his bride in innocence and blessedness, followed by man's fall through Satan's subtlety, and man's consequent misery, his exclusion from Paradise and its tree of life and delightful rivers. Revelation presents, in reverse order, man first liable to sin and death, but afterwards made conqueror through the blood of the Lamb; the first Adam and Eve, represented by the second Adam, Christ, and the Church, His spotless bride, in Paradise, with free access to the tree of life and the crystal water of life that flows from the throne of God. As Genesis foretold the bruising of the serpent's head by the woman's seed, so Revelation declares the final accomplishment of that prediction (chs. 19., 20).

PLACE AND TIME OF WRITING.—The best authorities among the Fathers state that John was exiled under Domitian (IRENÆUS, 5, 30; CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA; EUSEBIUS, Ecclesiastical History 3, 20). VICTORINUS says that he had to labour in the mines of Patmos. At Domitian's death, 95 A. D., he returned to Ephesus under the Emperor Nerva. Probably it was immediately after his return that he wrote, under Divine Inspiration, the account of the visions vouchsafed to him in Patmos (ch. 1, 2, 9). However, ch. 10, 4 seems to imply that he wrote the visions immediately after seeing them. Patmos is one of the Sporades. Its circumference is about thirty miles. "It was fitting that when forbidden to go beyond certain bounds of the earth's lands, he was permitted to penetrate the secrets of heaven." [BEDE, Explan. Apocalypse on ch. 1.] The following arguments favour an earlier date, viz., under Nero: (1.) EUSEBIUS (in Evangelical Demonstrations) unites in the same sentence John's banishment with the stoning of James and the beheading of Paul, which were under Nero. (2.) CLEMENS ALEXANDRINUS' story of the robber reclaimed by John, after he had pursued, and with difficulty overtaken him, accords better with John then being a younger man than under Domitian, when he was 100 years old. ARETHAS, in the sixth century, applies the sixth seal to the destruction of Jerusalem (70 A. D.), adding that the Apocalypse was written before that event. So the Syriac version states he was banished by Nero the Cæsar. Laodicea was overthrown by an earthquake 60 A. D., but was immediately rebuilt, so that its being called "rich and increased with goods" is not incompatible with this book having been written under the Neronian persecution (64 A. D.). But the possible allusions to it in Hebrews 10, 37; cf. ch. 1, 4, 8; 4, 8; 22, 12; Hebrews 11, 10; cf. ch. 21, 14; Hebrews 12, 22, 23; cf. ch. 14, 1; Hebrews 8, 1, 2; cf. ch. 11, 19; 15, 5; 21, 3; Hebrews 4, 12; cf. ch. 1, 16; 2, 12, 16; 19, 13, 15; Hebrews 4, 9; cf. ch. 20; also 1 Peter 1, 7, 13; 4, 13, with ch. 1, 1; 1 Peter 2, 9, with ch. 5, 10; 2 Timothy 4, 8, with ch. 2, 26, 27; 3, 21; 11, 18; Ephesians 6, 12, with ch. 12, 7-12; Philippians 4, 3, with ch. 3, 5; 13, 8; 17, 8; 20.

12, 15; Colossians 1. 13, with ch. 1. 5; 1 Corinthians 15. 52, with ch. 10. 7; 11. 15-18, make a date before the destruction of Laodicea possible. Cerinthus is stated to have died before John: as then he borrowed much in his Pseudo-Apocalypse from John's, it is likely the latter was at an earlier date than Domitian's reign. See TILLOCH'S Introduction to Apocalypse. But the Pauline benediction (ch. 1. 4) implies it was written after Paul's death under Nero.

TO WHAT READERS ADDRESSED.—The inscription states that it is addressed to the seven churches of Asia, i. e., Proconsular Asia. St. John's reason for fixing on the number seven (for there were more than seven churches in the region meant by "Asia," for instance, Magnesia and Tralles) was doubtless because seven is the sacred number implying totality and universality: so it is implied that John, through the medium of the seven churches, addresses in the Spirit the Church of all places and ages. The Church in its various states of spiritual life or deadness, in all ages and places, is represented by the seven churches, and is addressed with words of consolation or warning accordingly. Smyrna and Philadelphia alone of the seven are honoured with unmixed praise, as faithful in tribulation and rich in good works. Heresies of a decided kind had by this time arisen in the churches of Asia, and the love of many had waxed cold, whilst others had advanced to greater zeal, and one had sealed his testimony with his blood.

OBJECT.—It begins with admonitory addresses to the seven churches from the Divine Son of man, whom John saw in vision, after a brief introduction which sets forth the main subject of the book, viz., to "show unto His servants things which must shortly come to pass" (chs. 1.-3). From ch. 4. to the end is mainly prophecy, with practical exhortations and consolations, however, interspersed, similar to those addressed to the seven churches (the representatives of the universal Church of every age), and so connecting the body of the book with its beginning, which therefore forms its appropriate introduction.

Three schools of interpreters exist: (1.) The Preterists, who hold that almost the whole has been fulfilled. (2.) The Historical Interpreters, who hold that it comprises the history of the Church from St. John's time to the end of the world, the seals being chronologically succeeded by the trumpets, and the trumpets by the vials. (3.) The Futurists, who consider almost the whole as yet future, and to be fulfilled immediately before Christ's second coming. The first theory was not held by any of the earliest Fathers, and is only held now by Rationalists, who limit John's vision to things within his own horizon, Pagan Rome's persecutions of Christians, and its consequently anticipated destruction. The Futurist school is open to this great objection: it would leave the Church of Christ unprotected with prophetic guidance or support under her fiery trials for 1700 or 1800 years. Now God has said, "Surely He will do nothing, but He revealeth His secrets unto His servants the prophets." The Jews had a succession of prophets who guided them with the light of prophecy: what their prophets were to them, that the apocalyptic Scriptures have been, and are, to us.

ALFORD, following ISAAC WILLIAMS, draws attention to the parallel connection between the Apocalypse and Christ's discourse on the Mount of Olives, recorded in Matthew 24. The seals plainly bring us down to the second coming of Christ, just as the trumpets also do (cf. ch. 6. 12-17; 8. 1, &c.; 11. 15), and as the vials also do (ch. 16. 17): all three run parallel, and end in the same point. Certain "catchwords" (as WORDSWORTH calls them) connect the three series of symbols together. They do not succeed one to the other in historical and chronological sequence, but move side by side, the subsequent series filling up in detail the same picture which the preceding series had drawn in outline. So VICTORINUS (on ch. 7. 2), the earliest commentator on the Apocalypse, says, "The order of the things said is not to be regarded, since often the Holy Spirit, when He has run to the end of the last time, again returns to the same times, and supplies what He has less fully expressed." And PRIMASIVS (Ad Apocalypsin in fine), "In the trumpets he gives a description by a pleasing repetition, as is his custom."

At the very beginning, St. John hastens, by anticipation (as was the tendency of all the prophets), to the grand consummation. Ch. 1. 7, "Behold, He cometh with clouds," &c.; v. 8, 17, "I am the beginning and the ending—the first and the last." So the seven epistles exhibit the same anticipation of the end. Ch. 3. 12, "Him that overcometh, I will write upon Him the name of my God, and the name of the city of my God, which is new Jerusalem, which cometh down out of heaven:" cf. at the close, ch. 21. 2. So also ch. 2. 28, "I will give him the morning star:" cf. at the close, 22. 16, "I am the bright and morning star."

Again, the earthquake that ensues on the opening of the sixth seal is one of the catchwords, i. e., a link connecting chronologically this sixth seal with the sixth trumpet (ch. 9. 13; 11. 13): cf. also the seventh vial, ch. 16. 17, 18. The concomitants of the opening of the sixth seal, it is plain, in no full and exhaustive sense apply to any event, save the terrors which shall overwhelm the ungodly just before the coming of the Judge.

Again, the beast out of the bottomless pit, between the sixth and seventh trumpets, connects this series with the section, chs. 12., 13., 14., concerning the Church and her adversaries.

Again, the sealing of the 144,000 under the sixth seal connects this seal with the section, chs. 12.-14.

Again, the loosing of the four winds by the four angels standing on the four corners of the earth, under the sixth seal, answers to the loosing of the four angels at the Euphrates, under the sixth trumpet.

Moreover, links occur in the Apocalypse connecting it with the Old Testament. For instance, the "mouth speaking great things," connects the beast that blasphemeth against God, and makes war against the saints, with the little horn, or at last king, who, arising after the ten kings, shall speak against the Most High, and wear out the saints; also, cf. the "forty-two months" (ch. 13. 5), or "a thousand two hundred and threescore days" (ch. 12. 6), with the "time, times, and the dividing of time," of Daniel 7. 25. "Moreover, the "forty-two months," ch. 11. 2, answering to ch. 12. 6 and 13. 5, link together the period under the sixth trumpet to the section, chs. 12., 13., 14.

AUBERLEN observes, "The history of salvation is mysteriously governed by holy numbers. They are the scaffolding of the organic edifice. They are not merely outward indications of time, but indications of nature and essence. Not only nature, but history, is based in numbers. Scripture and antiquity put numbers as the fundamental forms of things, where we put ideas." As number is the regulator of the relations and proportions of the natural world, so does it enter most frequently into the revelations of the Apocalypse, which sets forth the harmonies of the supernatural, the immediately Divine. Thus the most supernatural revelation leads us the farthest into the natural, as was to be expected, seeing the God of nature and of revelation is one. Seven is the number for perfection (cf. ch. 1. 4; 4. 5, the seven Spirits before the throne; also, ch. 5. 6, the Lamb's seven horns and seven eyes). Thus the seven churches represent the Church catholic in its totality. The seven seals—trumpets—vials, are severally a complete series each in itself, fulfilling perfectly the Divine course of judgments. Three and a half implies a number opposed to the Divine (seven), but broken in itself, and which, in the moment of its highest triumph, is overwhelmed by judgment and utter ruin. Four is the number of the world's extension; seven is the number of God's revelation in the world. In the four beasts of Daniel there is a recognition of some power above them, at the same time that there is a mimicry of the four cherubs of Ezekiel, the heavenly symbols of all creation in its due subjection to God (ch. 4. 6-8). So the four corners of the earth, the four winds, the four angels loosed from the Euphrates, and Jerusalem lying "four-square," represent world-wide extension. The sevenfoldness of the Spirits on the part of God corresponds with the fourfold cherubim on the part of the created. John, seeing more deeply into the essentially God-opposed character of the world, presents to us, not the four beasts of Daniel, but the seven heads of the beast, whereby it arrogates to itself the sevenfold perfection of the Spirits of God; at the same time that, with characteristic self-contradiction, it has ten horns, the number peculiar to the world-power. Its unjust usurpation of the sacred number seven is marked by the addition of an eighth to the seven heads, and also by the beast's own number, 666, which in units, tens, and hundreds, verges upon, but falls short of, seven. The judgments on the world are complete in six: after the sixth seal and the sixth trumpet, there is a pause. When seven comes, there comes "the kingdom of our Lord and His Christ." Six is the number of the world given to judgment. Moreover, six is half of twelve, as three and a half is the half of seven. Twelve is the number of the Church: of the twelve tribes of Israel, the twelve stars on the woman's head (ch. 12. 1), the twelve gates of new Jerusalem. Six thus symbolizes the world broken, and without solid foundation. Twice twelve is the number of the heavenly elders; twelve times twelve thousand the number of the sealed elect: the tree of life yields twelve manner of fruits. Doubtless, besides this symbolic force, there is a special chronological meaning in the numbers; but as yet, though a commanded subject of investigation, they have received no solution which we can be sure is the true one. They are intended to stimulate reverent inquiry, not to gratify idle speculative curiosity; and when the event shall have been fulfilled, they will show the Divine wisdom of God, who ordered all things in minutely harmonious relations, and left neither the times nor the ways to hap-hazard.

The arguments for the year-day theory are as follows: Daniel 9. 24, "Seventy weeks are determined upon," where the Hebrew may be seventy sevens; but Mede observes, the Hebrew word means always seven of days, and never seven of years (Leviticus 12. 5; Deuteronomy 16. 9, 10, 16). Again, the number of years' wandering of the Israelites was made to correspond to the number of days in which the spies searched the land, viz., forty; cf. "each day for a year," Numbers 14. 33, 34. So in Ezekiel 4. 5, 6, "I have laid upon thee the years of their iniquity, according to the number of the days, three hundred and ninety days . . . forty days: I have appointed thee each day for a year." St. John, in Revelation itself, uses days in a sense which can hardly be literal. Ch. 2. 10, "Ye shall have tribulation ten days;" the persecution of ten years recorded by EUSEBIUS seems to correspond to it. In the year-day theory there is still quite enough of obscurity to exercise the patience and probation of faith, for we cannot say precisely when the 1260 years begin: so that this theory is quite compatible with Christ's words, "Of that day and hour knoweth no man," &c. However, it is a difficulty in this theory that "a thousand years," in ch. 20. 6, 7, can hardly mean 1000 by 360 days, i. e., 360,000 years. The first resurrection there must be literal, even as v. 5 must be taken literally, "the rest of the dead lived not again until the thousand years were finished." To interpret the former spiritually would entail the need of interpreting the latter so, which would be most improbable; for it would imply that the rest of the (spiritually) dead lived not spiritually until the end of the thousand years, and then that they did come spiritually to life. 1 Corinthians 15. 23, "they that are Christ's at His coming," confirms the literal view.

CHAPTER I.

Ver. 1-20. TITLE: SOURCE AND OBJECT OF THIS REVELATION: BLESSING ON THE READER AND KEEPER OF IT, AS THE TIME IS NEAR: INSCRIPTION TO THE SEVEN CHURCHES: APOSTOLIC GREETING: KEY-NOTE, "BEHOLD HE COMETH" (cf. at the close, ch. 22. 20, "Surely I come quickly"); INTRODUCTORY VISION OF THE SON OF MAN IN GLORY, AMIDST THE SEVEN CANDLESTICKS, WITH SEVEN STARS IN HIS RIGHT HAND. 1. Revelation—An apocalypse or unveiling of those things which had been veiled. A manifesto of the kingdom of Christ. The travelling manual of the Church for the Gentile Christian times. Not a detailed history of the future, but a representation of the great epochs and chief powers in developing the kingdom of God in relation to the world. The Church-historical view goes counter to the great principle, that Scripture interprets itself. Revelation is to teach us to understand the times, not the times to interpret to us the Apocalypse, although it is in the nature of the case that a reflex influence is exerted here and is understood by the prudent. [AUBERLEN.] The book is in a series of parallel groups, not in chronological succession. Still there is an organic historical development of the kingdom of God. In this book all the other books of the Bible end and meet: in it is the consummation of all previous prophecy. Daniel foretells as to Christ and the Roman destruction of Jerusalem, and the last Antichrist. But John's Revelation fills up the intermediate period, and describes the millennium and final state beyond Antichrist. Daniel, as a godly statesman, views the history of God's people in relation to the four world-kingsdoms. John, as an apostle, views history from the Christian Church aspect. The term Apocalypse is applied to no Old Testament book. Daniel is the nearest approach to it; but what Daniel was told to seal and shut up till the time of the end, St. John, now that the time is at hand (v. 3), is directed to reveal. of Jesus Christ—coming from Him. Jesus Christ, not John the writer, is the Author of the Apocalypse. Christ taught many things before His departure; but those which were unsuitable for announcement at that time He brought together into the Apocalypse. [BENGEL.] Cf. His promise, John 15. 15, "All things that I have heard of my Father, I have made known unto you;" also, John 16. 13, "The Spirit of truth will show you things to come." The Gospels and Acts are the books, respectively, of His first advent, in the flesh, and in the Spirit; the Epistles are the inspired comment on them. The Apocalypse is the book of His second advent and the events preliminary to it. which God gave unto him—The Father reveals Himself and His will in, and by, His Son. to show—The word recurs ch. 22. 6: so entirely have the parts of Revelation reference to one another. It is its peculiar excellence that it comprises in a perfect compendium future things, and these widely differing: things close at hand, far off, and between the two; great and little; destroying and saving; repeated from old prophecies and new; long and short, and these interwoven with one another, opposed and mutually agreeing; mutually involving and evolving one another; so that in no book more than in this would the addition, or taking away, of a single word or clause (ch. 22. 18, 19), have the effect of marring the sense of the context and the comparison of passages together. [BENGEL.] his servants—not merely to "His servant John," but to all His servants (cf. ch. 22. 3). shortly—Greek, "speedily;" lit., "in," or "with speed." Cf. "The time is at hand," v. 3; ch. 22. 6, "shortly;" 7, "Behold I come quickly." Not that the things prophesied were according to man's computation near; but this word "shortly" implies a corrective of our estimate of worldly events and periods. Though a "thousand years" (ch. 20.) at least are included, the time is declared to be at hand. Luke 13, 8, "speedily." The Israelite Church hastened eagerly to the predicted end, which premature eagerness prophecy restrains (cf. Daniel 9). The Gentile Church needs to be reminded of the transitoriness of the world, which it is apt to make its home, and the nearness of Christ's advent. On the one hand Revelation saith, "the time is at hand;" on the other, the succession of seals, &c., show that many intermediate events must first elapse. He sent—Jesus Christ sent. by his angel—joined with "sent." The angel does not come forward to "signify" things to John until ch. 17, 1; 19, 9, 10. Previously to that St. John receives information from others. Jesus Christ opens the Revelation, v. 10, 11; ch. 4, 1; in ch. 6, 1 one of the four living creatures acts as his informant; in ch. 7, 13, one of the elders; in ch. 10, 8, 9, the Lord and His angel who stood on the sea and earth. Only at the end (ch. 17, 1) does the one angel stand by Him (cf. Daniel 8, 16; 9, 21; Zechariah 1, 19). 2. bare record of—"testified the word of God" in this book. Where we should say "testifies," the ancients in epistolary communications use the past tense. The word of God constitutes his testimony; v. 3, "the words of this prophecy." the testimony of Jesus—"the Spirit of prophecy" (ch. 19, 10). and of all things that—The oldest MSS. omit "and." Translate, "Whatsoever things he saw," in apposition with "the word of God and the testimony of Jesus Christ." 3. he that readeth, and they that hear—viz., the public reader in Church assemblies, and his hearers. In the first instance, he by whom John sent the book from Patmos to the seven churches, read it publicly: a usage most scriptural and profitable. A special blessing attends him who reads or hears the apocalyptic "prophecy" with a view to keeping the things therein (as there is but one article to "they that hear and keep those things," not two classes, but only one is meant: "they who not only hear, but also keep those things," Romans 2, 13); even though he find not the key to its interpretation, he finds a stimulus to faith, hope, and patient waiting for Christ. Note, the term "prophecy" has relation to the human medium or prophet inspired, here John: "Revelation" to the Divine Being who reveals His will, here Jesus Christ. God gave the revelation to Jesus: He by His angel revealed it to John, who was to make it known to the Church. 4. John—the apostle. For none but he (supposing the writer an honest man) would thus sign himself nakedly without addition. As sole survivor and representative of the apostles and eye-witnesses of the Lord, he needed no designation save his name, to be recognized by his readers. seven churches—not that there were not more churches in that region, but the number seven is fixed on as representing totality. These seven represent the universal Church of all times and places. See TRENCH'S (Epistles to Seven Churches) interesting Note, ch. 1, 20, on the number seven. It is the covenant number, the sign of God's covenant relation to mankind, and especially to the Church. Thus, the seventh day, sabbath, Genesis 2, 3; Ezekiel 20, 12. Circumcision, the sign of the covenant, after seven days (Genesis 17, 12). Sacrifices, Numbers 23, 1, 14, 29; 2 Chronicles 29, 21. Cf. also God's acts typical of His covenant, Joshua 6, 4, 15, 16; 2 Kings 5, 10. The feasts ordered by seven of time, Deuteronomy 15, 1; 16, 9, 13, 15. It is a combination of three, the Divine number (thus the Trinity: the three Holy, Isaiah 6, 3; the blessing, Numbers 6, 24-26), and four, the number of the organized world in its extension (thus the four elements, the four seasons, the four winds, the four corners or quarters of the earth, the four living creatures, emblems of redeemed creaturely life, ch. 4, 6; Ezekiel 1, 5, 6, with four faces and four wings each; the four beasts, and four metals, representing the four world-empires, Daniel 2, 32, 33; 7, 3; the four-sided Gospel designed for all quarters of the world; the sheet tied at four corners, Acts 10, 11; the four horns, the sum of the world's forces against the Church, Zechariah 1, 18). In the Apocalypse, where God's covenant with His Church comes to its consummation, appropriately the number seven recurs still more frequently than elsewhere in Scripture. Asia—Procon-sular, governed by a Roman proconsul: consisting of Phrygia, Mysia, Caria, and Lydia: the kingdom which Attalus III. had bequeathed to Rome. Grace . . . peace—Paul's apostolical greeting. In his Pastoral Epistles he inserts "mercy" in addition; so 2 John 3. him which is . . . was . . . is to come—A periphrasis for the incommunicable name JEHOVAH, the self-existing One, unchangeable. In Greek the indeclinability of the designation here implies His unchangeableness. Perhaps the reason why "He which is to come" is used, instead of "He that shall be," is because the grand theme of Revelation is the Lord's coming (v. 7). Still it is the FATHER as distinguished from "Jesus Christ" (v. 5) who is here meant. But so one are the Father and Son, that the designation "which is to come," more immediately applicable to Christ, is used here of the Father. the seven Spirits which are before his throne—The oldest MSS. omit "are." before—viz., "in the presence of." The Holy Spirit in His sevenfold (i. e., perfect, complete, and universal) energy. Corresponding to "the seven churches." One in His own essence, manifold in His gracious influences. The seven eyes resting on the stone laid by Jehovah (ch. 5, 6). Four is the number of the creature world (cf. the fourfold cherubim); seven the number of God's revelation in the world. 5. the faithful witness—of the truth concerning Himself and His mission as Prophet, Priest, and King Saviour. "He was the faithful witness, because all things that He heard of the Father he faithfully made known to His disciples. Also, because He taught the way of God in truth, and cared not for man, nor regarded the persons of men. Also, because the truth which He taught in words He confirmed by miracles. Also, because the testimony to Himself on the part of the Father He denied not even in death. Lastly, because He will give true testimony of the works of good and bad at the day of judgment." [RICHARD OF ST. VICTOR in TRENCH.] The nominative in Greek standing in apposition to the genitive, "Jesus Christ," gives majestic prominence to "the faithful witness," the first-begotten of the dead—(Colossians 1, 18.) Lazarus rose to die again. Christ rose to die no more. The image is not as if the grave was the womb of His resurrection—birth [ALFORD]; but as Acts 13, 33; Romans 1, 4, treat Christ's resurrection as the epoch and event which fulfilled the Scripture, Psalm 2, 7, "This day (at the resurrection) have I begotten Thee." It was then that His Divine Sonship as the Godman was manifested and openly attested by the Father. So our resurrection and our manifested sonship, or generation, are connected. Hence "regeneration" is used of the resurrection-state at the restitution of all things (Matthew 19, 28). the Prince—or Ruler. The kingship of the world which the Tempter offered to Jesus on condition of doing homage to him, and so shunning the cross, He has obtained by the cross. "The kings of the earth" conspired against the Lord's Anointed (Psalm 2, 2): these He shall break in pieces (Psalm 2, 9). Those who are wise in time and kiss the Son shall bring their glory unto Him at His manifestation as King of kings, after He has destroyed His foes. Unto Him that loved us—The oldest MSS. read the present, ". . . loveth us." It is His ever-continuing character, He loveth us, and ever shall love us. His love rests evermore on His people. washed us—The two oldest MSS. read, "freed (loosed as from a bond) us:." und Andreas and Primasius. One very old MS., Vulgate, and Coptic read as English Version, perhaps drawn from ch. 7, 14. "Loosed us in (virtue of) His blood," being the harder reading to understand, is less likely to have come from the transcribers. The reference is thus to Greek lutron, the ransom paid for our release (Matthew 20, 28). In favour of English Version reading is the usage whereby the priests, before putting on the holy garments and ministering, washed themselves: so spiritually believers, as priests unto God, must first be washed in Christ's blood from every stain before they can serve God aright now, or hereafter minister as dispensers of blessing to the subject nations in the millennial kingdom, or minister before God in heaven. 6. And hath—rather as Greek, "And (He) hath," made us kings—The oldest MSS. read, "a kingdom." One oldest MS. reads the dative, "for us." Another reads "us," accusative: so Vulgate, Syriac, Coptic, and Andreas. This seems preferable, "He made us (to be) a kingdom." So Exodus 19. 6, "a kingdom of priests:" 1 Peter 2. 9, "a royal priesthood." The saints shall constitute peculiarly a kingdom of God, and shall themselves be kings (ch. 5. 10). They shall share His King-Priest throne in the millennial kingdom. The emphasis thus falls more on the kingdom than on priests: whereas in English Version reading it is equally distributed between both. This book lays prominent stress on the saints' kingdom. They are kings because they are priests: the priesthood is the continuous ground and legitimation of their kingship; they are kings in relation to man, priests in relation to God, serving Him day and night in His temple (ch. 7. 15; 5. 10). The priest-kings shall rule, not in an external mechanical manner, but simply in virtue of what they are, by the power of attraction and conviction overcoming the heart. [AUBERLEN.] priests—who have pre-eminently the privilege of near access to the king. David's sons were priests (Hebrew), 2 Samuel 8. 18. The distinction of priests and people, nearer and more remote from God, shall cease; all shall have nearest access to Him. All persons and things shall be holy to the Lord. God and His Father—There is but one article to both in the Greek, therefore it means, "Unto Him who is at once God and His Father." glory and dominion—Greek, "the glory and the might." The fuller threefold doxology occurs, ch. 4. 9, 11; fourfold, ch. 5. 13; Jude 25; sevenfold, ch. 7. 12; 1 Chronicles 29. 11. Doxology occupies the prominent place above, which prayer does below. If we thought of God's glory first (as in the Lord's Prayer), and gave the secondary place to our needs, we should please God and gain our petitions better than we do. for ever and ever—Greek, "unto the ages." 7. with clouds—Greek, "the clouds," viz., of heaven. "A cloud received Him out of their sight" at His ascension (Acts 1. 9). His ascension corresponds to the manner of His coming again (Acts 1. 11). Clouds are the symbols of wrath to sinners. every eye—His coming shall therefore be a personal, visible appearing. shall see—It is because they do not now see Him, they will not believe. Contrast John 20. 29. they also—they in particular; "whosoever." Primarily, at His pre-millennial advent the Jews, who shall "look upon Him whom they have pierced," and mourn in repentance, and say, "Blessed is He that cometh in the name of the Lord." Secondly, and here chiefly, at the general judgment all the ungodly, not only those who actually pierced Him, but those who did so by their sins, shall look with trembling upon Him. St. John is the only one of the Evangelists who records the piercing of Christ's side. This allusion identifies him as the author of the Apocalypse. The reality of Christ's humanity and His death is proved by His having been pierced; and the water and blood from His side were the antitype to the Levitical waters of cleansing and blood offerings. all kindreds . . . shall wail—all the unconverted at the general judgment; and especially at His pre-millennial advent, the Antichristian confederacy (Zechariah 12. 3-6, 9; 14. 1-4; Matthew 24. 30). Greek, "all the tribes of the land," or "the earth." See the limitation to "all," ch. 13. 8. Even the godly whilst rejoicing in His love shall feel penitential sorrow at their sins, which shall all be manifested at the general judgment. because of—Greek, "at," or "in regard to Him." Even so, Amen—God's seal of His own word; to which corresponds the believer's prayer, ch. 22. 20. The "even so" is Greek, "Amen" is Hebrew. To both Gentiles and Jews His promises and threats are unchangeable. 8. Greek, "I am the Alpha and the Omega." The first and last letters of the alphabet. God in Christ comprises all that goes between, as well as the first and last. the beginning and the ending—Omitted in the oldest MSS., though found in Vulgate and Coptic. Transcribers probably inserted the clause from ch. 21. 6. In Christ, Genesis, the Alpha of the Old Testament, and Revelation, the Omega of the New Testament, meet together: the last

book presenting to us man and God reconciled in Paradise, as the first book presented man at the beginning innocent and in God's favour in Paradise. Accomplishing finally what I begin. Always the same; before the dragon, the beast, false prophet, and all foes. An anticipatory consolation to the saints under the coming trials of the Church. the Lord—The oldest MSS. read "the Lord God." Almighty—Hebrew, Shaddai, and Jehovah Sabaoth, i. e., of hosts; commanding all the hosts or powers in heaven and earth, so able to overcome all His Church's foes. It occurs often in Revelation, but nowhere else in New Testament save 2 Corinthians 6. 18, a quotation from Isaiah. 9. I John—So "I Daniel" (Daniel 7. 23; 9. 2; 10. 2). One of the many features of resemblance between the Old Testament and the New Testament apocalyptic seers. No other Scripture writer uses the phrase, also—as well as being an apostle. The oldest MSS. omit "also." In his Gospel and Epistles he makes no mention of his name, though describing himself as "the disciple whom Jesus loved." Here, with similar humility, though naming himself, he does not mention his apostleship. companion—Greek, "fellow-partaker in the tribulation." Tribulation is the necessary precursor of "the kingdom," therefore the is prefixed. This must be borne with "patient endurance." The oldest MSS. omit "in the" before "kingdom." All three are inseparable: the tribulation, kingdom and endurance. patience—translate, "endurance." "Persevering, enduring continuance" (Acts 14. 22); "the queen of the graces (virtues)." [CHRYSOSTOM.] of—The oldest MSS. read "IN Jesus," or "Jesus Christ." It is IN Him that believers have the right to the kingdom, and the spiritual strength to enable them to endure patiently for it. was—Greek, "came to be." in . . . Patmos—now Patmo or Palmosa. See Introduction on this island, and John's exile to it under Domitian, from which he was released under Nerva. Restricted to a small spot on earth, he is permitted to penetrate the wide realms of heaven and its secrets. Thus John drank of Christ's cup, and was baptized with His baptism (Matthew 20. 22). for—Greek, "for the sake of," "on account of;" so, "because of the word of God and . . . testimony." Two oldest MSS. omit the second "for," thus "the Word of God" and "testimony of Jesus" are the more closely joined. Two oldest MSS. omit "Christ." The Apocalypse has been always appreciated most by the Church in adversity. Thus the Asiatic Church from the flourishing times of Constantine less estimated it. The African Church being more exposed to the cross always made much of it. [BEN-GEL.] 10. I was—Greek, "I came to be;" "I became," in the Spirit—in a state of ecstasy; the outer world being shut out, and the inner and higher life or spirit being taken full possession of by God's Spirit, so that an immediate connection with the invisible world is established. Whilst the prophet "speaks" in the Spirit, the apocalyptic seer is in the Spirit in his whole person. The spirit only (that which connects us with God and the invisible world) is active, or rather recipient, in the apocalyptic state. With Christ this being "in the Spirit" was not the exception, but His continual state. on the Lord's day—Though forcibly detained from Church communion with the brethren in the sanctuary on the Lord's day, the weekly commemoration of the resurrection, John was holding spiritual communion with them. This is the earliest mention of the term "the Lord's day." But the consecration of the day to worship, almsgiving, and the Lord's Supper, is implied Acts 20. 7; 1 Corinthians 16. 2; cf. John 20. 19-26. The name corresponds to "the Lord's Supper," 1 Corinthians 11. 20. IGNATIUS seems to allude to "the Lord's day" (ad Magnes. 9), and IRENÆUS in the Quest. ad Orthod. 115 (in JUSTIN MARTYR). JUSTIN MARTYR, Apology, 2. 48, &c., "On Sunday we all hold our joint meeting; for the first day is that on which God, having removed darkness and chaos, made the world, and Jesus Christ our Saviour rose from the dead. On the day before Saturday they crucified Him; and on the day after Saturday, which is Sunday, having appeared to His apostles and disciples, He taught these things." To the Lord's day PLINY doubtless refers (Ex. 97, B. 10), "The Christians on a fixed day before dawn meet and sing a hymn to Christ as God," &c. TERTULLIAN, De Coron. 3, "On the Lord's day we deem it wrong to fast." MELITO, bishop of Sardis (second century), wrote a book on the Lord's day (EUSEBIUS 4. 26). Also, DIONYSIUS OF CORINTH, in EUSEBIUS, Ecclesiastical History, 4. 23. 8. CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA, Stromata 5, and 7. 12; ORIGEN, c. Cels. 8. 22. The theory that the day of Christ's second coming is meant, is untenable. "The day of the Lord" is different in the Greek from "the Lord's (an adjective) day," which latter in the ancient Church always designates our Sunday, though it is not impossible that the two shall coincide (at least in some parts of the earth), whence a tradition is mentioned in JEROME, on Matthew 25, that the Lord's coming was expected especially on the Paschal Lord's day. The visions of the Apocalypse, the seals, trumpets, and vials, &c., are grouped in sevens, and naturally begin on the first day of the seven, the birth-day of the Church, whose future they set forth. [WORDSWORTH.] great voice—summoning solemn attention; Greek order, "I heard a voice behind me great (loud) as (that) of a trumpet." The trumpet summoned to religious feasts, and accompanies God's revelations of Himself. 11. I am Alpha and Omega, the first and the last; and—The oldest MSS. omit all this clause. write in a book—To this book, having such an origin, and to the other books of Holy Scripture, who is there that gives the weight which their importance demands, preferring them to the many books of the world? [BENGE.] seven churches—As there were many other churches in Proconsular Asia (e. g., Miletus, Magnesia, Tralles), besides the seven specified, doubtless the number seven is fixed upon because of its mystical signification, expressing totality and universality. The words "which are in Asia" are rejected by the oldest MSS., A, B, C, CYPRIAN, Vulgate, and Syriac; Coptic alone supports them of old authorities. These seven are representative churches; and, as a complex whole, ideally complete, embody the chief spiritual characteristics of the Church, whether as faithful or unfaithful, in all ages. The churches selected are not taken at random, but have a many-sided completeness. Thus, on one side we have Smyrna, a Church exposed to persecutions unto death; on the other Sardis, having a high name for spiritual life and yet dead. Again, Laodicea, in its own estimate rich and having need of nothing, with ample talents, yet lukewarm in Christ's cause; on the other hand, Philadelphia, with but a little strength, yet keeping Christ's word and having an open door of usefulness set before it by Christ Himself. Again, Ephesus, intolerant of evil and of false apostles, yet having left its first love; on the other hand, Thyatira, abounding in works, love, service, and faith, yet suffering the false prophetess to seduce many. In another aspect, Ephesus in conflict with false freedom, i. e., fleshly licentiousness (the Nicolaitans); so also Pergamos in conflict with Balaam-like tempters to fornication and idol-meats; and on the other side, Philadelphia in conflict with the Jewish synagogue, i. e., legal bondage. Finally, Sardis and Laodicea without any active opposition to call forth their spiritual energies; a dangerous position, considering man's natural indolence. In the historic scheme of interpretation, which seems fanciful, Ephesus (meaning "the beloved" or "desired" [STIER]) represents the waning period of the apostolic age. Smyrna ("myrrh"), bitter suffering, yet sweet and costly perfume, the martyr period of the Decian and Diocletian age. Pergamos (a "castle" or "tower"), the Church possessing earthly power and decreasing spirituality from Constantine's time until the seventh century. Thyatira ("unwearied about sacrifices"), the Papal Church in the first half of the Middle Ages; like "Jezebel," keen about its so-called sacrifice of the mass, and slaying the prophets and witnesses of God. Sardis, from the close of the twelfth century to the Reformation. Philadelphia ("brotherly love"), the first century of the Reformation. Laodicea, the Reformed Church after its first zeal had become lukewarm. 12. see the voice—i. e., ascertain whence the voice came; to see who was it from whom the voice proceeded. that—Greek, "of what kind it was which." The voice is that of God the Father, as at Christ's baptism and transfiguration, so here in presenting Christ as our High Priest. spake—The oldest MSS., versions, and Fathers read, "was speaking." being—"having turned." seven . . . candlesticks—"lamp-stands." [KELLY.] The stand holding the lamp. In Exodus 25. 31, 32, the seven are united in ONE candlestick or lamp-stand, i. e., six arms and a central shaft; so Zechariah 4. 2, 11. Here the seven are separate candlesticks, typifying, as that one, the entire Church, but now no longer as the Jewish Church (represented by the one sevenfold candlestick) restricted to one outward unity and one place; the several churches are mutually independent as to external ceremonies and government (provided all things are done to edification, and schisms or needless separations are avoided), yet one in the unity of the Spirit and the Headship of Christ. The candlestick is not light, but the bearer of light, holding it forth to give light around. The light is the Lord's, not the Church's; from Him she receives it. She is to be a light-bearer to His glory. The candlestick stood in the holy place, the type of the Church on earth, as the holiest place was type of the Church in heaven. The holy place's only light was derived from the candlestick, daylight being excluded; so the Lord God is the Church's only light; hers is the light of grace, not nature. "Golden" symbolizes at once the greatest preciousness and sacredness: so that in the Zend Avesta "golden" is synonymous with heavenly or divine. [TRENCH.] 13. His glorified form as man could be recognized by John, who had seen it at the Transfiguration. in the midst—Implying Christ's continual presence and ceaseless activity in the midst of His people on earth. In ch. 4, when He appears in heaven, His insignia undergo a corresponding change; yet even there the rainbow reminds us of His everlasting covenant with them. seven—Omitted in two of the oldest MSS., but supported by one. Son of man—The form which John had seen enduring the agony of Gethsemane, and the shame and anguish of Calvary, he now sees glorified. His glory (as Son of man, not merely Son of God) is the result of His humiliation as Son of man. down to the foot—A mark of high rank. The garment and girdle seem to be emblems of His priesthood. Cf. Exodus 28. 2, 4, 31; LXX. Aaron's robe and girdle were "for glory and beauty," and combined the insignia of royalty and priesthood, the characteristics of Christ's antitypical priesthood "after the order of Melchisedec." His being in the midst of the candlesticks (only seen in the temple), shows that it is as a king-priest He is so attired. This priesthood He has exercised ever since His ascension; and, therefore, here wears its emblems. As Aaron wore these insignia when He came forth from the sanctuary to bless the people (Leviticus 16. 4, 23, 24, the chetoneth, or holy linen coat), so when Christ shall come again, He shall appear in the similar attire, of "beauty and glory" (Margin, Isaiah 4. 2). The angels are attired somewhat like their Lord (ch. 15. 6). The ordinary girding for one actively engaged, was at the loins; but JOSEPHUS, Antiquities 3. 7. 2, expressly tells us that the Levitical priests were girt higher up, about the breasts or paps, appropriate to calm, majestic movement. The girdle bracing the frame together, symbolizes collected powers. Righteousness and faithfulness are Christ's girdle. The high priest's girdle was only interwoven with gold, but Christ's is all of gold; the antitype exceeds the type. 14. Greek, "But," or "And." like wool—Greek, "like white wool." The colour is the point of comparison; signifying purity and glory. (So in Isaiah 1. 18.) Not age, for hoary hairs are the sign of decay. eyes . . . as . . . flame—all-searching and penetrating like fire: at the same time, also, implying consuming indignation against sin, especially at His coming "in flaming fire, taking vengeance" on all the ungodly, which is confirmed as the meaning here, by Revelation 19. 11, 12. 15. fine brass—Greek, "chalcolibanus," derived by some from two Greek words, brass and frankincense; derived by BOCHART from Greek chalcos, brass, and Hebrew libbeen, to whiten; hence, brass, which in the furnace has reached a white heat. Thus it answers to "burnished (flashing, or glowing) brass," Ezekiel 1. 7; Revelation 10. 1, "His feet as pillars of fire." Translate, "Glowing brass, as if they had been made fiery (red-hot) in a furnace." The feet of the priests were bare in ministering in the sanctuary. So our great High Priest here. voices . . . many waters—Ezekiel 43, 2; in Daniel 10, 6, it is "like the voice of a multitude." As the Bridegroom's voice, so the bride's, ch. 14, 2; 19, 6; Ezekiel 1, 24, the cherubim, or redeemed creation. His voice, however, is here regarded in its terribleness to His foes. Contrast Song of Solomon 2, 8; 5, 2, with which cf. ch. 3, 20. 16, he had—Greek, "having." St. John takes up the description from time to time, irrespective of the construction, with separate strokes of the pencil. [ALFORD.] in . . . right hand seven stars—(v. 20; ch. 2, 1; 3, 1.) He holds them as a star-studded "crown of glory," or "royal diadem," in His hand; so Isaiah 62, 3. He is their Possessor and Upholder. out of . . . mouth went—Greek, "going forth;" not wielded in the hand. His Word is omnipotent in executing His will in punishing sinners. It is the sword of His Spirit. Reproof and punishment, rather than its converting winning power, is the prominent point. Still, as He encourages the churches, as well as threatens, the former quality of the Word is not excluded. Its two edges (back and front) may allude to its double efficacy, condemning some, converting others. TERTULLIAN, adv. Jud., takes them of the Old and the New Testament. RICHARD OF ST. VICTOR, "the Old Testament cutting externally our carnal, the New Testament internally our spiritual sins. sword—Greek, Romphaia, the Thracian long and heavy broadsword: six times in Revelation, once only elsewhere in New Testament, viz., Luke 2, 35. sun . . . in his strength—in unclouded power. So shall the righteous shine, reflecting the image of the Sun of righteousness. TRENCH notices that this description, sublime as a purely mental conception, would be intolerable if we were to give it an outward form. With the Greeks, æsthetic taste was the first consideration, to which all others must give way. With the Hebrews, truth and the full representation ideally of the religious reality were the paramount consideration, that representation being designed not to be outwardly embodied, but to remain a purely mental conception. This exalting of the essence above the form marks their deeper religious earnestness. 17. So fallen is man that God's manifestation of His glorious presence overwhelms him. held his right hand upon me—So the same Lord Jesus did at the Transfiguration to the three prostrate disciples, of whom John was one, saying, Be not afraid. The "touch" of His hand, as of old, imparted strength. unto me—Omitted in the oldest MSS. the first . . . the last—(Isaiah 41, 4; 44, 6; 48, 12.) From eternity, and enduring to eternity: "the First by creation, the Last by retribution; the First, because before me there was no God formed; the Last, because after me there shall be no other: the First, because from me are all things; the Last, because to me all things return." [RICHARD OF ST. VICTOR.] 18. Translate as Greek, "And the LIVING ONE:" connected with last sentence, v. 17. and was—Greek, "and (yet) I became dead." alive for evermore—Greek, "living unto the ages of ages;" not merely "I live," but I have life, and am the source of it to my people. "To Him belongs absolute being, as contrasted with the relative being of the creature; others may share, He only hath immortality; being in essence, not by mere participation, immortal. [THEODORET in TRENCH.] One oldest MS., with English Version, reads "Amen." Two others, and most of the oldest versions and Fathers, omit it. His having passed through death as one of us, and now living in the infinite plenitude of life, reassures His people, since through Him death is the gate of resurrection to eternal life. have . . . keys of hell—Greek, "Hades;" Hebrew, "Sheol." "Hell" in the sense, the place of torment, answers to a different Greek word, viz., Gehenna. I can release from the unseen world of spirits and from DEATH whom I will. The oldest MSS. read by transposition, "Death and Hades," or Hell. It is death (which came in by sin, robbing man of his immortal birth-right, Romans 5, 12) that peoples Hades, and therefore should stand first in order. Keys are emblems of authority, opening and shutting at will "the gates of Hades" (Psalm 9, 13, 14; Isaiah 33, 10; Matthew 16, 18). 19.

The oldest MSS. read, "Write therefore" (inasmuch as I, "the First and Last," have the keys of death, and vouchsafe to thee this vision for the comfort and warning of the Church). things which are—"the things which thou hast seen" are those narrated in this chapter (cf. v. 11). "The things which are" imply the present state of things in the churches when John was writing, as represented chs. 2, and 3. "The things which shall be hereafter," the things symbolically referred concerning the future history of chs. 4-22. ALFORD translates, "What things they signify;" but the antithesis of the next clause forbids this, "the things which shall be hereafter," Greek, "which are about to come to pass." The plural (Greek) "are," instead of the usual Greek construction singular, is owing to churches and persons being meant by "things" in the clause, "the things which are." 20. in—Greek, "upon my right hand." the mystery . . . candlesticks—in apposition to, and explaining, "the things which thou hast seen," governed by "Write." Mystery signifies the hidden truth, veiled under this symbol, and now revealed; its correlative is revelation. Stars symbolize lordship (Numbers 24, 17; cf. Daniel 12, 3, of faithful teachers; ch. 8, 10, 12, 4; Jude 13). angels—Not as ALFORD, from ORIGEN Homily 13 on Luke, and 20 on Numbers, the guardian angels of the churches, just as individuals have their guardian angels. For how could heavenly angels be charged with the delinquencies laid here to the charge of these angels? Then, if a human angel be meant (as the Old Testament analogy favours, Haggai 1, 13, "the Lord's Messenger in the Lord's message;" Malachi 2, 7; 3, 1), the bishop, or superintendent pastor, must be the angel. For whereas there were many presbyters in each of the larger churches (as e. g., Ephesus, Smyrna, &c.), there was but one angel, whom, moreover, the Chief Shepherd and Bishop of souls holds responsible for the spiritual state of the Church under him. The term angel, designating an office, is, in accordance with the enigmatic symbolism of this book, transferred from the heavenly to the earthly superior ministers of Jehovah; reminding them that, like the heavenly angels above, they below should fulfil God's mission zealously, promptly and efficiently. "Thy will be done on earth, as it is in heaven!"

CHAPTER II.

Ver. 1-29. EPISTLES TO EPHEBUS, SMYRNA, PERGAMOS, THYATIRA. Each of the seven epistles in this chapter and ch. 3, commences with "I know thy works." Each contains a promise from Christ, "To him that overcometh." Each ends with "He that hath an ear, let him hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches." The title of our Lord in each case accords with the nature of the address, and is mainly taken from the imagery of the vision, ch. 1. Each address has a threat or a promise, and most of the addresses have both. Their order seems to be ecclesiastical, civil, and geographical: Ephesus first, as being the Asiatic metropolis (termed "the light of Asia," and "first city of Asia"), the nearest to Patmos, where John received the epistle to the seven churches, and also as being that Church with which John was especially connected; then the churches on the west coast of Asia; then those in the interior. Smyrna and Philadelphia alone receive unmixed praise. Sardis and Laodicea receive almost solely censure. In Ephesus, Pergamos, and Thyatira, there are some things to praise, others to condemn, the latter element preponderating in one case (Ephesus), the former in the two others (Pergamos and Thyatira). Thus the main characteristics of the different states of different churches, in all times and places, are portrayed, and they are suitably encouraged or warned. 1. Ephesus—famed for the temple of Diana, one of the seven wonders of the world. For three years Paul labored there. He subsequently ordained Timothy superintending overseer or bishop there; probably his charge was but of a temporary nature. St. John, towards the close of his life, took it as the centre from which he superintended the province. holdeth—Greek, "holdeth fast," as in v. 25; ch. 3, 11; cf. John 10, 28,

RUINS OF THE SITE OF EPHESUS.

RUINS OF CAPERNAUM.

29. The title of Christ here as "holding fast the seven stars (from ch. 1. 16: only that, for having is substituted holding fast in His grasp), and walking in the midst of the seven candlesticks," accords with the beginning of his address to the seven churches representing the universal Church. Walking expresses His unwearied activity in the Church, guarding her from internal and external evils, as the high priest moved to and fro in the sanctuary. 2. I know thy works—expressing His omniscience. Not merely "thy professions, desires, good resolutions" (ch. 14. 13, end). thy labour—Two oldest MSS. omit "thy;" one supports it. The Greek means "labour unto weariness." patience—persevering endurance. bear—Evil men are a burden which the Ephesian Church regarded as intolerable. We are to "bear (the same Greek, Galatians 6. 2) one another's burdens" in the case of weak brethren; but not to bear false brethren. tried—by experiment; not the Greek for "test," as 1 John 4. 1. The apostolical churches had the miraculous gift of discerning spirits. Cf. Acts 20. 28-30, wherein Paul presciently warned the Ephesian elders of the coming false teachers, as also in writing to Timothy at Ephesus. TERTULLIAN, De baptismo, 17, and JEROME, in Catal. Vir. Illustr. in Luca 7, record of John, that when a writing, professing to be a canonical history of the acts of St. Paul, had been composed by a presbyter of Ephesus, John convicted the author and condemned the work. So on one occasion he would not remain under the same roof as Cerinthus the heretic, say they are apostles—probably Judaizers. IGNATIUS, Ad Ephesum 6, says subsequently, "Onesimus praises exceedingly your good discipline that no heresy dwells among you;" and 9, "Ye did not permit those having evil doctrine to sow their seed among you, but closed your ears." 3. borne . . . patience—The oldest MSS. transpose these words. Then translate as Greek, "persevering endurance . . . borne." "Thou hast borne" my reproach, but "thou canst not bear the evil" (v. 2). A beautiful antithesis. and . . . hast laboured, and hast not fainted—The two oldest MSS. and oldest versions read, "and . . . hast not laboured," omitting "and hast fainted." The difficulty which transcribers by English Version reading tried to obviate, was the seeming contradiction, "I know thy labour . . . and thou hast not laboured." But what is meant is, "Thou hast not been wearied out with labour." 4. somewhat . . . because—translate, "I have against thee (this) that," &c. It is not a mere "somewhat;" it is everything. How characteristic of our gracious Lord, that He puts foremost all He can find to approve, and only after this notes the shortcomings! left thy first love—to Christ. Cf. 1 Timothy 5. 12, "cast off their first faith." See the Ephesians' first love, Ephesians 1. 15. This epistle was written under Domitian, when thirty years had elapsed since Paul had written his Epistle to them. Their warmth of love had given place to a lifeless orthodoxy. Cf. Paul's view of faith so-called without love, 1 Corinthians 13. 2. 5. whence—from what a height, do the first works—the works which flowed from thy first love. Not merely "feel thy first feelings," but do works flowing from the same principle as formerly, "faith which worketh by love." quickly—Omitted in two oldest MSS., Vulgate and Coptic versions: supported by one oldest MS. I will come—Greek, "I am coming" in special judgment on thee. remove thy candlestick out of his place—I will take away the Church from Ephesus and remove it elsewhere. "It is removal of the candlestick, not extinction of the candle, which is threatened here; judgment for some, but that very judgment the occasion of mercy for others. So it has been. The seat of the Church has been changed, but the Church itself survives. What the East has lost, the West has gained. One who lately visited Ephesus found only three Christians there, and these so ignorant as scarcely to have heard the names of St. Paul or St. John." [TRENCH.] 6. But—How graciously, after necessary censure, He returns to praise for our consolation, and as an example to us; that we would show, when we reprove, we have more pleasure in praising than in fault-finding. hatest the deeds—We should hate men's evil deeds, not hate the men themselves. Nicolaitanes—IRENÆUS, Hæreses 1. 26. 3;

and TERTULLIAN, Præscriptione Hæreticorum 46, make these followers of Nicolas, one of the seven (honourably mentioned, Acts 6. 3, 5). They (CLEMENS ALEXANDRINUS, Stromata 2. 20; 3. 4; and EPIPHANIUS, Hæreses 25) evidently confound the latter Gnostic Nicolaitanes, or followers of one Nicolas, with those of Revelation. MICHAELIS' view is probable: Nicolas (conqueror of the people) is the Greek version of Balaam, from Hebrew Belang Am, Destroyer of the people. Revelation abounds in such duplicate Hebrew and Greek names: as Apollyon, Abaddon: Devil, Satan: Yea (Greek Nai), Amen. The name, like other names, Egypt, Babylon, Sodom, is symbolic. Cf. v. 14, 15, which shows the true sense of Nicolaitanes: they are not a sect, but professing Christians who, like Balaam of old, tried to introduce into the Church a false freedom, i. e., licentiousness; this was a reaction in the opposite direction from Judaism, the first danger to the Church combated in the council of Jerusalem, and by Paul in the Epistle to Galatians. These symbolical Nicolaitanes, or followers of Balaam, abused Paul's doctrine of the grace of God into a plea for lasciviousness (2 Peter 2. 15, 16, 19; Jude 4. 11; who both describe the same sort of seducers as followers of Balaam). The difficulty that they should appropriate a name branded with infamy in Scripture is met by TRENCH: The Antinomian Gnostics were so opposed to John as a Judaizing apostle, that they would assume as a name of chiefest honour one which John branded with dishonour. 7. He that hath an ear—This clause precedes the promise in the first three addresses, succeeds to it in the last four. Thus the promises are enclosed on both sides with the precept urging the deepest attention as to the most momentous truths. Every man "hath an ear" naturally, but he alone will be able to hear spiritually to whom God has given "the hearing ear;" whose "ear God hath wakened" and "opened." Cf. "Faith, the ears of the soul." [CLEMENS ALEXANDRINUS.] The Spirit saith—what Christ saith, the Spirit saith: so one are the Second and Third Persons. unto the churches—not merely to the particular, but to the universal Church. give . . . tree of life—The thing promised corresponds to the kind of faithfulness manifested. They who refrain from Nicolaitane indulgences (v. 6) and idol meats (v. 14, 15), shall eat of meat infinitely superior, viz., the fruit of the tree of life, and the hidden manna (v. 17). overcometh—In John's Gospel (16. 33) and First Epistle (2. 13, 14; 5. 4, 5) an object follows, viz., "the world," "the wicked one." Here, where the final issue is spoken of, the conqueror is named absolutely. Paul uses a similar image, 1 Corinthians 9. 24, 25; 2 Timothy 2. 5; but not the same as John's phrase, except Romans 12. 21. will I give—as the Judge. The tree of life in Paradise, lost by the fall, is restored by the Redeemer. Allusions to it occur Proverbs 3. 13; 11. 30; 13. 12; 15. 4, and prophetically, ch. 22. 2, 14; Ezekiel 47. 12; cf. John 6. 51. It is interesting to note how closely these introductory addresses are linked to the body of Revelation. Thus, the tree of life here, with ch. 22. 1; Deliverance from the second death (ch. 2. 11), with ch. 20. 14; 21. 8; The new name (ch. 2. 17), with ch. 14. 1; Power over the nations, with ch. 20. 4; The morning star (ch. 2. 28), with ch. 22. 16; The white raiment (ch. 3. 5), with ch. 4. 4; 16. 15; The name in the book of life (ch. 3. 5), with ch. 13. 8; 20. 15; The new Jerusalem and its citizenship (ch. 3. 12), with ch. 21. 10. in the midst of the paradise—The oldest MSS. omit "the midst of." In Genesis 2. 9 these words are appropriate, for there were other trees in the garden, but not in the midst of it. Here the tree of life is simply in the paradise, for no other tree is mentioned in it; in ch. 22. 2 the tree of life is "in the midst of the street of Jerusalem;" from this the clause was inserted here. Paradise (a Persian, or else Semitic word), originally used of any garden of delight; then specially of Eden; then the temporary abode of separate souls in bliss; then "the Paradise of God," the third heaven, the immediate presence of God. of God—(Ezekiel 23. 13.) One oldest MS., with Vulgate, Syriac, and Coptic, and CYPRIAN, read, "MY God," as in ch. 3. 12. So Christ calls God "MY God and your God" (John 20. 17; cf. Ephesians 1. 17). God is our God, in virtue of being peculiarly Christ's God. The main bliss of Paradise is, that it is the Paradise of God; God Himself dwelling there (ch. 21. 3). 8. Smyrna—in Ionia, a little to the north of Ephesus. POLYCARP, martyred in 168 A. D., eighty-six years after his conversion, was bishop, and probably "the angel of the Church in Smyrna" meant here. The allusions to persecutions and faithfulness unto death accord with this view. IGNATIUS (Martyrium Ignatii, 3), on his way to martyrdom in Rome, wrote to POLYCARP, then (108 A. D.) bishop of Smyrna; if his bishopric commenced ten or twelve years earlier, the dates will harmonize. TERTULLIAN, Præscriptione Hæreticorum, 32, and IRENÆUS, who had talked with POLYCARP in youth, tell us POLYCARP was consecrated bishop of Smyrna by St. John. the First . . . the Last . . . was dead . . . is alive—The attributes of Christ most calculated to comfort the Church of Smyrna under its persecutions; resumed from ch. 1. 17, 18. As death was to Him but the gate to life eternal, so it is to be them (v. 10, 11). 9. thy works, and—Omitted in two oldest MSS., Vulgate, and Coptic. Supported by one oldest MS. tribulation—owing to persecution. poverty—owing to "the spolling of their goods." but thou art rich—In grace. Contrast Laodicea, rich in the world's eyes and her own, poor before God. "There are both poor rich-men, and rich poor-men in God's sight." [TRENCH.] blasphemy of them—blasphemous calumny of thee on the part of (or arising from) them, &c. say they are Jews, and are not—Jews by national descent, but not spiritually of "the true circumcision." The Jews blaspheme Christ as "the hanged one." As elsewhere, so at Smyrna they bitterly opposed Christianity; and at POLYCARP'S martyrdom they joined the heathens in clamouring for his being cast to the lions; and when there was an obstacle to this, for his being burnt alive; and with their own hands they carried logs for the pile. synagogue of Satan—Only once is the term "synagogue" in the New Testament used of the Christian assembly, and that by the apostle who longest maintained the union of the Church and Jewish Synagogue. As the Jews more and more opposed Christianity, and it more and more rooted itself in the Gentile world, the term "synagogue" was left altogether to the former, and Christians appropriated exclusively the honourable term "Church;" contrast an earlier time, when the Jewish theocracy is called "the Church in the wilderness." Cf. Numbers 16. 3; 20. 4, "congregation of the Lord." Even in James 2. 2 it is "your (not the Lord's) assembly." The Jews, who might have been "the Church of God," had now, by their opposition and unbelief, become the synagogue of Satan. So "the throne of Satan" (v. 13) represents the heathens' opposition to Christianity; "the depths of Satan" (v. 24), the opposition of heretics. 10. none—The oldest MSS. read, "Fear not those things," &c. "The Captain of our salvation never keeps back what those who faithfully witness for Him may have to bear for His name's sake; never entices recruits by the promise they shall find all things easy and pleasant there." [TRENCH.] devil—"the accuser." He acted, through Jewish accusers, against Christ and His people. The conflict of the latter was not with mere flesh and blood, but with the rulers of the darkness of this world, tried—with temptation by "the devil." The same event is often both a temptation from the devil, and a trial from God—God sifting and winnowing the man to separate his chaff from his wheat, the devil sifting him in the hope that nothing but chaff will be found in him [TRENCH]. ten days—Not the ten persecutions from Nero to Diocletian. LYRA explains ten years on the year-day principle. The shortness of the duration of the persecution is evidently made the ground of consolation. The time of trial shall be short, the duration of your joy shall be for ever. Cf. the use of "ten days" for a short time, Genesis 24. 55; Numbers 11. 19. Ten is the number of the world-powers hostile to the Church; cf. the ten horns of the beast, ch. 13. 1. unto death—so as even to endure death for my sake. crown of life—James 1. 12; 2 Timothy 4. 8, "crown of righteousness;" 1 Peter 5. 4, "crown of glory." The crown is the garland, the mark of a conqueror, or of one rejoicing, or at a feast, but diadem is the mark of a KING. 11. shall not be hurt—Greek, "shall not by any means (or possibly) be hurt." the second death—"the lake of fire." "The death in life of the lost, as contrasted with the life in death of the saved." [TRENCH.] The phrase "the second death" is peculiar to the Apocalypse. What matter about the first death, which sooner or later must pass over us, if we escape the second death? "It seems that they who die that death shall be hurt by it; whereas, if it were annihilation, and so a conclusion of their torments, it would be no way hurtful, but highly beneficial to them. But the living torments are the second death." [BISHOP PEARSON.] "The life of the damned is death." [AUGUSTINE.] Smyrna (meaning myrrh) yielded its sweet perfume, in being bruised even to death. Myrrh was used in embalming dead bodies (John 19. 39); was an ingredient in the holy anointing oil (Exodus 30. 23); a perfume of the heavenly Bridegroom (Psalm 45. 8), and of the bride (Song of Solomon 3. 6). "Affliction, like it, is bitter for the time being, but salutary; preserving the elect from corruption, and seasoning them for immortality, and gives scope for the exercise of the fragrantly-breathing Christian virtues." [VITRINGA.] POLYCARP'S noble words to his heathen judges who wished him to recant, are well known: "Fourscore and six years have I served the Lord, and He never wronged me, how then can I blaspheme my King and Saviour?" Smyrna's faithfulness is rewarded by its candlestick not having been removed out of its place (v. 5); Christianity has never wholly left it; whence the Turks call it "Infidel Smyrna." 12. TRENCH prefers writing Pergamus, or rather, Pergamum, on the river Caicus. It was capital of Attalus the Second's kingdom, which was bequeathed by him to the Romans, B. C. 133. Famous for its library, founded by Eumenes (197-159), and destroyed by Caliph Omar. Parchment, i. e., Pergamena charta, was here discovered for book purposes. Also, famous for the magnificent temple of Esculapius, the healing god. [TACITUS, Annals, 3. 63.] he which hath the sharp sword with two edges—Appropriate to His address having a twofold bearing, a searching power so as to convict and convert some (v. 13, 17), and to convict and condemn to punishment others (v. 14-16, especially v. 16; cf. also Note, ch. 1. 16). 13. I know thy works—Two oldest MSS. omit this clause; one oldest MS. retains it. Satan's seat—rather as the Greek is translated all through Revelation, "throne." Satan, in impious mimicry of God's heavenly throne, sets up his earthly throne (ch. 4. 2). Esculapius was worshipped there under the serpent form; and Satan, the old serpent, as the instigator (cf. v. 10) of fanatical devotees of Esculapius, and, through them, of the supreme magistracy at Pergamos, persecuted one of the Lord's people (Antipas) even to death. Thus, this address is an anticipatory preface to ch. 12. 1-17; Note, "throne . . . the dragon, Satan . . . war with her seed," 5. 9, 17. even in those days—Two oldest MSS. omit "even;" two retain it. wherein—Two oldest MSS. omit this (then translate, "in the days of Antipas, my faithful witness," or "martyr"); two retain it. Two oldest MSS. read, "My witness, MY faithful one;" two read as English Version. Antipas is another form for Antipater. SIMEON METAPHRASTES has a palpably legendary story, unknown to the early Fathers, that Antipas, in Domitian's reign, was shut up in a red-hot brazen bull, and ended his life in thanksgivings and prayers. HENGSTENBERG makes the name, like other apocalyptic names, symbolical, meaning one standing out "against all" for Christ's sake. 14. few—in comparison of the many tokens of thy faithfulness. hold the doctrine of Balaam—"the teaching of Balaam," viz., that which he "taught Balak." Cf. "the counsel of Balaam," Numbers 31. 16. Balak is dative in the Greek, whence BENGEL translates, "taught (the Moabites) for (i. e., to please) Balak." But though in Numbers it is not expressly said he taught Balak, yet there is nothing said inconsistent with his having done so; and JOSEPHUS, Antiquities, 4. 6. 6, says he did so. The dative is a Hebraism for the accusative. children—Greek, "sons of Israel," stumbling-block—lit., that part of a trap on which the bait was laid, and which, when touched, caused the trap to close on its prey; then any entanglement to the foot. [TRENCH.] eat things sacrificed unto idols—the act common to the Israelites of old, and the Nicolaitanes in St. John's day; he does not add what was peculiar to the Israelites, viz., that they sacrificed to idols. The temptation to eat idol meats was a peculiarly strong one to the Gentile converts. For not to do so involved almost a withdrawal from partaking of any social meal with the heathen around. For idol meats, after a part had been offered in sacrifice, were nearly sure to be on the heathen entertainer's table; so much so, that the Greek "to kill" (thuein) meant originally "to sacrifice." Hence arose the decree of the council of Jerusalem forbidding to eat such meats; subsequently some at Corinth ate unscrupulously and knowingly of such meats, on the ground that the idol is nothing; others needlessly tortured themselves with scruples, lest unknowingly they should eat of them, when they got meat from the market, or in a heathen friend's house. St. Paul handles the question, 1 Corinthians 8, and 10, 25-33. fornication—often connected with idolatry. 15. thou—Emphatical: "So THOU also hast," &c. As Balak and the Moabites of old had Balaam and his followers literally, so hast thou also them that hold the same Balaamite or Nicolaitane doctrine spiritually or symbolically. Literal eating of idol meats and fornication in Pergamos, were accompanied by spiritual idolatry and fornication. So TRENCH explains. But I prefer taking it, "Thou also," as well as Ephesus ("in like manner" as Ephesus; see below the oldest reading), hast . . . Nicolaitanes, with this important difference, Ephesus, as a Church, hates them, and casts them out, but thou "hast them," viz., in the Church. doctrine—teaching (Note, v. 6): viz., to tempt God's people to idolatry. which thing I hate—It is sin not to hate what God hates. The Ephesian Church (v. 6) had this point of superiority to Pergamos. But the three oldest MSS., and Vulgate and Syriac, read instead of "which I hate," "IN LIKE MANNER." 16. The three oldest MSS. read, "Repent, therefore." Not only the Nicolaitanes, but the whole Church of Pergamos is called on to repent of not having hated the Nicolaitane teaching and practice. Contrast St. Paul, Acts 20, 26. I will come—I am coming. fight against them—Greek, "war with them:" with the Nicolaitanes primarily; but including also chastisement of the whole Church at Pergamos: cf. "unto THEE," with the sword of my mouth—Resumed from ch. 1, 16, but with an allusion to the drawn sword with which the angel of the Lord confronted Balaam on his way to curse Israel: an earnest of the sword by which he and the seduced Israelites fell at last. The spiritual Balaamites of St. John's day are to be smitten with the Lord's spiritual sword, the word or "rod of His mouth." 17. to eat—Omitted in the three oldest MSS. the hidden manna—the heavenly food of Israel, in contrast to the idol meats (v. 14). A pot of manna was laid up in the holy place "before the testimony." The allusion is here to this: probably also to the Lord's discourse (John 6, 31-35). Translate, "The manna which is hidden." As the manna hidden in the sanctuary was by Divine power preserved from corruption, so Christ in His incorruptible body has passed into the heavens, and is hidden there until the time of His appearing. Christ Himself is the manna "hidden" from the world, but revealed to the believer, so that he has already a foretaste of His preciousness. Cf. as to Christ's own hidden food on earth, John 4, 32, 34, and Job 23, 12. The full manifestation shall be at His coming. Believers are now hidden, even as their meat is hidden. As the manna in the sanctuary, unlike the other manna, was incorruptible, so the spiritual feast offered to all who reject the world's dainties for Christ is everlasting: an incorruptible body and life for ever in Christ at the resurrection. white stone . . . new name . . . no man knoweth saving he, &c.—TRENCH's explanation seems best. White is the colour and livery of heaven. "New" implies something altogether renewed and heavenly. The white stone is a glistering diamond, the Urim borne by the high priest within the choschen or breastplate of judgment, with the *twelve tribes' names on the twelve precious stones, next the heart. The word Urim means light, answering to the colour white. None but the high priest knew the name written upon it, probably the incommunicable name of God, "Jehovah." The high priest consulted it in some divinely-appointed way to get direction from God when needful. The "new name" is Christ's (cf. ch. 3, 12, "I will write upon him my new name"); some new revelation of Himself which shall hereafter be imparted to His people, and which they alone are capable of receiving. The connection with the "hidden manna" will thus be clear, as none save the high priest had access to the "manna hidden" in the sanctuary. Believers, as spiritual priests unto God, shall enjoy the heavenly antitypes to the hidden manna and the Urim stone. What they had peculiarly to contend against at Pergamos was the temptation to idol meats, and fornication, put in their way by Balaamites. As Phineas was rewarded with "an everlasting priesthood" for his zeal against these very sins to which the Old Testament Balaam seduced Israel; so the heavenly high priesthood is the reward promised here to those zealous against the New Testament Balaamites tempting Christ's people to the same sins. receiveth it—viz., "the stone;" not "the new name;" see above. The "name that no man knew but Christ Himself," He shall hereafter reveal to his people. 18. Thyatira—in Lydia, south of Pergamos. Lydia, the purple-seller of this city, having been converted at Philippi, a Macedonian city (with which Thyatira, as being a Macedonian colony, had naturally much intercourse), was probably the instrument of first carrying the Gospel to her native town. John follows the geographical order here, for Thyatira lay a little to the left of the road from Pergamos to Sardis (STRABO, 13, 4). Son of God . . . eyes like . . . fire . . . feet . . . like fine brass—or "glowing brass" (Note, ch. 1, 14, 15, whence this description is resumed). Again His attributes accord with His address. The title "Son of God," is from Psalm 2, 7, 9, which is referred to in v. 27. The attribute, "eyes like flame," &c., answers to v. 23, "I am He which searcheth the reins and hearts." The attribute, "feet like . . . brass," answers to v. 27, "as the vessels of a potter shall they be broken to shivers," He treading them to pieces with His strong feet. 19. The oldest MSS. transpose the English Version order, and read, "Faith and service." The four are subordinate to "thy works;" thus, "I know thy works, even the love and the faith (these two forming one pair, as 'faith works by love,' Galatians 5, 6), and the service (ministration to the suffering members of the Church, and to all in spiritual or temporal need), and the endurance of (i. e., shown by) thee" (this pronoun belongs to all four). As love is inward, so service is its outward manifestation. Similarly, faith and persevering endurance, or "patient continuance (the same Greek as here, Romans 2, 7) in well-doing," are connected. and thy works; and the last—Omit the second "and," with the three oldest MSS. and the ancient versions; translate, "And (I know) thy works which are last (to be) more in number than the first;" realizing 1 Thessalonians 4, 1; the converse of Matthew 12, 45; 2 Peter 2, 20. Instead of retrograding from "the first works" and "first love," as Ephesus, Thyatira's last works exceeded her first (v. 4, 5). 20. a few things—Omitted in the three oldest MSS. Translate then, "I have against thee that," &c. sufferest—The three oldest MSS. read, "lettest alone." that woman—Two oldest MSS. read, "THY wife;" two omit it. Vulgate and most ancient versions read as English Version. The symbolical Jezebel was to the Church of Thyatira what Jezebel, Ahab's "wife," was to him. Some self-styled prophetess (or as the feminine in Hebrew is often used collectively to express a multitude, a set of false prophets), as closely attached to the Church of Thyatira as a wife is to a husband, and as powerfully influencing for evil that Church as Jezebel did Ahab. As Balaam, in Israel's early history, so Jezebel, daughter of Eth-baal, king of Sidon (1 Kings 16, 31, formerly priest of Astarte, and murderer of his predecessor on the throne, JOSEPHUS, Contra Apion, 1, 18), was the great seducer to idolatry in Israel's later history. Like her father, she was swift to shed blood. Wholly given to Baal-worship, like

Eth-baal, whose name expresses his idolatry, she, with her strong will, seduced the weak Ahab and Israel beyond the calf-worship (which was a worship of the true God under the cherub-ox form, i. e., a violation of the second commandment) to that of Baal (a violation of the first commandment also). She seems to have been herself a priestess and prophetess of Baal. Cf. 2 Kings 9. 22, 30, "whoredoms of . . . Jezebel and her witchcrafts" (impurity was part of the worship of the Phœnician Astarte, or Venus). Her spiritual counterpart at Thyatira lured God's "servants" by pretended utterances of inspiration to the same libertinism, fornication, and eating of idol meats, as the Balaamites and Nicolaitanes (v. 6, 14, 15). By a false spiritualism these seducers led their victims into the grossest carnality, as though things done in the flesh were outside the true man, and were, therefore, indifferent. "The deeper the Church penetrated into heathenism, the more she herself became heathenish; this prepares us for the expressions 'harlot' and 'Babylon,' applied to her afterwards." [AUBERLEN.] to teach and to seduce—The three oldest MSS. read, "And she teaches and seduces," or "deceives." "Thyatira was just the reverse of Ephesus. There, much zeal for orthodoxy, but little love; here, activity of faith and love, but insufficient zeal for godly discipline and doctrine, a patience of error even where there was not a participation in it." [TRENCH.] 21. space—Greek, "time." of her fornication . . . she repented not—The three oldest MSS. read, "And she willeth not to repent (lit., out of, i. e., so as to come out of) her fornication." Here there is a transition from literal to spiritual fornication, as appears from v. 22. The idea arose from Jehovah's covenant relation to the Old Testament Church being regarded as a marriage, any transgression against which was, therefore, harlotry, fornication, or adultery. 22. Behold—Calling attention to her awful doom to come. I will—Greek present, "I cast her," a bed—The place of her sin shall be the place of her punishment. The bed of her sin shall be her bed of sickness and anguish. Perhaps a pestilence was about to be sent. Or the bed of the grave, and of the hell beyond, where the worm dieth not. them that commit adultery with her—spiritually; including both the eating of idol meats and fornication. "With her," in the Greek, implies participation with her in her adulteries, viz., by suffering her (v. 20), or letting her alone, and so virtually encouraging her. Her punishment is distinct from theirs; she is to be cast into a bed, and her children to be killed; whilst those who make themselves partakers of her sin by tolerating her, are to be cast into great tribulation. except they repent—Greek aorist, "repent" at once; shall have repented by the time limited in my purpose. their deeds—Two of the oldest MSS. and most ancient versions read "her." Thus, God's true servants, who by connivance, are incurring the guilt of her deeds, are distinguished from her. One oldest MS., ANDREAS, and CYPRIAN, support "their." 23. her children—(Isaiah 57. 3; Ezekiel 23. 45, 47.) Her proper adherents; not those who suffer her, but those who are begotten of her. A distinct class from the last in v. 22 (cf. Note there), whose sin was less direct, being that only of connivance. kill . . . with death—Cf. the disaster that overtook the literal Jezebel's votaries of Baal, and Ahab's sons, 1 Kings 18. 40; 2 Kings 10. 6, 7, 24, 25. Kill with death is a Hebraism for slay with most sure and awful death; so "dying thou shalt die" (Genesis 2. 17). Not "die the common death of men" (Numbers 16. 29). all the churches shall know—Implying that these addresses are designed for the catholic Church of all ages and places. So palpably shall God's hand be seen in the judgment on Thyatira, that the whole Church shall recognize it as God's doing. I am he—the "I" is strongly emphatical; "that it is I am He who," &c. searcheth . . . hearts—God's peculiar attribute is given to Christ. The "reins" are the seat of the desires; the "heart," that of the thoughts. The Greek for "searcheth" expresses an accurate following up of all tracks and windings. unto every one of you—lit., "unto you, to each," &c. according to your works—to be judged not according to the mere act as it appears to man, but with reference to the motive, faith and love being the only motives which God recognizes as sound. 24. you . . . and . . . the rest—The three oldest MSS. omit "and;" translate then, "Unto you, the rest," as many as have not—not only do not hold, but are free from contact with, and which—The oldest MSS. omit "and;" translate, "whosoever." the depths—These false prophets boasted peculiarly of their knowledge of mysteries and the deep things of God; pretensions subsequently expressed by their arrogant title, Gnostics ("full of knowledge"). The Spirit here declares their so-called "depths" (viz., of knowledge of Divine things) to be really "depths of Satan;" just as in v. 9, He says, instead of "the synagogue of God," "the synagogue of Satan." HENGSTENBERG thinks the teachers themselves professed to fathom the depths of Satan, giving loose rein to fleshly lusts, without being hurt thereby. They who thus think to fight Satan with his own weapons always find him more than a match for them. The words, "as they speak," i. e., "as they call them," coming after not only "depths," but "depths of Satan," seem to favour this latter view, otherwise I should prefer the former, in which case, "as they speak," or "call them," must refer to "depths" only, not also "depths of Satan." The original sin of Adam was a desire to know EVIL as well as good; so in HENGSTENBERG'S view, those who professed to know "the depths of Satan." It is the prerogative of God alone to know evil fully, without being hurt or defiled by it. I will put—Two oldest MSS. have "I put," or "cast." One oldest MS. reads as English Version, none other burden—save abstinence from, and protestation against, these abominations; no "depths" beyond your reach, such as they teach, no new doctrine, but the old faith and rule of practice once for all delivered to the saints. Exaggerating and perfecting Paul's doctrine of grace without the law as the source of justification and sanctification, these false prophets rejected the law as a rule of life, as though it were an intolerable "burden." But it is a "light" burden. In Acts 15. 28, 29, the very term "burden," as here, is used of abstinence from fornication and idol meats; to this the Lord here refers. 25. that which ye have already—(Judg 3, end.) hold fast—do not let go from your grasp, however false teachers may wish to wrest it from you. till I come—when your conflict with evil will be at an end. The Greek implies uncertainty as to when He shall come. 26. And—Implying the close connection of the promise to the conqueror that follows, with the preceding exhortation, v. 25. and keepeth—Greek, "and he that keepeth." Cf. the same word in the passage already alluded to by the Lord, Acts 15. 28, 29, end. my works—in contrast to "her (English Version, their) works" (v. 22). The works which I command, and which are the fruit of my Spirit. unto the end—(Matthew 24. 13.) The image is perhaps from the race, wherein it is not enough to enter the lists, but the runner must persevere to the end. give power—Greek, "authority," over the nations—at Christ's coming the saints shall possess the kingdom "under the whole heaven;" therefore over this earth; cf. Luke 19. 17, "Have thou authority (the same word as here) over ten cities." 27. From Psalm 2. 8, 9, rule—lit., "rule as a shepherd." In Psalm 2. 9 it is, "Thou shalt break them with a rod of iron." The LXX. pointing the Hebrew word differently, read as Revelation here. The English Version of Psalm 2. 9 is doubtless right, as the parallel word, "dash in pieces," proves. But the Spirit in this case sanctions the additional thought as true, that the Lord shall mingle mercy to some, with judgment on others; beginning by destroying His Antichristian foes, He shall reign in love over the rest. "Christ shall rule them with a sceptre of iron, to make them capable of being ruled with a sceptre of gold; severity first, that grace may come after" [TRENCH, who thinks we ought to translate "SCEPTRE" for "rod," as in Hebrews 1. 8]. "Shepherd" is used in Jeremiah 6. 3, of hostile rulers; so also Zechariah 11. 16. As severity here is the primary thought, "rule as a shepherd" seems to me to be used thus: He who would have shepherded them with a pastoral rod, shall, because of their hardened unbelief, shepherd them with a rod of Iron, shall they be broken.—So one oldest MS., Vulgate, Syriac, and Coptic Versions read. But two oldest MSS. read, "As the vessels of a potter are broken to shivers." A potter's vessel dashed to pieces, because of its failing to answer the design of the maker, is the image to depict God's sovereign power to give reprobates to destruction, not by caprice, but in the exercise of His righteous judgment. The salnts shall be in Christ's victorious "armies" when He shall inflict the last decisive blow, and afterwards shall reign with Him. Having by faith "overcome the world," they shall also rule the world. even as I—"as I also have received of (from) my Father," viz., in Psalm 2. 7-9. Jesus had refused to receive the kingdom without the cross at Satan's hands; He would receive it from none but the Father, who had appointed the cross as the path to the crown. As the Father has given the authority to, me over the heathen and uttermost parts of the earth, so I impart a share of It to my victorious disciple. 28. the morning star—i. e., I will give unto him Myself, who am "the morning star" (ch. 22. 16); so that reflecting my perfect brightness, he shall shine like Me, the morning star, and share my kingly glory (of which a star is the symbol, Numbers 21. 17; Matthew 2. 2). Cf. v. 17, "I will give him . . . the hidden manna," i. e., Myself, who am that manna (John 6. 31-33):

CHAPTER III.

Ver. 1-22. THE EPISTLES TO SARDIS, PHILADELPHIA, AND LAODICEA. 1. Sardis—the ancient capital of Lydia, the kingdom of wealthy Croesus, on the river Pactolus. The address to this Church is full of rebuke. It does not seem to have been in vain; for Melito, bishop of Sardis in the second century, was eminent for piety and learning. He visited Palestine to assure himself and his flock as to the Old Testament canon, and wrote an epistle on the subject [EUSEBIUS, 4. 26]; he also wrote a commentary on the Apocalypse. [EUSEBIUS, 4. 26; JEROME, Catalogus Scriptorum Ecclesiasticorum, 24.] he that hath the seven Spirits of God—i. e., he who hath all the fulness of the Spirit (ch. 1. 4; 4. 5; 5. 6, with which cf. Zechariah 3. 9; 4. 10, proving His Godhead). This attribute implies His infinite power by the Spirit to convict of sin and of a hollow profession. and the seven stars—(Ch. 1. 16, 20.) His having the seven stars, or presiding ministers, flows, as a consequence, from His having the seven Spirits, or the fulness of the Holy Spirit. The human ministry is the fruit of Christ's sending down the gifts of the Spirit. Stars imply brilliancy and glory; the fulness of the Spirit, and the fulness of brilliant light in Him, form a designed contrast to the formality which He reproves. name . . . livest . . . dead—(1 Timothy 5. 6; 2 Timothy 3. 5; Titus 1. 16; cf. Ephesians 2. 1, 5; 5. 14.) "A name," i. e., a reputation. Sardis was famed among the churches for spiritual vitality; yet the Heart-searcher, who seeth not as man seeth, pronounces her dead; how great searchings of heart should her case create among even the best of us! Laodicea deceived herself as to her true state (v. 17), but it is not written that she had a high name among the other churches, as Sardis had. 2. Be—Greek, "Become," what thou art not, "watchful," or "wakeful," lit., "walking." the things which remain—Strengthen those thy remaining few graces, which, in thy spiritual deadly slumber, are not yet quite extinct. [ALFORD.] "The things that remain" can hardly mean "the PERSONS that are not yet dead, but are ready to die;" for v. 4 implies that the "few" faithful ones at Sardis were not "ready to die," but were full of life. are—The two oldest MSS. read, "were ready," lit., "were about to die," viz., at the time when you "strengthen" them. This implies that "thou art dead," v. 1, is to be taken with limitation; for those must have some life who are told to strengthen the things that remain. perfect—lit., "filled up in full complement;" translate, "complete." Weighed in the balance of Him who requires living faith as the motive of works, and found wanting. before God—Greek, "In the sight of God." The three oldest MSS., Vulgate, Syriac, and Coptic, read, "before (in the sight of) MY God;" Christ's judgment is God the Father's judgment. In the sight of men, Sardis had "a name of living;" "so many and so great are the obligations of pastors, that he who would in reality fulfil even a third of them, would be esteemed holy by men, whereas, if content with that alone, he would be sure not to escape hell." [JUAN D'AVILA.] Note, in Sardis and Laodicea alone of the seven we read of no conflict with foes within or without the Church. Not that either had renounced the appearance of opposition to the world; but neither had the faithfulness to witness for God by word and example, so as to "torment them that dwelt on the earth" (ch. 11. 10). 3. how thou hast received—(Colossians 2. 6; 1 Thessalonians 4. 1; 1 Timothy 6. 20.) What Sardis is to "remember" is, not how joyfully she had received originally the Gospel message, but how the precious deposit was committed to her originally, so that she could not say, she had not "received and heard" It. The Greek is not aorist (as in ch. 2. 4, as to Ephesus, "Thou didst leave thy first love"), but "thou hast received" (perfect), and still hast the permanent deposit of doctrine committed to thee. The word "keep" (so the Greek is for English Version, "hold fast") which follows, accords with this sense. "Keep" or observe the commandment which thou hast received and didst hear. heard—Greek aorist, "didst hear," viz., when the Gospel doctrine was committed to thee. TRENCH explains "how," with what demonstration of the Spirit and power from Christ's ambassadors the truth came to you, and how heartily and zealously you at first received it. Similarly BENGEL, "Regard to her former character (how it once stood) ought to guard Sardis against the future hour, whatsoever it shall be, proving fatal to her." But it is not likely that the Spirit repeats the same exhortation virtually to Sardis as to Ephesus. if therefore—seeing thou art so warned, if, nevertheless, &c. come on thee as a thief—in special judgment on thee as a Church, with the same stealthiness and as unexpectedly as shall be my visible second coming. As the thief gives no notice of his approach. Christ applies the language which in its fullest sense describes His second coming, to describe His coming in special judgments on churches and states (as Jerusalem, Matthew 24.), these special judgments being anticipatory earnestness of that great last coming. "The last day is hidden from us, that every day may be observed by us." [AUGUSTINE.] Twice Christ in the days of His flesh spake the same words (Matthew 24. 42, 43; Luke 12. 39, 40); and so deeply had His words been engraven on the minds of the apostles, that they are often repeated in their writings (ch. 16. 15; 1 Thessalonians 5. 2, 4, 6; 2 Peter 3. 10). The Greek proverb was that "the feet of the avenging deities are shod with wool," expressing the noiseless approach of the Divine judgments, and their possible nearness at the moment when they were supposed the farthest off. [TRENCH.] 4. The three oldest MSS. prefix "but," or "nevertheless" (notwithstanding thy spiritual deadness), and omit "even." names—persons named in the book of life (v. 5) known by name by the Lord as His own. These had the reality corresponding to their name; not a mere name among men as living, whilst really dead (v. 1). The gracious Lord does not overlook any exceptional cases of real saints in the midst of unreal professors. not defiled their garments—viz., the garments of their Christian profession, of which baptism is the initiatory seal, whence the candidates for baptism used in the ancient Church to be arrayed in white. Cf. also Ephesians 5. 27, as to the spotlessness of the Church when she shall be presented to Christ; and ch. 19. 8, as to the "fine linen, clean and white, the righteousness of the saints," in which it shall be granted to her to be arrayed; and "the wedding garment." Meanwhile she is not to sully her Christian profession with any defilement of flesh or spirit, but to "keep her garments." For no defilement shall enter the heavenly city. Not that any keep themselves here wholly free from defilement; but, as compared with hollow professors, the godly keep themselves unspotted from the world; and when they do contract it, they wash it away, so as to have their "robes white in the blood of the Lamb" (ch. 7. 14). The Greek is not "to stain" Greek miatnein), but to

"defile," or besmear (Greek motunein), Song of Solomon 5. 3. they shall walk with me in white—The promised reward accords with the character of those to be rewarded: keeping their garments undefiled and white through the blood of the Lamb now, they shall walk with Him in white hereafter. On "with me," cf. the very same words, Luke 23. 43; John 17. 24. "Walk" implies spiritual life, for only the living walk; also liberty, for it is only the free who walk at large. The grace and dignity of flowing long garments is seen to best advantage when the person "walks:" so the graces of the saint's manifested character shall appear fully when he shall serve the Lord perfectly hereafter (ch. 22. 3). they are worthy—with the worthiness (not their own, but that) which Christ has put on them (ch. 7. 14). Ezekiel 16. 14, "perfect through my comeliness which I had put upon thee." Grace is glory in the bud. "The worthiness here denotes a congruity between the saint's state of grace on earth, and that of glory, which the Lord has appointed for them, about to be estimated by the law itself of grace" [VITRINGA]. Contrast Acts 13. 46. 5. white—not a dull white, but glittering, dazzling white. [GROTIVS.] Cf. Matthew 13. 43. The body transfigured into the likeness of Christ's body, and emitting beams of light reflected from Him, is probably the "white raiment" promised here. the same—Greek, "THIS man;" he and he alone. So one oldest MS. reads. But two oldest MSS., and most of the ancient versions, "shall TRUS be clothed," &c. raiment—Greek, "garments." "He that overcometh" shall receive the same reward as they who "have not defiled their garments" (v. 4); therefore the two are identical. I will not—Greek, "I will not by any means." blot out . . . name out of . . . book of life—of the heavenly city. A register was kept in ancient cities of their citizens: the names of the dead were of course erased. So those who have a name that they live and are dead (v. 1), are blotted out of God's roll of the heavenly citizens and heirs of eternal life; not that in God's electing decree they ever were in His book of life. But, according to human conceptions, those who had a high name for piety would be supposed to be in it, and were, in respect to privileges, actually among those in the way of salvation; but these privileges, and the fact that they once might have been saved, shall be of no avail to them. As to the book of life, cf. ch. 13. 8; 17. 8; 20. 12, 15; 21. 27; Exodus 32. 32; Psalm 69. 28; Daniel 12. 1. In the sense of the call, many are enrolled among the called to salvation, who shall not be found among the chosen at last. The pale of salvation is wider than that of election. Election is fixed. Salvation is open to all, and is pending (humanly speaking) in the case of those mentioned here. But ch. 20. 15; 21. 27, exhibit the book of the elect alone in the narrower sense, after the erasure of the others. before . . . before—Greek, "in the presence of." Cf. the same promise of Christ's confessing before His Father, &c., those who confessed Him, Matthew 10. 32, 33; Luke 12. 8, 9. He omits "in heaven" after "my Father," because there is now that He is in heaven, no contrast between the Father in heaven and the Son on earth. He now sets His seal from heaven upon many of His words uttered on earth. [TRENCH.] An undesigned coincidence, proving that these epistles are, as they profess, in their words, as well as substance, Christ's own addresses; not even tinged with the colour of John's style, such as it appears in his Gospel and Epistles. The coincidence is mainly with the three other Gospels, and not with John's, which makes the coincidence more markedly undesigned. So also the clause, "He that hath an ear, let him hear," is not repeated from John's Gospel, but from the Lord's own words in the three synoptic Gospels (Matthew 11. 15; 13. 9; Mark 4. 9, 23; 7. 16; Luke 8. 8; 14. 35). 6. (Cf. Note, ch. 2. 7.) 7. Philadelphia—in Lydia, twenty-eight miles south-east of Sardis, built by Attalus Philadelphus, king of Pergamos, who died 138 A. D. It was nearly destroyed by an earthquake in the reign of Tiberius. [TACITUS, Annals, 2. 47.] The connection of this Church with Jews there causes the address to it to have an Old Testament colouring in the images employed. It and Smyrna alone of the seven receive unmixed praise. he that is holy—as in the Old Testament, "the Holy One of Israel." Thus Jesus and the God of the Old Testament are one. None but God is absolutely holy (Greek hagios, separate from evil, and perfectly hating it). In contrast to "the synagogue of Satan" (v. 9) true—Greek alethinos: VERY God, as distinguished from false gods, and from all those who say that they are what they are not (v. 9); real, genuine. Furthermore, He perfectly realizes all that is involved in the names, God, Light (John 1. 9; 1 John 2. 8), Bread (John 6. 32), the Vine (John 15. 1); as distinguished from all typical, partial, and imperfect realizations of the idea. His nature answers to His name (John 17. 3; 1 Thessalonians 1. 9). The Greek alethes, on the other hand, is truth-speaking, truth-loving (John 3. 33; Titus 1. 2). he that hath the key of David—the antitype of Eliakim, to whom the "key," the emblem of authority "over the house of David," was transferred from Shebna, who was removed from the office of chamberlain or treasurer, as unworthy of it. Christ, the Heir of the throne of David, shall supplant all the less worthy stewards who have abused their trust in God's spiritual house, and "shall reign over the house of Jacob," literal and spiritual (Luke 1. 32, 33), "for ever," "as a Son over His own house" (Hebrews 3. 2-6). It rests with Christ to open or shut the heavenly palace, deciding who is, and who is not, to be admitted: as He also opens, or shuts, the prison, having the keys of hell (the grave) and death (ch. 1. 18). The power of the keys was given to Peter and the other apostles, only when, and in so far as, Christ made him and them infallible. Whatever degrees of this power may have been committed to ministers, the supreme power belongs to Christ alone. Thus Peter rightly opened the Gospel door to the Gentiles (Acts 10.; 11. 17, 18; especially 14. 27, end). But he wrongly tried to shut the door in part again (Galatians 2. 11-18). Eliakim had "the key of the house of David laid upon his shoulder:" Christ, as the antitypical David, Himself has the key of the supreme "government upon His shoulder." His attribute here, as in the former addresses, accords with His promise. Though "the synagogue of Satan," false "Jews" (v. 9) try to "shut" the "door" which I "set open before thee;" "no man can shut it" (v. 8). shuttest—So Vulgate and Syriac Versions read. But the four oldest MSS. read, "shall shut:" so Coptic Version and ORIGEN. shuttest, and no man openeth—Two oldest MSS., B, S, Coptic Version, and ORIGEN read, "shall open." Two oldest MSS., A, C, and Vulgate Version, support English Version reading. 8. I have set—Greek, "given:" it is my gracious gift to thee, open door—for evangelization; a door of spiritual usefulness. The opening of a door by Him to the Philadelphia Church accords with the previous assignation to Him of "the key of David." and—The three oldest MSS., A, B, C, and ORIGEN read, "which no man can shut." for—"because." a little—This gives the idea that Christ says, He sets before Philadelphia an open door because she has some little strength; whereas the sense rather is, He does so because she has "but little strength;" being consciously weak herself, she is the fitter object for God's power to rest on [so AQUINAS], that so the Lord Christ may have all the glory. and hast kept—and so, the littleness of thy strength becoming the source of Almighty power to thee, as leading thee to rest wholly on my great power, thou hast kept my word. GROTIVS makes "little strength" to mean that she had a Church small in numbers and external resources: "a little flock poor in worldly goods, and of small account in the eyes of men." [TRENCH.] So ALFORD. I prefer the view given above. The Greek verbs are in the aorist tense: "Thou didst keep . . . didst not deny my name:" alluding to some particular occasion when her faithfulness was put to the test. 9. I will make—Greek present, "I make," lit., "I give" (Note, v. 8). The promise to Philadelphia is larger than that to Smyrna. To Smyrna the promise was that "the synagogue of Satan" should not prevail against the faithful in her: to Philadelphia, that she should even win over some of "the synagogue of Satan" to fall on their faces and confess God is in her of a truth. Translate, "(some) of the synagogue." For until Christ shall come, and all Israel then be saved, there is but "a remnant" being gathered out of the Jews "according to the election of grace." This is an instance of how Christ set before her an "open door," some of her greatest adversaries, the Jews, being brought to the obedience of the faith. Their worshipping before her feet expresses the convert's willingness to take the very lowest place in the Church, doing servile honour to those whom once they persecuted, rather than dwell with the ungodly. So the Philippian jailer before Paul. 10. patience—"endurance." "The word of my endurance" is my Gospel-word, which teaches patient endurance in expectation of my coming (ch. 1. 9). My endurance is the endurance which I require, and which I practise. Christ Himself now endures, patiently waiting until the usurper be cast out, and all "His enemies be made his footstool." So, too, His Church, for the joy before her of sharing His coming kingdom, endures patiently. Hence, in v. 11, follows, "Behold, I come quickly." I also—The reward is in kind: "because thou didst keep," &c., "I also (on my side) will keep thee," &c. from—Greek, "(so as to deliver thee) out of," not to exempt from temptation. the hour of temptation—the appointed season of affliction and temptation (so in Deuteronomy 4. 34 the plagues are called "the temptations of Egypt"), lit., "the temptation;" the sore temptation which is coming on: the time of great tribulation before Christ's second coming. to try them that dwell upon the earth—those who are of earth, earthy (ch. 8. 13). "Dwell" implies that their home is earth, not heaven. All mankind, except the elect (ch. 13. 8, 14). The temptation brings out the fidelity of those kept by Christ, and hardens the unbelieving reprobates (ch. 9. 20, 21; 16. 11, 21). The particular persecutions which befell Philadelphia shortly after, were the earnest of the great last tribulation before Christ's coming, to which the Church's attention in all ages is directed. 11. Behold—Omitted by the three oldest MSS. and most ancient versions. I come quickly—the great incentive to persevering faithfulness, and the consolation under present trials. that . . . which thou hast—"The word of my patience," or "endurance" (v. 10), which He had just commended them for keeping, and which involved with it the attaining of the kingdom; this they would lose if they yielded to the temptation of exchanging consistency and suffering for compromise and ease. that no man take thy crown—which otherwise thou wouldst receive: that no tempter cause thee to lose it: not that the tempter would thus secure it for himself (Colossians 2. 18). 12. pillar in the temple—In one sense there shall be "no temple" in the heavenly city, because there shall be no distinction of things into sacred and secular, for all things and persons shall be holy to the Lord. The city shall be all one great temple, in which the saints shall be not merely stones, as in the spiritual temple now on earth, but all eminent as pillars: immovably firm (unlike Philadelphia, the city which was so often shaken by earthquakes, STRABO, 12. and 13.), like the colossal pillars before Solomon's temple, Boaz (i. e., "In it is strength") and Jachin ("It shall be established"): only that those pillars were outside, these shall be within the temple. my God—(Note, ch. 2. 7.) go no more out—the Greek is stronger, never more at all. As the elect angels are beyond the possibility of falling, being now under (as the Schoolmen say) "the blessed necessity of goodness," so shall the saints be. The door shall be once for all shut, as well to shut safely in for ever the elect, as to shut out the lost (Matthew 25. 10; John 8. 35; cf. Isaiah 22. 23, the type, Eliakim). They shall be priests for ever unto God (ch. 1. 6). "Who would not yearn for that city out of which no friend departs, and into which no enemy enters?" [AUGUSTINE in TRENCH.] write upon him the name of my God—as belonging to God in a peculiar sense (ch. 7. 3; 9. 4; 11. 1; and especially 23. 4), therefore secure. As the name of Jehovah ("Holiness to the Lord") was on the golden plate on the high priest's forehead (Exodus 28. 36-38); so the saints in their heavenly royal priesthood shall bear His name openly, as consecrated to Him. Cf. the caricature of this in the brand on the forehead of the

beast's followers (ch. 13. 16, 17), and on the harlot (ch. 17. 5; cf. 20. 4). name of the city of my God—as one of its citizens (ch. 21. 2, 3, 10, which is briefly alluded to by anticipation here). The full description of the city forms the appropriate close of the book. The saint's citizenship is now hidden, but then it shall be manifested: he shall have the right to enter in through the gates into the city (ch. 22. 14). This was the city which Abraham looked for. new—Greek, kaines. Not the old Jerusalem, once called "the holy city," but having forfeited the name. Greek nea would express that it had recently come into existence; but Greek kainē, that which is new and different, superseding the worn-out old Jerusalem and its polity. "John, in the Gospel, applies to the old city the Greek name Hierosolyma. But in the Apocalypse, always, to the heavenly city the Hebrew name Hierusalem. The Hebrew name is the original and holier one: the Greek, the recent and more secular and political one." [BENGE.] my new name—at present incommunicable, and only known to God: to be hereafter revealed and made the believer's own in union with God in Christ. Christ's name written on him denotes he shall be wholly Christ's. New also relates to Christ, who shall assume a new character (answering to His "new name") entering with His saints on a kingdom—not that which He had with the Father before the worlds, but that earned by His humiliation as Son of man. Gibbon, the infidel (Decline and Fall, ch. 64), gives an unwilling testimony to the fulfilment of the prophecy as to Philadelphia in a temporal point of view, "Among the Greek colonies and churches of Asia, Philadelphia is still erect, a column in a scene of ruins—a pleasing example that the paths of honour and safety may sometimes be the same." 13. (Note, ch. 2. 7.) 14. Laodiceans—The city was in the south-west of Phrygia, on the river Lycus, not far from Colosse, and lying between it and Philadelphia. It was destroyed by an earthquake, 62 A. D., and rebuilt by its wealthy citizens without the help of the state. [TACITUS, Annals 14. 27.] This wealth (arising from the excellence of its wools) led to a self-satisfied, lukewarm state in spiritual things, as v. 17 describes. See Note on Colossians 4. 16, on the Epistle which is thought to have been written to the Laodicean Church by Paul. The Church in latter times was apparently flourishing; for one of the councils at which the canon of Scripture was determined was held in Laodicea in 361 A. D. Hardly a Christian is now to be found on or near its site. the Amen—(Isaiah 65. 16, Hebrew, "Bless Himself in the God of Amen . . . swear by the God of Amen;" 2 Corinthians 1. 20.) He who not only says, but is, the Truth. The saints used Amen at the end of prayer, or in assenting to the word of God; but none, save the Son of God, ever said, "Amen, I say unto you," for it is the language peculiar to God, who avers by Himself. The New Testament formula, "Amen, I say unto you," is equivalent to the Old Testament formula, "as I live, saith Jehovah." In St. John's Gospel alone He uses (in the Greek) the double "Amen," John 1. 51; 3. 3, &c., in English Version, "Verily, verily." The title happily harmonizes with the address. His unchanging faithfulness as "the Amen" contrasts with Laodicea's wavering of purpose, "neither hot nor cold" (v. 16). The angel of Laodicea has with some probability been conjectured to be Archippus, to whom, thirty years previously, Paul had already given a monition, as needing to be stirred up to diligence in his ministry. So the Apostolic Constitutions, 8. 46, name him as the first bishop of Laodicea: supposed to be the son of Philemon (Philemon 2). faithful and true Witness—As "the Amen" expresses the unchangeable truth of His promises; so "the faithful the true witness," the truth of His revelations as to the heavenly things which He has seen and testifies. "Faithful," i. e., trustworthy (2 Timothy 2. 11, 13). "True" is here (Greek, alethinos) not truth-speaking (Greek, alethes), but "perfectly realizing all that is comprehended in the name Witness" (1 Timothy 6. 13). Three things are necessary for this: (1.) To have seen with his own eyes what He attests; (2.) to be competent to relate it for others; (3.) to be willing truthfully to do so. In Christ all these conditions meet. [TRENCH.] begin- ning of the creation of God—not He whom God created first, but as in Colossians 1. 15-18 (cf. Notes there), the Beginner of all creation, its originating instrument. All creation would not be represented adoring Him, if He were but one of themselves. His being the Creator is a strong guarantee for His faithfulness as "the Witness and Amen." 15. neither cold—The antithesis to "hot," lit., boiling ("fervent," Acts 18. 25; Romans 12. 11; cf. Song of Solomon 8. 6; Luke 24. 32), requires that "cold" should here mean more than negatively cold; it is rather, positively icy cold: having never yet been warmed. The Laodiceans were in spiritual things cold comparatively, but not cold as the world outside, and as those who had never belonged to the Church. The lukewarm state, if it be the transitional stage to a warmer, is a desirable state (for a little religion, if real, is better than none); but most fatal when, as here, an abiding condition, for it is mistaken for a safe state (v. 17). This accounts for Christ's desiring that they were cold rather than lukewarm. For then there would not be the same "danger of mixed motive and disregarded principle." [ALFORD.] Also, there is more hope of the cold, i. e., those who are of the world, and not yet warmed by the Gospel call; for, when called, they may become hot and fervent Christians: such did the once-cold publicans, Zaccheus and Matthew, become. But the lukewarm has been brought within reach of the holy fire, without being heated by it into fervour: having religion enough to lull the conscience in false security, but not religion enough to save the soul: as Demas, 2 Timothy 4. Such were the halters between two opinions in Israel (1 Kings 18. 21; cf. 2 Kings 17. 41; Matthew 6. 24). 16. neither cold nor hot—So one oldest MS., B., and Vulgate read. But two oldest MSS., Syriac, and Coptic, transpose thus, "hot nor cold." It is remarkable that the Greek adjectives are in the masculine, agreeing with the angel, not feminine, agreeing with the Church. The Lord addresses the angel as the embodiment and representative of the Church. The chief minister is answerable for his flock, if he have not faithfully warned the members of it. I will—Greek, "I am about to," "I am ready to:" I have it in my mind: implying graciously the possibility of the threat not being executed, if only they repent at once. His dealings towards them will depend on theirs towards Him. spue thee out of my mouth—reject with righteous loathing, as Canaan spued out its inhabitants for their abominations. Physicians used lukewarm water to cause vomiting. Cold and hot drinks were common at feasts, but never lukewarm. There were hot and cold springs near Laodicea. 17. Self-sufficiency is the fatal danger of a lukewarm state (Note, v. 15). thou savest—virtually and mentally: if not in so many words. increased with goods—Greek, "have become enriched," implying self-praise in self-acquired riches. The Lord alludes to Hosea 12. 8. The riches on which they prided themselves were spiritual riches; though, doubtless, their spiritual self-sufficiency ("I have need of nothing") was much fostered by their worldly wealth; as, on the other hand, poverty of spirit is fostered by poverty in respect to worldly riches. knowest not that thou—in particular, above all others. The "τιου" in the Greek is emphatical. art wretched—Greek, "art the wretched one," miserable—So one oldest MSS. reads. But two oldest MSS. prefix "the." Translate, "the pitiable;" "the one especially to be pitied." How different Christ's estimate of men, from their own estimate of themselves, "I have need of nothing!" blind—whereas Laodicea boasted of a deeper than common insight into Divine things. They were not absolutely blind, else eye-salve would have been of no avail to them; but short-sighted. 18. Gentle and loving irony. Take my advice, thou who fanciest thyself in need of nothing. Not only art thou not in need of nothing, but art in need of the commonest necessities of existence. He graciously stoops to their modes of thought and speech: Thou art a people ready to listen to any counsel as to how to buy to advantage; then, listen to my counsel (for I am "Counsellor," Isaiah 9. 6), "buy of me" (in whom, according to Paul's Epistle written to the neighbouring Colosse, and intended for the Laodicean Church also, Colossians 2. 1, 3; 4. 16, are hidden all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge). "Buy" does not imply that we can, by any work or merit of ours, purchase God's free gift; nay the very purchase-money consists in the renunciation of all self-righteousness, such as Laodicea had (v. 17). "Buy" at the cost of thine own self-sufficiency (so Paul, Philippians 3. 7, 8); and the giving up of all things, however dear to us, that would prevent our receiving Christ's salvation as a free gift, e. g., self and worldly desires. Cf. Isaiah 55. 1, "Buy . . . without money and price," gold tried in—lit., "fired (and fresh) from the fire," i. e., just fresh from the furnace which has proved its purity, and retaining its bright gloss. Sterling spiritual wealth, as contrasted with its counterfeit, in which Laodicea boasted itself. Having bought this gold she will be no longer poor (v. 17). of me—the source of "unsearchable riches" (Ephesians 3. 8). Laodicea was a city of extensive money transactions. [CICERO.] mayest be rich—Greek, ". . . enriched." white raiment—"garments." Laodicea's wools were famous. Christ offers infinitely whiter raiment. As "gold tried in the fire" expresses faith tested by fiery trials; so "white raiment," Christ's righteousness imputed to the believer in justification, and imparted in sanctification. appear—Greek, "be manifested," viz., at the last day, when every one without the wedding-garment shall be discovered. To strip one, is in the East the image of putting to open shame. So also to clothe one with fine apparel is the image of doing him honour. Man can discover his shame, God alone can cover it, so that his nakedness shall not be manifested at last (Colossians 3. 10-14). Blessed is he whose sin is so covered. The hypocrite's shame may be manifested now, it must be so at last. anoint . . . with eye-salve—The oldest MSS. read, "(buy of me) eye-salve (collyrium, a roll of ointment), to anoint thine eyes." Christ has for Laodicea an ointment far more precious than all the costly unguents of the East. The eye is here the conscience or inner light of the mind. According as it is sound and "single" (Greek, haplous, "simple"), or otherwise, the man sees aright spiritually, or does not. The Holy Spirit's unction, like the ancient eye-salve's, first smarts with conviction of sin, then heals. He opens our eyes first to ourselves in our wretchedness, then to the Saviour in His preciousness. TRENCH notices that the most sunken churches of the seven, viz., Sardis and Laodicea, are the ones in which alone are specified no opponents from without, nor heresies from within. The Church owes much to God's overruling Providence which has made so often internal and external foes, in spite of themselves, to promote His cause by calling forth her energies in contending for the faith once delivered to the saints. Peace is dearly bought at the cost of spiritual stagnation, where there is not interest enough felt in religion to contend about it at all. 19. (Job 5. 17; Proverbs 3. 11, 12; Hebrews 12. 5, 6.) So in the case of Manasses (2 Chronicles 33. 11-13). As many—All. "He scourgeth every son whom He receiveth. And shalt thou be an exception? If excepted from suffering the scourge, thou art excepted from the number of the sons." [AUGUSTINE.] This is an encouragement to Laodicea not to despair, but to regard the rebuke as a token for good, if she profit by it. I love—Greek, philo, the love of gratuitous affection, independent of any grounds for esteem in the object loved. But in the case of Philadelphia (v. 9), "I have loved thee" (Greek, agapes) with the love of esteem, founded on the judgment. Cf. Note in my English Gnomon of BENJEL, John 21. 15-17. I rebuke—The "I" in the Greek stands first of the sentence emphatically. I in my dealings, so altogether unlike man's, in the case of all whom I love, rebuke. The Greek elencho is the same verb as in John 16. 8, "(the Holy Ghost) will convince (rebuke unto conviction) the world of sin." chasten—"chastise." The Greek paideu, which in classical Greek means to instruct, in the New Testament means to instruct by chastisement (Hebrews 12. 5, 6). David was rebuked unto conviction, when he cried, "I have sinned against the Lord:" the chastening followed, when his child was taken from him (2 Samuel 12. 13, 14). In the Divine chastening, the sinner at one and the same time winces under the rod and learns righteousness. be zealous—habitually. Present tense in the Greek, of a life-long course of zeal. The opposite of "lukewarm." The Greek by alliteration marks this: Laodicea had not been "hot" (Greek, zestos), she is therefore urged to "be zealous" (Greek, zeleue): both are derived from the same verb, Greek, zeo, to boil. repent—Greek aorist: of an act to be once for all done, and done at once. 20. stand—waiting in wonderful condescension and long-suffering. knock—(Song of Solomon 5. 2.) This is a further manifestation of His loving desire for the sinner's salvation. He who is Himself "the Door," and who bids us "knock" that it may be "opened unto" us, is first Himself to knock at the door of our hearts. If He did not knock first, we should never come to knock at His door. Cf. Song of Solomon 5. 4-6, which is plainly alluded to here; the Spirit thus in Revelation sealing the canonicity of that mystical book. The spiritual state of the bride there, between waking and sleeping, slow to open the door to her Divine lover, answers to that of the lukewarm Laodicea here. "Love in regard to men emptied (humbled) God; for He does not remain in His place and call to Himself the servant whom He loved, but He comes down Himself to seek him, and He who is all-rich arrives at the lodging of the pauper, and with His own voice intimates His yearning love, and seeks a similar return, and withdraws not when disowned, and is not impatient at insult, and when persecuted still waits at the doors." [NICOLAUS CABASILAS in TRENCH.] my voice—He appeals to the sinner not only with His hand (His providences) knocking, but with His voice (His word read or heard; or rather, His Spirit inwardly applying to man's spirit the lessons to be drawn from His providence and His word). If we refuse to answer to His knocking at our door now, He will refuse to hear our knocking at His door hereafter. In respect to His second coming also, He is even now at the door, and we know not how soon He may knock; therefore we should always be ready to open to Him immediately. if any man here—for man is not compelled by irresistible force: Christ knocks, but does not break open the door, though the violent take heaven by the force of prayer (Matthew 11. 12): whosoever does hear, does so not of himself, but by the drawings of God's grace (John 6. 44): repentance is Christ's gift (Acts 5. 31). He draws, not drags. The Sun of righteousness, like the natural sun, the moment that the door is opened, pours in His light, which could not previously find an entrance. Cf. HILARY on Psalm 118. 80. I will come in to him—as I did to Zaccheus. sup with him, and he with me—Delightful reciprocity! Cf. "dwelleth in me, and I in Him," John 6. 56. Whereas, ordinarily, the admitted guest sips with the admitter, here the Divine guest becomes Himself the host, for He is the bread of life, and the Giver of the marriage feast. Here again he alludes to the imagery of the Song of Solomon 4. 16, where the Bride invites Him to eat pleasant fruits, even as He had first prepared a feast for her, "His fruit was sweet to my taste." Cf. the same interchange, John 21. 9-13, the feast being made up of the viands that Jesus brought, and those which the disciples brought. The consummation of this blessed intercommunion shall be at the Marriage Supper of the Lamb, of which the Lord's Supper is the earnest and foretaste. 21. sit with me in my throne—(Ch. 2. 26, 27; 20. 6; Matthew 19. 28; 20. 23; John 17. 22, 24; 2 Timothy 2. 12.) The same whom Christ had just before threatened to spue out of His mouth, is now offered a seat with Him on His throne! "The highest place is within reach of the lowest; the faintest spark of grace may be fanned into the mightiest flame of love." [TRENCH.] even as I also—Two thrones are here mentioned, (1.) His Father's, upon which He now sits, and has sat since His ascension, after His victory over death, sin, the world; upon this none can sit save God, and the God-man Christ Jesus, for it is the incommunicable prerogative of God alone; (2.) the throne which shall be peculiarly His as the once humbled and then glorified Son of man, to be set up over the whole earth (heretofore usurped by Satan) at His coming again; in this the victorious saints shall share (1 Corinthians 6. 2). The transfigured elect Church shall with Christ judge and reign over the nations in the flesh, and Israel the foremost of them; ministering blessings to them as angels were the Lord's mediators of blessing and administrators of His government in setting up His throne in Israel at Sinai. This privilege of our high calling belongs exclusively to the present time whilst Satan reigns, when alone there is scope for conflict and for victory (2 Timothy 2. 11, 12). When Satan shall be bound (ch. 20. 4) there shall be no longer scope for it, for all on earth shall know the Lord from the least to the greatest. This, the grandest and crowning promise, is placed at the end of all the seven addresses, to gather all in one. It also forms the link to the next part of the book, where the Lamb is introduced seated on His Father's throne (ch. 4. 2, 3; 5. 5, 6). The Eastern throne is broader than ours, admitting others besides him who, as chief, occupies the centre. TRENCH notices, The order of the promises in the seven epistles corresponds to that of the unfolding of the kingdom of God from its first beginnings on earth to its consummation in heaven. To the faithful at Ephesus, (1.) the tree of life in the Paradise of God is promised (ch. 2. 7), answering to Genesis 2. (2.) Sin entered the world and death by sin; but to the faithful at Smyrna it is promised, they shall not be hurt by the second death (ch. 2. 11). The promise of the hidden manna (ch. 2. 17) to Pergamos (3.) brings us to the Mosaic period, the Church in the wilderness. (4.) That to Thyatira, viz., triumph over the nations (ch. 2. 26, 27), forms the consummation of the kingdom in prophetic type, the period of David and Solomon characterized by this power of the nations. Here there is a division, the seven falling into two groups, four and three, as often, e. g., the Lord's Prayer, three and four. The scenery of the last three passes from earth to heaven, the Church contemplated as triumphant, with its steps from glory to glory. (5.) Christ promises to the believer of Sardis not to blot out his name out of the book of life, but to confess him before His Father and the angels at the judgment day, and clothe him with a glorified body of dazzling whiteness (v. 4, 5). To the faithful at Philadelphia (6.) Christ promises they shall be citizens of the new Jerusalem, fixed as immovable pillars there, where city and temple are one (v. 12); here not only individual salvation is promised to the believer, as in the case of Sardis, but also privileges in the blessed communion of the Church triumphant. (7.) Lastly, to the faithful of Laodicea is given the crowning promise, not only the two former blessings, but a seat with Christ on His throne, even as He has sat with His Father on His Father's throne (v. 21).

CHAPTER IV.

Ver. 1-11. VISION OF GOD'S THRONE IN HEAVEN; THE FOUR AND TWENTY ELDERS; THE FOUR LIVING CREATURES. Here begins the Revelation proper; and first, chs. 4. and 5. set before us the heavenly scenery of the succeeding visions, and God on His throne, as the covenant God of His Church, the Revealer of them to His apostle through Jesus Christ. The first great portion comprises the opening of the seals and the sounding of the trumpets (chs. 4. to 11). As the communication respecting the seven churches opened with a suitable vision of the Lord Jesus as Head of the Church, so the second part opens with a vision suitable to the matter to be revealed. The scene is changed from earth to heaven. 1. After this—Greek, "After these things," marking the opening of the next vision in the succession. Here is the transition from "the things which are" (ch. 1. 19), the existing state of the seven churches, as a type of the Church in general, in John's time, to "the things which shall be hereafter," viz., in relation to the time when John wrote. I looked—rather as Greek, "I saw" in vision; not as English Version means, I directed my look that way. was—Omit, as not being in the Greek. opened—"standing open;" not as though John saw it in the act of being opened. Cf. Ezekiel 1. 1; Matthew 3. 16; Acts 7. 56; 10. 11. But in those visions the heavens opened, disclosing the visions to those below on earth. Whereas here, heaven, the temple of God, remains closed to those on earth, but John is transported in vision through an open door up into heaven, whence he can see things passing on earth or in heaven, according as the scenes of the several visions require. the first voice which I heard—the voice which I heard at first, viz., in ch. 1. 10; the former voice, was as it were—Omit was, it not being in the Greek. "Behold" governs in sense both "a door," &c., and "the first voice which," &c. Come up hither—through the "open door." be—come to pass. hereafter—Greek, "after these things:" after the present time (ch. 1. 19). 2. And—Omitted in the two oldest MSS., Vulgate, Syriac, I was—Greek, "I became in the Spirit" (Note, ch. 1. 10): I was completely rapt in vision into the heavenly world. was set—not was placed, but was situated, lit., lay. one sat on the throne—the Eternal Father: the Creator (v. 11); also cf. v. 8 with ch. 1. 4, where also the Father is designated "Which is, and was, and is to come." When the Son, "the Lamb," is introduced, ch. 5. 5-9, a new song is sung which distinguishes the Sitter on the throne from the Lamb, "Thou hast redeemed us to God," and v. 13, "Unto Him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb." So also in ch. 5. 7, as in Daniel 7. 13, the Son of man brought before the Ancient of days is distinguished from Him. The Father in essence is invisible, but in Scripture at times is represented as assuming a visible form. 3. was—Omitted in the two oldest MSS., but supported by Vulgate and Coptic. to look upon—Greek, "in sight," or "appearance." jasper—From ch. 21. 11, where it is called most precious, which the jasper was not, EBRARD infers it was a diamond. Ordinarily, the jasper is a stone of various wavy colours, somewhat transparent: in ch. 21. 11 it represents watery crystalline brightness. The sardine, our cornelian, or else a fiery red. As the watery brightness represents God's holiness, so the fiery red His justice executing fiery wrath. The same union of white or watery brightness and fiery redness appears in ch. 1. 14; 10. 1; Ezekiel 1. 4; 8. 2; Daniel 7. 9. rainbow round about the throne—forming a complete circle (type of God's perfection and eternity: not a half circle as the earthly rainbow) surrounding the throne vertically. Its various colours, which combined form one pure solar ray, symbolize the varied aspects of God's providential dealings uniting in one harmonious whole. Here, however, the predominating colour among the prismatic colours is green, the most refreshing of colours to look upon, and so symbolizing God's consolatory promises in Christ to His people amidst judgments on His foes. Moreover, the rainbow was the appointed token of God's covenant with all flesh, and His people in particular. Hereby God in type renewed to man the grant originally made to the first Adam. The antitype will be the "new heavens and the new earth" restored to redeemed man, just as the earth, after the destruction by the flood, was restored to Noah. As the rainbow was first reflected on the waters of the world's ruin, and continues to be seen only when a cloud is brought over the earth, so another deluge, viz., of fire, shall precede the new heavens and earth: the Lord, as here, on his throne, whence (v. 5) proceed "lightnings and thunderings," shall issue the commission to rid the earth of its oppressors; but then, amidst judgment, when other men's hearts fail them for fear, the believer shall be reassured by the rainbow, the covenant token, round the throne (cf. DE BURGH, Rev.). The heavenly bow speaks of the shipwreck of the world through sin: it speaks also of calm and sunshine after the storm. The cloud is the regular token of God's and Christ's presence, e. g., in the tabernacle holiest place; on Mount Sinai at the giving of the law; at the ascension (Acts 1. 9); at His coming again (ch. 4. 7). 4. seats—rather as the Greek is translated in this very verse, "thrones," of course lower and smaller than the grand central throne. So ch. 16. 10, "the seat (rather throne) of the beast," in hellish parody of God's throne. four and twenty elders—Greek, "the four and twenty (or as one oldest MS., 'twenty-four') elders:" the well-known elders. [ALFORD.] But TREGELLES translates, "Upon the twenty-four thrones (I saw: omitted in two oldest MSS.) elders sitting:" which is more probable, as the twenty-four elders were not mentioned before, whereas the twenty-four thrones were. They are not angels, for they have white robes and crowns of victory, implying a conflict and endurance, "Thou hast redeemed us": they represent the Heads of the Old and New Testament churches respectively, the Twelve Patriarchs (cf. ch. 7. 5-8, not in their personal, but in their representative character), and Twelve Apostles. So in ch. 15. 3, "the song of Moses, and of the Lamb," the double constituents of the Church are implied, the Old Testament and the New Testament. "Elders" is the very term for the ministry both of the Old and New Testament, the Jewish and the catholic Gentile Church. The tabernacle was a "pattern" of the heavenly antitype; the holy place, a figure of HEAVEN ITSELF. Thus Jehovah's throne is represented by the mercy-seat in the holiest, the Shekinah cloud over it. "The seven lamps of fire before the throne" (v. 5) are antitypical to the seven-branched candlestick also in the holiest, emblem of the manifold Spirit of God: "the sea of glass" (v. 6) corresponds to the molten sea before the sanctuary, wherein the priests washed themselves before entering on their holy service; so introduced here in connection with the redeemed "priests unto God" (cf. Note, ch. 15. 2). The "four living creatures" (v. 6, 7) answer to the cherubim over the mercy-seat. So the twenty-four throned and crowned elders are typified by the twenty-four chiefs of the twenty-four courses of priests, "Governors of the sanctuary, and governors of God" (1 Chronicles 24. 5; 25). 5. proceeded—Greek, "proceed." thunderings and voices—The two oldest MSS. transpose, "voices and thunderings." Cf. at the giving of the law on Sinai, Exodus 19. 16. "The thunderings express God's threats against the ungodly: there are voices in the thunders (ch. 10. 3), i. e., not only does He threaten generally, but also predicts special judgments." [GROTIUS.] seven lamps . . . seven Spirits—The Holy Spirit in His sevenfold operation, as the light-and-life Giver (cf. ch. 5. 6, seven eyes . . . the seven Spirits of God; 1. 4; 21. 23; Psalm 119. 105) and fiery purifier of the godly, and consumer of the ungodly (Matthew 3. 11). 6. Two oldest MSS., A, B, Vulgate, Coptic, and Syriac, read, "As it were a sea of glass." like . . . crystal—not imperfectly transparent as the ancient common glass, but like rock crystal. Contrast the turbid "many waters" on which the harlot "sitteth" (ch. 17). Cf. Job 37. 18, "the sky . . . as a molten looking-glass." Thus, primarily, the pure ether which separates God's throne from St. John, and from all things before it, may be meant, symbolizing the "purity, calmness, and majesty of God's rule." [ALFORD.] But see the analogue in the temple, the molten sea before the sanctuary (Note, v. 4, above). There is in this sea depth and transparency, but not the fluidity and instability of the natural sea (cf. ch. 21. 1). It stands solid, calm, and clear. God's judgments are called "a great deep" (Psalm 36. 6). In ch. 15. 2 it is a "sea of glass mingled with fire." Thus there is symbolized here the purificatory baptism of water and the Spirit of all who are made "kings and priests unto God." In ch. 15. 2 the baptism with the fire of trial is meant. Through both all the king-priests have to pass in coming to God: His judgments, which overwhelm the ungodly, they stand firmly upon, as on a solid sea of glass; able like Christ to walk on the sea, as though it were solid. round about the throne—one in the midst of each side of the throne. four beasts—The Greek for "beasts," ch. 13. 1, 11, is different, therion, the symbol for the carnal man by opposition to God losing his true glory, as lord, under Him, of the lower creatures, and degraded to the level of the beast. Here it is zoon, "living creatures:" not beasts. 7. calf—"a steer." [ALFORD.] The LXX. often use the Greek term here for an ox (Exodus 22. 1; 29. 10, &c.). as a man—The oldest MSS. have "as of a man." 8. about him—Greek, "round about him." ALFORD connects this with the following sentence: "All round and within (their wings) they are (so two oldest MSS., A, B, and Vulgate read) full of eyes." St. John's object is to show that the six wings in each did not interfere with that which he had before declared, viz., that they were "full of eyes before and behind." The eyes were round the outside of each wing, and up the *in- side of each when half expanded, and of the part of body in that inward recess. rest not—lit., "have no rest." How awfully different the reason why the worshippers of the beast "have no rest day nor night," viz., "their torment for ever and ever!" Holy, holy, holy—The "tris-hagion" of the Greek liturgies. In Isaiah 6. 3, as here, it occurs; also Psalm 99. 3, 5, 9, where He is praised as "holy," (1.) on account of His majesty (v. 1) about to display itself, (2.) His justice (v. 4) already displaying itself, (3.) His mercy (v. 6-8) which displayed itself in times past. So here "Holy," as He "who was:" "Holy," as He "who is:" "Holy," as He "who is to come." He showed Himself an object of holy worship in the past creation of all things: more fully He shows Himself so in governing all things: He will, in the highest degree, show Himself so in the consummation of all things. "Of (from) Him, through Him, and to Him, are all things: to whom be glory for ever. Amen." In Isaiah 6. 3 there is added, "the whole EARTH is full of His glory." But in Revelation this is deferred until the glory of THE LORD fills the earth, His enemies having been destroyed. [BENGEL.] Almighty—Answering to "Lord of hosts" (Sabaoth), Isaiah 6. 3. The cherubim here have six wings, like the seraphim in Isaiah 6.; whereas the cherubim in Ezekiel 1. 6 had four wings each. They are called by the same name, "living creatures." But whereas in Ezekiel each living creature has all four faces, here the four belong severally one to each. See my Note, Ezekiel 1. 6. The four living creatures answer by contrast to the four world-powers represented by four beasts. The Fathers identified them with the four Gospels, Matthew the lion, Mark the ox, Luke the man, John the eagle: these symbols, thus viewed, express not the personal character of the Evangelists, but the manifold aspect of Christ in relation to the world (four being the number significant of world-wide extension, e. g., the four quarters of the world) presented by them severally: the lion expressing royalty, as Matthew gives prominence to this feature of Christ; the ox, laborious endurance, Christ's prominent characteristic in Mark; man, brotherly sympathy with the whole race of man, Christ's prominent feature in Luke; the eagle, soaring majesty, prominent in John's description of Christ as the Divine Word. But here the context best suits the view which regards the four living creatures as representing the redeemed election-Church in its relation of ministering king-priests to God, and ministers of blessing to the redeemed earth, and the nations on it, and the animal creation, in which man stands at the head of all, the lion at the head of wild beasts, the ox at the head of tame beasts, the eagle at the head of birds and of the creatures of the waters. Cf. ch. 5. 8-10, "Thou hast redeemed us by thy blood out of every kindred, . . . and hast made us unto our God kings and priests: and we shall reign on the earth;" and ch. 20. 4, the partakers with Christ of the first resurrection, who conjointly with Him reign over the redeemed nations that are in the flesh. Cf. as to the happy and willing subjection of the lower animal world, Isaiah 11. 6-8; 65. 25; Ezekiel 34. 25; Hosea 2. 18. Jewish tradition says, the "four standards" under which Israel encamped in the wilderness, to the east, Judah, to the north, Dan, to the west, Ephraim, to the south, Reuben, were respectively a lion, an eagle, an ox, and a man, whilst in the midst was the tabernacle containing the Shekinah symbol of the Divine presence. Thus we have "the picture of that blessed period when—the earth having been fitted for being the kingdom of the Father—the court of heaven will be transferred to earth, and the tabernacle of God shall be with men" (ch. 21. 3), and the whole world will be subject to a never-ending theocracy" (cf. DE BURGH, Rev.). The point of union between the two views given above is, Christ is the perfect realization of the ideal of man: Christ is presented in His fourfold aspect in the four Gospels respectively. The redeemed election-Church similarly, when in and through Christ (with whom she shall reign) she realizes the ideal of man, shall combine in herself human perfections having a fourfold aspect (1.) kingly righteousness with hatred of evil and judicial equity, answering to the "lion;" (2.)

laborious diligence in every duty, the "ox;" (3.) human sympathy, the "man;" (4.) the contemplation of heavenly truth, the "eagle." As the high-soaring intelligence, the eagle, forms the contrasted complement to practical labour, the ox bound to the soil; so holy judicial vengeance against evil, the lion springing suddenly and terribly on the doomed, forms the contrasted complement to human sympathy, the man. In Isaiah 6. 2 we read, "Each had six wings: with twain he covered his face [in reverence, as not presuming to lift up his face to God], with twain he covered his feet [in humility, as not worthy to stand in God's holy presence], and with twain he did fly [in obedient readiness to do instantly God's command]." 9-11. The ground of praise here is God's eternity, and God's power and glory manifested in the creation of all things for His pleasure. Creation is the foundation of all God's other acts of power, wisdom, and love, and therefore forms the first theme of His creatures' thanksgivings. The four living creatures take the lead of the twenty-four elders, both in this anthem, and in that new song which follows on the ground of their redemption (ch. 5. 8-10). 9. when—i. e., whenever: as often as. A simultaneous giving of glory on the part of the beasts, and on the part of the elders. give—"shall give" in one oldest MS. for ever and ever—Greek, "unto the ages of the ages." 10. fall—immediately. Greek, "shall fall down:" implying that this ascription of praise shall be repeated onward to eternity. So also "Shall worship . . . shall cast their crowns," viz., in acknowledgment that all the merit of their crowns (not kingly diadems, but the crowns of conquerors) is due to Him. 11. O Lord—The two oldest MSS., A, B, Vulgate, and Syriac, add, "And our God." "Our" by virtue of creation, and especially redemption. One oldest MS., B, and Syriac, insert "the Holy One." But another, A, Vulgate, and Coptic, omit this, as English Version does. glory, &c.—"the glory—the honour—the power." thou—Emphatical in the Greek: "It is THOU who didst create." all things—Greek, "the all things:" the universe. for—Greek, "on account of;" "for the sake of thy pleasure," or "will." English Version is good Greek. Though the context better suits, it was because of thy will, that "they were" (so one oldest MS., A, Vulgate, Syriac, and Coptic read, instead of English Version "are:" another oldest MS., B, reads, "They were not, and were created," were created out of nothing), i. e., were existing, as contrasted with their previous non-existence. With God to will is to effect: to determine is to perform. So in Genesis 1. 3, "Let there be light, and there was light:" in Hebrew an expressive tautology, the same word and tense and letters being used for "let there be," and "there was," marking the simultaneity and identity of the will and the effect. D. LONGINUS, on the Sublime, sec. 9, a heathen, praises this description of God's power by "the lawgiver of the Jews, no ordinary man," as one worthy of the theme. were created—by Thy definite act of creation at a definite time.

CHAPTER V.

Ver. 1-14. THE BOOK WITH SEVEN SEALS: NONE WORTHY TO OPEN IT BUT THE LAMB: HE TAKES IT AMIDST THE PRAISES OF THE REDEEMED, AND OF THE WHOLE HEAVENLY HOST. 1. in—Greek, "(lying) upon the right hand," &c. His right hand was open, and on it lay the book. On God's part there was no withholding of His future purposes as contained in the book: the only obstacle to unsealing it is stated v. 3. [ALFORD.] book—rather, as accords with the ancient form of books, and with the writing on the backside, "a roll." The writing on the back implies fulness and completeness, so that nothing more needs to be added (ch. 22. 18). The roll, or book, appears from the context to be "the title-deed of man's inheritance" [DE BURGH] redeemed by Christ, and contains the successive steps by which He shall recover it from its usurper, and obtain actual possession of the kingdom already "purchased" for Himself and His elect saints. However, no portion of the roll is said to be unfolded and read; but simply the seals are successively opened, giving final access to its contents being read as a perfect whole, which shall not be until the events symbolized by the seals shall have been past, when Ephesians 3. 10 shall receive its complete accomplishment, and the Lamb shall reveal God's providential plans in redemption in all their manifold beauties. Thus the opening of the seals will mean the successive steps by which God in Christ clears the way for the final opening and reading of the book at the visible setting up of the kingdom of Christ. Cf., at the grand consummation, ch. 20. 12, "Another book was opened . . . the book of life;" 22. 19. None is worthy to do so save the Lamb, for He alone as such has redeemed man's forfeited inheritance, of which the book is the title-deed. The question (v. 2) is not (as commonly supposed), Who should reveal the destinies of the Church (for this any inspired prophet would be competent to do)? but, Who has the WORTH to give man a new title to his lost inheritance? [DE BURGH.] sealed . . . seven seals—Greek, "sealed up," or "firmly sealed," &c. The number seven (divided into four, the world-wide number, and three, the Divine) abounds in Revelation, and expresses completeness. Thus, the seven seals, representing all power given to the Lamb; the seven trumpets, by which the world-kingsdoms are shaken and overthrow, and the Lamb's kingdom ushered in; and the seven vials, by which the beast's kingdom is destroyed. 2. strong—(Psalm 103. 20.) His voice penetrated heaven, earth, and Hades (ch. 10. 1-3). 2. no man—Greek, "no one." Not merely no man, but also no one of any order of beings. In earth—Greek, "upon the earth." under the earth—viz., in Hades. look thereon—to look upon the contents, so as to read them. 4. and to read—Inserted in English Version Greek text without good authority. One oldest MS., ORIGEN, CYPRIAN, and HILARY, omit the clause. To read would be awkward standing between "to open the book" and "to look thereon." St. John having been promised a revelation of "things which must be hereafter," weeps now at his earnest desire being apparently frustrated. He is a pattern to us to imitate, as an eager and teachable learner of the Apocalypse. 5. one of—Greek, "one from among." The "elder" meant is, according to some (in LYRA), Matthew. With this accords the description here given of Christ, "the Lion, which is (so the Greek) of the tribe of Juda, the root of David;" the royal, David-descended, lion-aspect of Christ being that prominent in Matthew, whence the lion among the fourfold cherubim is commonly assigned to him. GERHARD in BENGEI thought Jacob to be meant, being, doubtless, one of those who rose with Christ and ascended to heaven (Matthew 27. 52, 53). The elders in heaven round God's throne know better than John, still in the flesh, the far-reaching power of Christ. Root of David—(Isaiah 11. 1, 10.) Not merely "a sucker come up from David's ancient root" (as ALFORD limits it), but also including the idea of His being Himself the root and origin of David: cf. these two truths brought together, Matthew 22. 42-45. Hence He is called not merely Son of David, but also David. He is at once "the branch" of David, and "the root" of David, David's Son and David's Lord, the Lamb slain and therefore the Lion of Juda: about to reign over Israel, and thence over the whole earth. prevailed—Greek, "conquered:" absolutely, as elsewhere (ch. 3. 21): gained the victory: His past victory over all the powers of darkness entitles Him now to open the book. to open—i. e., so as to open, &c. One oldest MS., B, reads, "He that openeth," i. e., whose office it is to open, but the weight of oldest authorities is with English Version reading, viz., A, Vulgate, Coptic, and ORIGEN. 6. I beheld, and, lo—One oldest MS., A, omits "and, lo." Another, B, CYPRIAN, &c., support, "and, lo," but omit, "and I beheld." in the midst of the throne—i. e., not on the throne (cf. v. 7), but in the midst of the company (ch. 4. 4) which was "round about the throne." Lamb—Greek, arnion; always found in Revelation exclusively, except in John 21. 15 alone: it expresses endearment, viz., the endearing relation in which Christ now stands to us, as the consequence of His previous relation as the sacrificial Lamb. So also our relation to Him: He the precious Lamb, we His dear lambs, one with Him. BENGEI thinks there is in Greek arnion

the idea of taking the lead of the flock. Another object of the form Greek arnion, the Lamb, is to put Him in the more marked contrast to Greek therion, the Beast. Elsewhere Greek arnos is found, applying to Him as the paschal, sacrificial Lamb (Isaiah 53. 7, LXX.; John 1. 29, 36; Acts 8. 32; 1 Peter 1. 19). as it had been slain—bearing marks of His past death-wounds. He was standing, though bearing the marks of one slain. In the midst of heavenly glory Christ crucified is still the prominent object. seven horns—i. e., perfect might, "seven" symbolizing perfection; "horns," might, in contrast to the horns of the Antichristian world-powers, ch. 17. 3, &c.; Daniel 7. 7, 20; 8. 3. seven eyes . . . the seven Spirits . . . sent forth—So one oldest MS., A. But B reads, "being sent forth." As the seven lamps before the throne represent the Spirit of God immanent in the Godhead, so the seven eyes of the Lamb represent the same sevenfold Spirit profuent from the incarnate Redeemer in His world-wide energy. The Greek for "sent forth," apostelomena, or else apostalmenoi, is akin to the term apostle, reminding us of the Spirit-impelled labours of Christ's apostles and minister throughout the world: if the present tense be read, as seems best, the idea will be that of those labours continually going on unto the end. "Eyes" symbolize His all-watchful and wise providence for His Church, and against her foes. 7. The book lay on the open hand of Him that sat on the throne for any to take who was found worthy. [ALFORD.] The Lamb takes it from the Father in token of formal investiture into His universal and everlasting dominion as Son of man. This introductory vision thus presents before us, in summary, the consummation to which all the events in the seals, trumpets, and vials converge, viz., the setting up of Christ's kingdom visibly. Prophecy ever hurries to the grand crisis or end, and dwells on intermediate events only in their typical relation, and representation, of the end. 8. had taken—Greek, "took." fell down before the Lamb—Who shares worship and the throne with the Father. harps—Two oldest MSS., A, B, Syriac and Coptic, read, "a harp:" a kind of guitar, played with the hand or a quill. vials—"bowls" [TREGELES]: censers. odours—Greek, "incense." prayers of saints—as the angel offers their prayers (ch. 8. 3) with incense (cf. Psalm 141. 2). This gives not the least sanction to Rome's dogma of our praying to saints. Though they be employed by God in some way unknown to us to present our prayers (nothing is said of their interceding for us), yet we are told to pray only to Him (ch. 19. 10; 22. 8, 9). Their own employment is praise (whence they all have harps); ours is prayer. 9. sung—Greek, "sing:" it is their blessed occupation continually. The theme of redemption is ever new, ever suggesting fresh thoughts of praise, embodied in the "new song." us to God—So MS. B, Coptic, Vulgate, and CYPRIAN. But A omits "us:" and N reads instead, "to our God." out of—The present election-church gathered out of the world, as distinguished from the peoples gathered to Christ as the subjects, not of an election, but of a general and world-wide conversion of all nations. kindred . . . tongue . . . people . . . nation—The number four marks world-wide extension: the four quarters of the world. For "kindred," translate as Greek, "tribe." This term and "people" are usually restricted to Israel: "tongue and nation" to the Gentiles (ch. 7. 9; 11. 9; 13. 7, the oldest reading; 14. 6). Thus there is here marked the election-Church gathered from Jews and Gentiles. In ch. 10. 11, for "tribes," we find among the four terms "kings;" in 17. 15, "multitudes." 10. made us—A, B, N, Vulgate, Syriac, and Coptic, read "them." The Hebrew construction of the third person for the first, has a graphic relation to the redeemed, and also has a more modest sound than us, priests. [BENGEI.] unto our God—So B, N read. But A omits the clause. kings—So B reads. But A, N, Vulgate, Coptic, and CYPRIAN, read, "A kingdom." N reads also "a priesthood" for priests. They who cast their crowns before the throne, do not call themselves kings in the sight of the great King (ch. 4. 10, 11); though their priestly access has such dignity, that their reigning on earth cannot exceed it. So in ch. 20. 6 they are not called

"kings." [BENGEL.] we shall reign on the earth—This is a new feature added to ch. 1. 6. N, Vulgate and Coptic, read, "They shall reign." A, B read, "They reign." ALFORD takes this reading, and explains it of the Church EVEN NOW, in Christ her Head, reigning on the earth: "all things are being put under her feet, as under His; her kingly office and rank are asserted, even in the midst of persecution." But even if we read (I think the weightiest authority is against it), "They reign," still it is the prophetic present for the future: the seer being transported into the future when the full number of the redeemed (represented by the four living creatures) shall be complete, and the visible kingdom begins. The saints do spiritually reign now; but certainly not as they shall when the prince of this world shall be bound (Notes, ch. 20. 2-6). So far from reigning on the earth now, they are "made as the filth of the world and the offscouring of all things." In ch. 11. 15, 18, the locality and time of the kingdom are marked. KELLY translates, "reign over the earth" (Greek, epi tes gees), which is justified by the Greek (LXX., Judges 9. 8; Matthew 2. 22). The elders, though ruling over the earth, shall not necessarily (according to this passage) remain on the earth. But English Version is justified by ch. 3. 10. "The elders were meek, but the flock of the meek independently is much larger." [BENGEL.] 11. I beheld—the angels: who form the outer circle, whilst the Church, the object of redemption, forms the inner circle nearest the throne. The heavenly hosts ranged around gaze with intense love and adoration at this crowning manifestation of God's love, wisdom, and power. ten thousand times ten thousand—Greek, "myriads of myriads." 12. to receive power—Greek, "the power." The remaining six (the whole being seven, the number for perfection and completeness) are all, as well as "power," ranged under the one Greek article, to mark that they form one complete aggregate belonging to God and His coequal, the Lamb. Cf. ch. 7. 12, where each of all seven has the article. riches—both spiritual and earthly. Blessing—Ascribed praise: the will on the creature's part, though unaccompanied by the power, to return blessing for blessing conferred. [ALFORD.] 13. The universal chorus of creation, including the outermost circles as well as the inner (of saints and angels), winds up the doxology. The full accomplishment of this is to be when Christ takes His great power and reigns visibly. every creature—"All His works in all places of His dominion" (Psalm 103. 22). under the earth—the departed spirits in Hades. such as are—So B and Vulgate. But A omits this. In the sea—Greek, "upon the sea." the sea animals which are regarded as being on the surface. [ALFORD.] all that are in them—So Vulgate reads. A omits "all (things)" here (Greek panta), and reads, "I heard all (Greek pantas) saying:" implying the harmonious concert of all in the four quarters of the universe. Blessing, &c.—Greek, "the blessing, the honour, and the glory, and the might to the ages of the ages." The fourfold ascription indicates world-wide universality. 14. said—So A, Vulgate, and Syriac, read. But B, and Coptic read, "(I heard) saying." Amen—So A reads. But B reads, "the (accustomed) Amen." As in ch. 4. 11, the four and twenty elders asserted God's worthiness to receive the glory, as having created all things, so here the four living creatures ratify by their "Amen" the whole creation's ascription of the glory to Him. four and twenty—Omitted in the oldest MSS.: Vulgate supports it. Him that liveth for ever and ever—Omitted in all the MSS.: inserted by commentators from ch. 4. 9. But there, where the thanksgiving is expressed, the words are appropriate; but here less so, as their worship is that of silent prostration. "Worshipped" (viz., God and the Lamb). So in ch. 11. 1, "worship" is used absolutely.

CHAPTER VI.

YER. 1-17. THE OPENING OF THE FIRST SIX OF THE SEVEN SEALS. Cf. Note, ch. 5. 1. Many (MEDE, FLEMING, NEWTON, &c.) hold that all these seals have been fulfilled, the sixth having been so by the overthrow of Paganism and establishment of Christianity under Constantine's edict, 312 A. D. There can, however, be no doubt that at least the sixth seal is future, and is to be at the coming again of Christ. The great objection to supposing the seals to be finally and exhaustively fulfilled (though, probably, particular events may be partial fulfilments typical of the final and fullest one), is that, if so, they ought to furnish (as the destruction of Jerusalem, according to Christ's prophecy, does) a strong external evidence of Revelation. But it is clear they cannot be used for this, as hardly any two interpreters of this school are agreed on what events constitute the fulfilment of each seal. Probably not isolated facts, but classes of events preparing the way for Christ's coming kingdom, are intended by the opening of the seals. The four living creatures severally cry at the opening of the first four seals, "Come," which fact marks the division of the seven, as often occurs in this sacred number, into four and three. 1. one of the seals—The oldest MSS., A, B, C, Vulgate, and Syriac read, "one of the seven seals." noise—The three oldest MSS. read this in the nominative or dative, not the genitive, as English Version, "I heard one from among the four living creatures saying, as (it were) the voice (or, as with the voice) of thunder." The first living creature was like a lion (ch. 4. 7); his voice is in consonance. Implying the lion-like boldness with which, in the successive great revivals, the faithful have testified for Christ, and especially a little before His coming shall testify. Or, rather, their earnestness in praying for Christ's coming. Come and see—One oldest MS., B, has "And see." But A, C, and Vulgate reject it. ALFORD rightly objects to English Version reading: "Whither was John to come? Separated as he was by the glassy sea from the throne, was he to cross it?" Contrast the form of expression, ch. 10. 8. It is much more likely to be the cry of the redeemed to the Redeemer, "Come" and deliver the groaning creature from the bondage of corruption. Thus, v. 2 is an answer to the cry, went (lit., came) forth corresponding to "Come." "Come," says GROTIUS, is the living creature's address to John, calling his earnest attention. But it seems hard to see how "Come" by itself can mean this. Cf. the only other places in Revelation where it is used, ch. 4. 1; 22. 17. If the four living creatures represent the four Gospels, the "Come" will be their invitation to every one (for it is not written that they addressed John) to accept Christ's salvation whilst there is time, as the opening of the seals marks a progressive step towards the end (cf. ch. 22. 17). Judgments are foretold as accompanying the preaching of the Gospel as a witness to all nations (ch. 14. 6-11; Matthew 24. 6-14). Thus the invitation, "Come," here, is aptly parallel to Matthew 24. 14. The opening of the first four seals is followed by judgments preparatory for His coming. At the opening of the fifth seal, the martyrs above express the same (v. 9, 10; cf. Zechariah 1. 10). At the opening of the sixth seal, the Lord's coming is ushered in with terrors to the ungodly. At the seventh, the consummation is fully attained (ch. 11. 15). 2. Evidently Christ, whether in person, or by His angel, preparatory to His coming again, as appears from ch. 19. 11, 12. bow—(Psalm 45. 4, 5.) crowns—Greek, stephanos, the garland or wreath of a conqueror, which is also implied by His white horse, white being the emblem of victory. In ch. 19. 11, 12 the last step in His victorious progress is represented; accordingly there He wears many diadems (Greek, diademata; not merely Greek, stephanoi, crowns or wreaths), and is personally attended by the hosts of heaven. Cf. Zechariah 1. and 6; especially v. 10 below, with Zechariah 1. 12; also cf. the colours of the four horses. and to conquer—i. e., so as to gain a lasting victory. All four seals usher in judgments on the earth, as the power which opposes the reign of Himself and His Church. This, rather than the work of conversion and conviction, is primarily meant, though doubtless, secondarily, the elect will be gathered out through His word and His judgments. 3. and see—Omitted in the three oldest MSS., A, B, C, and Vulgate. 4. red—the colour of blood. The colour of the horse in each case answers to the mission of the rider. Cf. Matthew 10. 24-36, "Think not I am come to send peace on earth; I came not to send peace, but a word." The white horse of Christ's bloodless victories is soon followed, through man's perversion of the Gospel, by the red horse of bloodshed; but this is overruled to the clearing away of the obstacles to Christ's coming kingdom. The patient ox is the emblem of the second living creature who, at the opening of this seal, saith, "Come." The saints amidst judgments on the earth in patience "endure to the end." that they should kill—The Greek is indicative future, "that they may, as they also shall, kill one another." 5. Come and see—The two oldest MSS., A, C, and Vulgate, omit "and see." B retains the words, black—Implying sadness and want. had—Greek, "having." a pair of balances—the symbol of scarcity of provisions, the bread being doled out by weight. 6. a voice—Two oldest MSS., A, C, read, "as it were a voice." B reads as English Version. The voice is heard "in the midst of the four living creatures" (as Jehovah in the Shekinah cloud manifested His presence between the cherubim); because it is only for the sake of, and in connection with, His redeemed, that God mitigates His judgments on the earth. A measure—"A chœnix." Whilst making food scarce, do not make it so much so that a chœnix (about a day's provision of wheat, variously estimated at two or three pints) shall not be to be got "for a penny" (denarius, eight and a half pence of our money, probably the day's wages of a labourer). Famine generally follows the sword. Ordinarily, from sixteen to twenty measures were given for a denarius. The sword, famine, noisome beasts, and the pestilence, are God's four judgments on the earth. A spiritual famine, too, may be included in the judgment. The "Come," in the case of this third seal, is said by the third of the four living creatures, whose likeness is a man; indicative of sympathy and human compassion for the sufferers. God in it tempers judgment with mercy. Cf. Matthew 24. 7, which indicates the very calamities foretold in these seals; nation rising against nation (the sword), famines, pestilences (v. 8), and earthquakes (v. 12). three measures of barley for a penny—the cheaper and less nutritious grain, bought by the labourer who could not buy enough wheat for his family with his day's wages, a denarius, and, therefore, buys barley. see thou hurt not the oil, and the wine—the luxuries of life, rather than necessities; the oil and wine were to be spared for the refreshment of the sufferers. 7. and see—Supported by B. Omitted by A, C, and Vulgate. The fourth living creature, who was "like a flying eagle," introduces this seal; implying high-soaring intelligence, and judgment descending from on high fatally on the ungodly, as the king of birds on his prey. 8. pale—"livid." [ALFORD.] Death—personified. Hell—Hades personified. unto them—Death and Hades. So A, C, read. But B and Vulgate read, "to him." fourth part of the earth—Answering to the first four seals; his portion as one of the four, being a fourth part. death—pestilence; cf. Ezekiel 14. 21 with the four judgments here, the sword, famine, pestilence, and wild beasts; the famine the consequence of the sword; pestilence, that of famine; and beasts multiplying by the consequent depopulation. with the beasts—Greek, by; more direct agency. These four seals are marked off from the three last, by the four living creatures introducing them with "Come." The calamities indicated are not restricted to one time, but extend through the whole period of Church history to the coming of Christ, before which last great and terrible day of the Lord they shall reach their highest aggravation. The first seal is the summary, Christ going forth conquering till all enemies are subdued under Him, with a view to which the judgments subsequently specified accompany the preaching of the Gospel for a witness to all nations. 9. The three last seals relate to the invisible, as the first four to the visible world; the fifth, to the martyrs who have died as believers; the sixth, to those who have died, or who shall be found at Christ's coming, unbelievers, viz., "the kings . . . great men . . . bondman . . . freeman;" the seventh, to the silence in heaven. The scene changes from earth to heaven; so that interpretations which make these three last consecutive to the first four seals, are very doubtful. I saw—in spirit. For souls are not naturally visible. under the altar—As the blood of sacrificial victims slain on the altar was poured at the bottom of the altar, so the souls of those sacrificed for Christ's testimony are symbolically represented as under the altar, in heaven; for the life or animal soul is in the blood, and blood is often represented as crying for vengeance (Genesis 4. 10). The altar in heaven, antitypical to the altar of sacrifice, is Christ crucified. As it is the altar that sanctifies the gift, so it is Christ alone who makes our obedience, and even our sacrifice of life for the truth, acceptable to God. The sacrificial altar was not in the sanctuary, but outside; so Christ's literal sacrifice, and the figurative sacrifice of the martyrs took place, not in the heavenly sanctuary, but outside, here on earth. The only altar in heaven is that antitypical to the temple-altar of incense. The blood of the martyrs cries from the earth under Christ's cross, whereon they may be considered virtually to have been sacrificed; their souls cry from under the altar of incense, which is Christ in heaven, by whom alone the incense of praise is accepted before God. They are under Christ, in His immediate presence, shut up unto Him in joyful eager expectancy until He shall come to raise the sleeping dead. Cf. the language of 2 Maccabees 7. 36 as indicating Jewish opinion on the subject, Our brethren who have now suffered a short pain are dead under (Greek) God's covenant of everlasting life. testimony which they held—i. e., which they bore, as committed to them to bear. Cf. ch. 12. 17, "Have (same Greek as here) the testimony of Jesus." 10. How long—Greek, "Until when?" As in the parable the woman (symbol of the Church) cries day and night to the unjust judge for justice against her adversary who is always oppressing her (cf. below, ch. 12. 10); so the elect (not only on earth, but under Christ's covering, and in His presence in Paradise) cry day and night to God, who will assuredly, in His own time, avenge His and their cause, "though He bear long with them." These passages need not be restricted to some particular martyrdoms, but have been, and are receiving, and shall receive partial fulfilments, until their last exhaustive fulfilment before Christ's coming. So as to the other events foretold here. The glory even of those in Paradise shall only be complete when Christ's and the Church's foes are cast out, and the earth become Christ's kingdom at His coming to raise the sleeping saints. Lord—Greek, "Master;" implying that He has them and their foes and all His creatures as absolutely at His disposal, as a master has his slaves; hence, in v. 11, "fellow-servants," or fellow-slaves follows. holy—Greek, "the Holy one." avenge—exact vengeance for our blood." on—Greek, "from them." that dwell on the earth—the ungodly, of earth, earthy, as distinguished from the Church, whose home and heart are even now in heavenly places. 11. white robes—The three oldest MSS., A, B, C, read, "A white robe was given." every one of—One oldest MS., B, omits this. A, C, read, "unto them, unto each," i. e., unto them severally. Though their joint cry for the riddance of the earth from the ungodly is not yet granted, it is intimated that it will be so in due time; meanwhile, individually they receive the white robe, indicative of light, joy, and triumphant victory over their foes; even as the Captain of their salvation goes forth on a white horse conquering and to conquer; also of purity and sanctity through Christ. MAIMONIDES says that the Jews used to array priests, when approved of, in white robes; thus the sense is, they are admitted among the blessed ones, who, as spotless priests, minister unto God and the Lamb. should—So C reads. But A, B, "shall rest." a little season—One oldest MS., B, omits "little." A, C, support it. Even if it be omitted, is it to be inferred that the "season" is short as compared with eternity? BENJEL fancifully made a season (Greek chronos, the word here used) to be one thousand one hundred and eleven one-ninth years, and a time (ch. 12. 12, 14, Greek kairos) to be a fifth of a season, i. e., two hundred and twenty-two twoninths years. The only distinction in the Greek is, a season (Greek chronos) is a sort of aggregate of times. Greek kairos, a specific time, and so of short duration. As to their rest, cf. ch. 14. 13 (the same Greek anapauomai); Isaiah

CHAPTER VII.

57. 2; Daniel 12. 13. until their . . . brethren . . . be fulfilled—in number. Until their full number shall have been completed. The number of the elect is definitely fixed: perhaps to fill up that of the fallen angels. But this is mere conjecture. The full blessedness and glory of all the saints shall be simultaneous. The earlier shall not anticipate the later saints. A, C, read, "shall have been accomplished;" B, N, read, "shall have accomplished (their course)." 12. As v. 4, 6-8, the sword, famine, and pestilence, answer to Matthew 24. 6, 7; and v. 9, 10, as to martyrdoms, answer to Matthew 24. 9, 10; so this passage, v. 12, 17, answers to Matthew 24. 29, 30, "the sun shall be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light, and the stars shall fall from heaven; . . . then shall all the tribes of the earth mourn, and they shall see the Son of man coming," &c.; imagery describing the portents of the immediate coming of the day of the Lord; but not the coming itself until the elect are sealed, and the judgments invoked by the martyrs descend on the earth, the sea, and the trees (ch. 7). and, lo—So A reads. But B, C, omit "lo." earthquake—Greek, "shaking" of the heavens, the sea, and the dry land; the shaking of these mutable things being the necessary preliminary to the setting up of those things which cannot be shaken. This is one of the catch-words [WORDSWORTH] connecting the sixth seal with the sixth trumpet (ch. 11. 13) and the seventh vial (ch. 16. 17-21); also the seventh seal (ch. 8. 5). sackcloth—One kind made of the "hair" of Cilician goats, was called "cilicium," or Cilician cloth, and was used for tents, &c. Paul, a Cilician, made such tents (Acts 18. 3). moon—A, B, C, and oldest versions read, "the whole moon;" the full moon; not merely the crescent moon. as blood—(Joel 2. 31.) 13. stars . . . fell . . . as a fig tree easteth her . . . figs—(Isaiah 34. 4; Nahum 3. 12.) The Church shall be then ripe for glorification, the Antichristian world for destruction, which shall be accompanied with mighty phenomena in nature. As to the stars falling to the earth, Scripture describes natural phenomena as they would appear to the spectator, not in the language of scientific accuracy; and yet, whilst thus adapting itself to ordinary men, it drops hints which show that it anticipates the discoveries of modern science. 14. departed—Greek, "was separated from" its place; "was made to depart." Not as ALFORD, "parted asunder;" for, on the contrary, it was rolled together as a scroll which had been open is rolled up and laid aside. There is no "asunder one from another" here in the Greek, as in Acts 15. 39, which ALFORD copies. mountain . . . moved out of . . . places—(Psalm 121. 1, Margin; Jeremiah 3. 23; 4. 24; Nahum 1. 5.) This total disruption shall be the precursor of the new earth, just as the pre-Adamic convulsions prepared it for its present occupants. 15. kings . . . hid themselves—Where was now the spirit of those whom the world had so greatly feared? [BENGE.] great men—statesmen and high civil officers. rich men . . . chief captains—The three oldest MSS., A, B, C, transpose thus, "chief captains . . . rich men." mighty—The three oldest MSS., A, B, C, read, "strong" physically (Psalm 33. 16). in—lit., into; ran into, so as to hide themselves in. dens—"caves." 16. from the face—(Psalm 34. 16.) On the whole verse, cf. Hosea 10. 8; Luke 23. 30. 17. Lit., "the day, the great (day)," which can only mean the last great day. After the Lord has exhausted all His ordinary judgments, the sword, famine, pestilence, and wild beasts, and still sinners are impenitent, the great day of the Lord itself shall come. Matthew 24. plainly forms a perfect parallelism to the six seals, not only in the events, but also in the order of their occurrence: v. 3, the first seal; v. 6, the second seal; v. 7, the third seal; v. 7, end, the fourth seal; v. 9, the fifth seal, the persecutions and abounding iniquity under which, as well as consequent judgments accompanied with gospel-preaching to all nations as a witness, are particularly detailed, v. 9-23; v. 29, the sixth seal. to stand—to stand justified, and not condemned before the Judge. Thus the sixth seal brings us to the verge of the Lord's coming. The ungodly "tribes of the earth" tremble at the signs of His immediate approach. But before he actually inflicts the blow in person, "the elect" must be "gathered" out.

Ver. 1-17. SEALING OF THE ELECT OF ISRAEL. THE COUNTLESS MULTITUDE OF THE GENTILE ELECT. 1. And—So B and Syriac. But A, C, Fulgate, and Coptic, omit "and," after these things—A, B, C, and Coptic, read, "after this." The two visions in this chapter come in as an episode after the sixth seal, and before the seventh seal. It is clear that, though "Israel" may elsewhere designate the spiritual Israel, "the elect (Church) on earth" [ALFORD], here, where the names of the tribes one by one are specified, these names cannot have any but the literal meaning. The second advent will be the time of the restoration of the kingdom to Israel, when the times of the Gentiles shall have been fulfilled, and the Jews shall at last say, "Blessed is He that cometh in the name of the Lord." The period of the Lord's absence has been a blank in the history of the Jews as a nation. As then Revelation is the Book of the Second Advent [DE BURGH], naturally mention of God's restored favour to Israel occurs among the events that usher in Christ's advent. earth . . . sea . . . tree—The judgments to descend on these are in answer to the martyrs' prayer under the fifth seal. Cf. the same judgments under the fifth trumpet, the sealed being exempt (ch. 9. 4). on any tree—Greek, "against any tree" (Greek, epi ti dendron: but "on the earth," Greek, epi tees gees). 2. from the east—Greek, ". . . the rising of the sun." The quarter from which God's glory oftenest manifests itself. 3. Hurt not—by letting loose the destructive winds. 11. we have sealed the servants of our God—Parallel to Matthew 24. 31, "His angels . . . shall gather together His elect from the four winds." God's love is such, that He cannot do anything in the way of judgment, till His people are secured from hurt (Genesis 19. 22). Israel, at the eve of the Lord's coming, shall be found re-embodied as a nation; for its tribes are distinctly specified (Joseph, however, being substituted for Dan; whether because Antichrist is to come from Dan, or because Dan is to be Antichrist's especial tool [ARETHAS, tenth century], cf. Genesis 49. 17; Jeremiah 8. 16; Amos 8. 14; just as there was a Judas among the Twelve). Out of these tribes a believing remnant will be preserved from the judgments which shall destroy all the Antichristian confederacy (ch. 6. 12-17), and shall be transfigured with the elect Church of all nations, viz., 144,000 (or whatever number is meant by this symbolical number), who shall faithfully resist the seductions of Antichrist, whilst the rest of the nation, restored to Palestine in unbelief, are his dupes, and at last his victims. Previously to the Lord's judgments on Antichrist and his hosts, these latter shall destroy two-thirds of the nation, one-third escaping, and, by the Spirit's operation through affliction, turning to the Lord, which remnant shall form the nucleus on earth of the Israelite nation that is from this time to stand at the head of the millennial nations of the world. Israel's spiritual resurrection shall be "as life from the dead" to all the nations. As now a regeneration goes on here and there of individuals, so there shall then be a regeneration of nations universally, and this in connection with Christ's coming. Matthew 24. 34, "this generation (the Jewish nation) shall not pass till all these things be fulfilled," which implies that Israel can no more pass away before Christ's advent, than Christ's own words can pass away (the same Greek), Matthew 24. 35. So exactly Zechariah 13. 8, 9; 14. 2-4, 9-21; cf. 12. 2-14; 13. 1, 2. So also Ezekiel 8. 17, 18; 9. 1-7, especially v. 4. Cf. also Ezekiel 10. 2 with ch. 8. 5, where the final judgments actually fall on the earth, with the same accompaniment, the fire of the altar cast into the earth, including the fire scattered over the city. So again, ch. 14. 1, the same 144,000 appear on Zion with the Father's name in their forehead, at the close of the section, chs. 12., 13., 14., concerning the Church and her foes. Not that the saints are exempt from trial: v. 14 proves the contrary; but their trials are distinct from the destroying judgments that fall on the world; from these they are exempted, as Israel was from the plagues of Egypt, especially from the last, the Israelite doors having the protecting seal of the blood-mark. foreheads—the most conspicuous and noblest part of man's body; whereon the helmet, "the hope of salvation," is worn. 4. Twelve is the number of the tribes, and appropriate to the Church: 3 by 4: 3, the Divine number, multiplied by 4, the number for world-wide extension, 12 by 12 implies fixity and completeness, which is taken a thousand-fold in 144,000. A thousand implies the world perfectly pervaded by the Divine; for it is ten, the world number, raised to the power of three, the number of God. of all the tribes—lit., "out of every tribe;" not 144,000 of each tribe, but the aggregate of the 12,000 from every tribe. children—Greek, "sons of Israel." Ch. 3. 12; 21. 12, are no objection, as ALFORD thinks, to the literal Israel being meant; for, in consummated glory, still the Church will be that "built on the foundation of the (Twelve) apostles (Israelites), Jesus Christ (an Israelite) being the chief corner-stone." Gentile believers shall have the name of Jerusalem written on them, in that they shall share the citizenship antitypical to that of the literal Jerusalem. 5-8. Judah (meaning praise) stands first, as Jesus' tribe. Benjamin, the youngest, is last; and with him is associated second last, Joseph. Reuben, as originally first-born, comes next after Judah, to whom it gave place, having by sin lost its primogeniture-right. Besides the reason given above, another akin for the omission of Dan, is, its having been the first to lapse into idolatry (Judges 18.); for which same reason the name Ephraim, also (cf. Judges 17.; Hosea 4. 17), is omitted, and Joseph substituted. Also, it had been now for long almost extinct. Long before, the Hebrews say [GROTIUS], it was reduced to the one family of Hussim, which perished subsequently in the wars before Ezra's time. Hence it is omitted 1 Chronicles 4-8. Dan's small numbers are joined here to Naphtali's, whose brother he was by the same mother. [BENGL.] The twelve times twelve thousand sealed ones of Israel are the nucleus of transfigured humanity [AUBERLEN], to which the elect Gentiles are joined, "a multitude which no man could number," v. 9 (i. e., the Church of Jews and Gentiles indiscriminately, in which the Gentiles are the predominant element, Luke 21. 24. The word "tribes," Greek, implies that believing Israelites are in this countless multitude). Both are in heaven, yet ruling over the earth, as ministers of blessing to its inhabitants; whilst upon earth the world of nations is added to the kingdom of Israel. The twelve apostles stand at the head of the whole. The upper and the lower congregation, though distinct, are intimately associated. 9. no man—Greek, "no one." of all nations—Greek, "out of every nation." The human race is one nation by origin, but afterwards separated itself into tribes, peoples, and tongues; hence, the one singular stands first, followed by the three plurals. kindreds—Greek, "tribes," people—Greek, "peoples." The "first-fruits unto the Lamb," the 144,000 (ch. 14. 1-4) of Israel, are followed by a copious harvest of all nations, an election out of the Gentiles, as the 144,000 are an election out of Israel (Note, v. 3). white robes—(Note, ch. 6. 11; also ch. 3. 5, 13; 4. 4). palm in . . . hands—the antitype to Christ's entry into Jerusalem amidst the palm-bearing multitude. This shall be just when He is about to come visibly and take possession of His kingdom. The palm branch is the symbol of joy and triumph. It was used at the feast of tabernacles, on the fifteenth day of the seventh month, when they kept feast to God in thanksgiving for the ingathered fruits. The antitype shall be the completed gathering in of the harvest of the elect redeemed here described. Cf. Zechariah 14. 16, whence it appears that the earthly feast of tabernacles will be renewed, in commemoration of Israel's preservation in her long wilderness-like sojourn among the nations from which she shall now be delivered, just as the original typical feast was to commemorate her dwelling for forty years in booths or tabernacles in the literal wilderness. 10. cried—Greek, "cry," in the three oldest MSS., A, B, C, Vulgate, Syriac, and Coptic. It is their continuing, ceaseless employment. Salvation—lit., "THE salvation;" all the praise of our salvation be ascribed to our God. At the Lord's entry into Jerusalem, the type, similarly salvation is the cry of the palm-bearing multitudes. Hosanna means save us now; taken from Psalm 118. 25, in which Psalm (14, 15, 22, 26) the same connection occurs between salvation, the tabernacles of the righteous, and the Jews' cry to be repeated by the whole nation at Christ's coming, "Blessed be He that cometh in the name of the Lord." 11. The angels, as in ch. 5. 11, in their turn take up the anthem of praise. There it was "many angels," here it is "all the angels." stood—"were standing." [ALFORD.] 12. Greek, "The blessing, the glory, the wisdom, the thanksgiving, the honour, the power, the might [the doxology is sevenfold, implying its totality and completeness], unto the ages of the ages." 13. answered—viz., to my thoughts; spoke, asking the question which might have been expected to arise in John's mind from what has gone before. One of the twenty-four elders, representing the Old and New Testament ministry, appropriately acts as interpreter of this vision of the glorified Church. What, &c.—Greek order, "These which are arrayed in white robes, who are they?" 14. Sir—Greek, "Lord." B, C, Vulgate, Syriac, Coptic versions, and CYPRIAN read, "My Lord." A omits "My," as English Version. thou knowest—Taken from Ezekiel 37. 3. Comparatively ignorant ourselves of Divine things, it is well for us to look upward for divinely-communicated knowledge. came—rather as Greek, "come;" implying that they are just come. great tribulation—Greek, "THE great tribulation;" "the tribulation, the great one," viz., the tribulation to which the martyrs were exposed under the fifth seal, the same which Christ foretells as about to precede His coming (Matthew 24. 21, great tribulation), and followed by the same signs as the sixth seal (Matthew 24. 29, 30), cf. Daniel 12. 1; including also retrospectively all the tribulation which the saints of all ages have had to pass through. Thus this seventh chapter is a recapitulation of the vision of the six seals, ch. 6., to fill up the outline there given in that part of it which affects the faithful of that day. There, however, their number was waiting to be completed, but here it is completed, and they are seen taken out of the earth before the judgments on the Antichristian apostasy; with their Lord, they, and all His faithful witnesses and disciples of past ages, wait for His coming and their coming to be glorified and reign together with Him. Meanwhile, in contrast with their previous sufferings, they are exempt from the hunger, thirst, and scorching heats of their life on earth (v. 16), and are fed and refreshed by the Lamb of God Himself (v. 17; ch. 14. 1-4, 13); an earnest of their future perfect blessedness in both body and soul united (ch. 21. 4-6; 22. 1-5). washed . . . robes . . . white in the blood of . . . Lamb—(Ch. 1. 5; Isaiah 1. 18; Hebrews 9. 14; 1 John 1. 7; cf. Isaiah 61. 10; Zechariah 3. 3-5). Faith applies to the heart the purifying blood; once for all for justification, continually throughout the life for sanctification. 15. Therefore—Because they are so washed white; for without it they could never have entered God's holy heaven; ch. 22. 14, "Blessed are those who wash their robes (the oldest MSS. reading), that they may have right to the tree of life, and may enter in through the gates into the city," 15; 21. 27; Ephesians 5. 26, 27. before—Greek, "in the presence of." Matthew 5. 8; 1 Corinthians 13. 12, "face to face." throne . . . temple—These are connected because we can approach the heavenly King only through priestly mediation; therefore, Christ is at once King and Priest on His throne. day and night—i. e., perpetually; as those approved of as priests by the Sanhedrim were clothed in white, and kept by turns a perpetual watch in the temple at Jerusalem; cf. as to the singers, 1 Chronicles 9. 33, "day and night;" Psalm 134. 1. Strictly "there is no night" in the heavenly sanctuary (ch. 22. 5). in his temple—in what is the heavenly analogue to His temple on earth, for strictly there is "no temple therein" (ch. 21. 22), "God and the Lamb are the temple" filling the whole, so that there is no distinction of sacred and secular places; the city is the temple, and the temple the city. Cf. ch. 4. 8, "the four living creatures rest not day and night, saying, Holy, &c. shall dwell among them—rather (Greek senosai ep' autous), "shall be the tabernacle over them" (cf. ch. 21. 3; Leviticus 26. 11; especially Isaiah 4. 5, 6; 8. 14; 25. 4; Ezekiel 37. 27). His dwelling among them is to be understood as a secondary truth, besides what is expressed, viz., His being their covert. When once He tabernaled among us as the Word made flesh, He was in great lowliness; then He shall be in great glory. 16. (Isaiah 49. 10.) hunger no more—as they did here. thirst any more—(John 4. 13.) the sun—literally, scorching in the East. Also, symbolically, the sun of persecution. neither . . . light—Greek, “by no means at all . . . light” (fall), &c. heat—as the sirocco. 17. in the midst of the throne—i. e., in the middle point in front of the throne (ch. 5. 6). feed—Greek, “tend as a shepherd.” living fountains of water—A, B, Vulgate, and CYPRIAN read, (eternal) “life’s fountains of waters.” “Living” is not supported by the old authorities.

CHAPTER VIII.

Ver. 1-13. SEVENTH SEAL. PREPARATION FOR THE SEVEN TRUMPETS. THE FIRST FOUR AND THE CONSEQUENT PLAGUES. 1. was—Greek, “came to pass;” “began to be.” silence in heaven about . . . half an hour—The last seal having been broken open, the book of God’s eternal plan of redemption is opened for the Lamb to read to the blessed ones in heaven. The half hour’s silence contrasts with the previous jubilant songs of the great multitude, taken up by the angels (ch. 7. 9-11). It is the solemn introduction to the employments and enjoyments of the eternal Sabbath-rest of the people of God, commencing with the Lamb’s reading the book heretofore sealed up, and which we cannot know till then. In ch. 10. 4, similarly at the eve of the sounding of the seventh trumpet, when the seven thunders uttered their voices, John is forbidden to write them. The seventh trumpet (ch. 11. 15-19) winds up God’s vast plan of providence and grace in redemption, just as the seventh seal brings it to the same consummation. So also the seventh vial, ch. 16. 17. Not that the seven seals, the seven trumpets, and the seven vials, though parallel, are repetitions. They each trace the course of Divine action up to the grand consummation in which they all meet, under a different aspect. Thunders, lightnings, an earthquake, and voices, close the seven thunders and the seven seals alike (cf. ch. 8. 5, with ch. 11. 19). Cf. at the seventh vial, the voices, thunders, lightnings, and earthquake, ch. 16. 18. The half-hour silence is the brief pause GIVEN TO JOHN between the preceding vision and the following one, implying, on the one hand, the solemn introduction to the eternal sabbatism which is to follow the seventh seal; and, on the other, the silence which continued during the incense-accompanied prayers which usher in the first of the seven trumpets (ch. 8. 3-5). In the Jewish temple, musical instruments and singing resounded during the whole time of the offering of the sacrifices, which formed the first part of the service. But at the offering of incense, solemn silence was kept (Psalm 62. 1, “My soul waiteth upon God.” Margin, “is silent;” 65. 1, Margin, the people praying secretly all the time. The half-hour stillness implies, too, the earnest adoring expectation with which the blessed spirits and the angels await the succeeding unfolding of God’s judgments. A short space is implied; for even an hour is so used (ch. 17. 12; 18. 10, 19). 2. the seven angels—Cf. the apocryphal Tobit, 12. 15, “I am Raphael, one of the seven holy angels which present the prayers of the saints, and which go in and out before the glory of the Holy One.” Cf. Luke 1. 19, “I am Gabriel, that stand in the presence of God.” stood—Greek, “stand.” seven trumpets—These come in during the time whilst the martyrs rest until their fellow-servants also, that should be killed as they were, should be fulfilled; for it is the inhabitants of the earth on whom the judgments fall, on whom also the martyrs prayed that they should fall (ch. 6. 10). All the ungodly, and not merely some one portion of them, are meant, all the opponents and obstacles in the way of the kingdom of Christ and His saints, as is proved by ch. 11. 15, 18, end, at the close of the seven trumpets. The Revelation becomes more special only as it advances farther (ch. 13.; 16. 10; 17.; 18). By the seven trumpets the world-kingsdoms are overturned to make way for Christ’s universal kingdom. The first four are connected together; and the last three, which alone have Woe, woe, woe (v. 7-13). 3. another angel—not Christ, as many think; for He, in Revelation, is always designated by one of His proper titles; though, doubtless, He is the only true High Priest, the Angel of the Covenant, standing before the golden altar of incense, and there, as Mediator, offering up His people’s prayers, rendered acceptable before God through the incense of His merit. Here the angel acts merely as a ministering spirit, just as the twenty-four elders have vials full of odours, or incense, which are the prayers of saints, and which they present before the Lamb. How precisely their ministry, in perfuming the prayers of the saints and offering them on the altar of incense, is exercised, we know not, but we do know they are not to be prayed to. If we send an offering of tribute to the king, the king’s messenger is not allowed to appropriate what is due to the king alone, there was given unto him—The angel does not provide the incense; it is given to him by Christ, whose meritorious obedience and death are the incense, rendering the saints’ prayers well pleasing to God. It is not the saints who give the angel the incense; nor are their prayers identified with the incense; nor do they offer their prayers to him. Christ alone is the Mediator through whom, and to whom, prayer is to be offered. offer it with the prayers—rather as Greek, “give it to the prayers,” so rendering them efficacious as a sweet-smelling savour to God. Christ’s merits alone can thus incense our prayers, though the angelic ministry be employed to attach this incense to the prayers. The saints’ praying on earth, and the angel’s incensing in heaven, are simultaneous. all saints—The prayers both of the saints in the heavenly rest, and of those militant on earth. The martyrs’ cry is the foremost, and brings down the ensuing judgments. golden altar—Antitype to the earthly. 4. the smoke . . . which came with the prayers . . . ascended up—rather, “the smoke of the incense FOR (or given to: ‘given’ being understood from v. 3) the prayers of the saints ascended up, out of the angel’s hand, in the presence of God.” The angel merely burns the incense given him by Christ the High Priest, so that its smoke blends with the ascending prayers of the saints. The saints themselves are priests; and the angels in this priestly ministration are but their fellow-servants (ch. 19. 10). 5. cast it into the earth—i. e., unto the earth; the hot coals off the altar cast on the earth, symbolize God’s fiery judgments about to descend on the Church’s foes in answer to the saints’ incense-perfumed prayers which have just ascended before God, and those of the martyrs. How marvellous the power of the saints’ prayers! there were—“there took place,” or “ensued.” voices . . . thunderings, &c.—B places the “voices” after “thunderings.” A places it after “lightnings.” 6. sound—blow the trumpets. 7. The common feature of the first four trumpets is, the judgments under them affect natural objects, the accessories of life, the earth, trees, grass, the sea, rivers, fountains, the light of the sun, moon and stars. The last three, the woe-trumpets (v. 13), affect men’s life with pain, death, and hell. The language is evidently drawn from the plagues of Egypt, five or six out of the ten exactly corresponding: the hail, the fire (Exodus 9. 24), the WATER turned to blood (Exodus 7. 19), the darkness (Exodus 10. 21), the locusts (Exodus 10. 12), and perhaps the death (ch. 9. 13). Judicial retribution in kind characterizes the inflictions of the first four, those elements which had been abused punishing their abusers, mingled with—A, B, and Vulgate, read, Greek, . . . IN blood. So in the case of the second and third vials (ch. 16. 3, 4). upon the earth—Greek, “unto the earth.” A, B, Vulgate, and Syriac add, “And the third of the earth was burnt up.” So under the third trumpet, the third of the rivers is affected; also, under the sixth trumpet, the third part of men are killed. In Zechariah 13. 8, 9 this tripartite division appears, but the proportions reversed, two parts killed, only a third preserved. Here, vice versa, two-thirds escape, one-third is smitten. The fire was the predominant element. all green grass—no longer a third, but all is burnt up. 8. as it were—not literally a mountain: a mountain-like burning mass. There is a plain allusion to Jeremiah 51. 25; Amos 7. 4. third part of the sea became blood—In the parallel second vial, the whole sea (not merely a third) becomes blood. The overthrow of Jericho, the type of the Antichristian Babylon, after which Israel, under Joshua (the same name as Jesus), victoriously took possession of Canaan, the type of Christ's and His people's kingdom, is perhaps alluded to in the SEVEN trumpets, which end in the overthrow of all Christ's foes, and the setting up of His kingdom. On the seventh day, at the seventh time, when the seven priests blew the seven rams' horn trumpets, the people shouted, and the walls fell flat: and then ensued the blood-shedding of the foe. A mountain-like fiery mass would not naturally change water into blood; nor would the third part of ships be thereby destroyed. The symbolical interpreters take the ships here to be churches. For the Greek here for ships is not the common one, but that used in the Gospels of the apostolic vessel in which Christ taught; and the first churches were in the shape of an inverted ship: and the Greek for destroyed is also used of heretical corruptings (1 Timothy 6. 5). 10. a lamp—a torch. 11. The symbolizers interpret the star fallen from heaven as a chief minister (ARIUS, according to BULLINGER, BENDEL, &c.); or some future false teacher, if, as is more likely, the event be still future) falling from his high place in the Church, and instead of shining with heavenly light as a star, becoming a torch lit with earthly fire and smouldering with smoke. And wormwood, though medicinal in some cases, if used as ordinary water would not only be disagreeable to the taste, but also fatal to life: so "heretical wormwood changes the sweet Siloas of Scripture into deadly Marahs." [WORDSWORTH.] Contrast the converse change of bitter Marah water into sweet, Exodus 15, 23, &c. ALFORD gives as an illustration in a physical point of view, the conversion of water into fire-water or ardent spirits, which may yet go on to destroy even as many as a third of the ungodly in the latter days. 12. third part—Not a total obscuration as in the sixth seal (ch. 6. 12, 13). This partial obscuration, therefore, comes between the prayers of the martyrs under the fifth seal, and the last overwhelming judgments on the ungodly under the sixth seal, at the eve of Christ's coming. the night likewise—withdrew a third part of the light which the bright Eastern moon and stars ordinarily afford. 13. an angel—A, B, Vulgate, Syriac, and Coptic, read for "angel," which is supported by none of the oldest MSS., "an eagle:" the symbol of judgment descending fatally from on high; the king of birds pouncing on the prey. Cf. this fourth trumpet and the flying eagle with the fourth seal introduced by the fourth living creature, "like a flying eagle," ch. 4. 7; 6. 7, 8: the aspect of Jesus as presented by the fourth Evangelist. John is compared in the cherubim (according to the primitive interpretation) to a flying eagle: Christ's Divine majesty in this similitude is set forth in the Gospel according to John, His judicial visitations in the Revelation of John. Contrast "another angel," or messenger, with "the everlasting Gospel," ch. 14. 6. through the midst of heaven—Greek, "in the mid-heaven," i. e., in the part of the sky where the sun reaches the meridian: in such a position as that the eagle is an object conspicuous to all. the inhabitants of the earth—the ungodly, the "men of the world," whose "portion is in this life," upon whom the martyrs had prayed that their blood might be avenged (ch. 6. 10). Not that they sought personal revenge, but their zeal was for the honour of God against the foes of God and His Church. the other—Greek, "the remaining voices."

CHAPTER IX.

Ver. 1-21. THE FIFTH TRUMPET: THE FALLEN STAR OPENS THE ABYSS WHENCE ISSUE LOCUSTS. THE SIXTH TRUMPET. FOUR ANGELS AT THE EUPHRATES LOOSED. 1. The last three trumpets of the seven are called, from ch. 8. 13, the woe-trumpets. fall—rather as Greek, "fallen." When John saw it, it was not in the act of falling, but had fallen already. This is a connecting link of this fifth trumpet with ch. 12. 8, 9, 12, "woe to the inhabitants of the earth, for the devil is come down," &c. Cf. Isaiah 14. 12,

"How art thou fallen from heaven, Lucifer, Son of the Morning!" the bottomless pit—Greek, "the pit of the abyss:" the orifice of the hell where Satan and his demons dwell. 3. upon—Greek, "unto," or "into," as the scorpions of the earth—As contrasted with the "locusts" which come up from hell, and are not "of the earth," have power—viz., to sting. 4. not hurt the grass . . . neither . . . green thing . . . neither . . . tree—the food on which they ordinarily prey. Therefore, not natural and ordinary locusts. Their natural instinct is supernaturally restrained to mark the judgment as altogether Divine. those men which—Greek, "the men whosoever." in—Greek, "upon their forehead." Thus this fifth trumpet is proved to follow the sealing in ch. 7., under the sixth seal. None of the saints are hurt by these locusts, which is not true of the saints in Mohammed's attack, who is supposed by many to be meant by the locusts; for many true believers fell in the Mohammedan invasions of Christendom. 5. they . . . they—The subject changes: the first "they" is the locusts; the second is the unsealed. five months—the ordinary time in the year during which locusts continue their ravages. their torment—the torment of the sufferers. This fifth verse and v. 6 cannot refer to an invading army. For an army would kill, and not merely torment. 6. shall desire—Greek, "eagerly desire:" set their mind on. shall flee—So B, Vulgate, Syriac, and Coptic, read. But A, & read, "Fleeeth," viz., continually. In ch. 6. 16, which is at a later stage of God's judgments, the ungodly seek annihilation, not from the torment of their suffering, but from fear of the face of the Lamb before whom they have to stand. 7. prepared unto battle—Greek, "made ready unto war." Cf. note Joel 2. 4, where the resemblance of locusts to horses is traced: the plates of a horse armed for battle are an image on a larger scale of the outer shell of the locust. crowns—(Nahum 3. 17.) ELLIOTT explains this of the turbans of Mohammedans. But how could turbans be "like gold?" ALFORD understands it of the head of the locusts actually ending in a crown-shaped fillet which resembled gold in its material. as the faces of men—The "AS" seems to imply the locusts here do not mean men. At the same time they are not natural locusts, for these do not sting men (v. 5). They must be supernatural. 8. hair of women—long and flowing. An Arabic proverb compares the antlers of locusts to the hair of girls. EWALD in ALFORD understands the allusion to be to the hair on the legs or bodies of the locusts: cf. "rough caterpillars," Jeremiah 51. 27. as the teeth of lions—(Joel 1. 6, as to locusts.) 9. as it were breastplates of iron—not such as forms the thorax of the natural locust. as . . . chariots (Joel 2. 5-7.) battle—Greek, "war." 10. tails like unto scorpions—like unto the tails of scorpions, and there were stings—There is no oldest MS. for this reading. A, B, & Syriac, and Coptic read, "and (they have) stings: and in their tails (is) their power (lit., authority: authorized power) to hurt," &c. 11. And—So Syriac. But A, B, & omit "and." had—Greek, "have." a king . . . which is the angel—English Version, agreeing with A, & reads the (Greek) article before "angel," in which reading we must translate, "They have as king over them the angel," &c. Satan (cf. v. 1). Omitting the article with B, we must translate, "They have as king an angel," &c.: one of the chief demons under Satan: I prefer from v. 1, the former. bottomless pit—Greek, "abyss," Abaddon—i. e., perdition or destruction (Job 26. 6; Proverbs 27. 20). The locusts are supernatural instruments in the hands of Satan to torment, and yet not kill, the ungodly, under this fifth trumpet. Just as in the case of godly Job, Satan was allowed to torment with elephantiasis, but not to touch his life. In v. 20, these two woe-trumpets are expressly called "plagues." ANDREAS OF CAESAREA, A. D. 500, held, in his Commentary on Revelation, that the locusts mean evil spirits again permitted to come forth on earth and afflict men with various plagues. 12. Greek, "The one woe." hereafter—Greek, "after these things." I agree with ALFORD, DE BURGII, &c., that these locusts from the abyss refer to judgments about to fall on the ungodly immediately before Christ's second advent. None of the interpretations which regard them as past, are satisfactory. Joel 1. 2-7; 2. 1-11, is strictly parallel, and expressly refers (2. 11) to THE DAY OF THE LORD GREAT AND VERY TERRIBLE: v. 10 gives the portents accompanying the day of the Lord's coming, the earth quaking, the heavens trembling, the sun, moon and stars, withdrawing their shining: v. 18, 31, 32, also point to the immediately succeeding deliverance of Jerusalem: cf. also, the previous last conflict in the valley of Jehoshaphat, and the dwelling of God thenceforth in Zion, blessing Judah. DE BURGH confines the locust-judgment to the Israelite land, even as the sealed in ch. 7. are Israelites: not that there are not others sealed as elect in the earth; but that, the judgment being confined to Palestine, the sealed of Israel alone needed to be expressly excepted from the visitation. Therefore, he translates throughout, "THE LAND" (i. e., of Israel and Judah), instead of "the earth." I incline to agree with him. 13. a voice—lit., "one voice." from—Greek, "out of." the four horns—A, Vulgate (Amiatinus MS.), Coptic, and Syriac, omit "four." B and CYPRIAN support it. The four horns together gave forth their voice, not diverse, but one. God's revelation (e. g., the Gospel), though in its aspects fourfold (four expressing world-wide extension; whence four is the number of the Evangelists), still has but one and the same voice. However, from the parallelism of this sixth trumpet to the fifth seal (ch. 6. 9, 10), the martyrs' cry for the avenging of their blood from the altar reaching its consummation under the sixth seal and sixth trumpet, I prefer understanding this cry from the four corners of the altar to refer to the saints' prayerful cry from the four quarters of the world, incensed by the angel, and ascending to God from the golden altar of incense, and bringing down in consequence fiery judgments. N omits the whole clause, "one from the four horns." 14. in—Greek (epi to potamo), "ON," or "AT, the great river." Euphrates—(Cf. ch. 16. 12.) The river whereat Babylon, the ancient foe of God's people, was situated. Again, whether from the literal region of the Euphrates, or from the spiritual Babylon (the apostate Church, especially ROME), four angelic ministers of God's judgments shall go forth, assembling an army of horsemen throughout the four quarters of the earth, to slay a third of men, the brunt of the visitation shall be on Palestine. 15. were— "which had been prepared." [TREBELLES rightly.] for an hour, &c.—rather as Greek, "for (i. e., against) THE hour, and day, and month, and year," viz., appointed by God. The Greek article (teen), put once only before all the periods, implies that the hour in the day, and the day in the month, and the month in the year, and the year itself, had been definitely fixed by God. The article would have been omitted had a sum-total of periods been specified, viz., 391 years and one month (the period from A. D. 1281, when the Turks first conquered the Christians, to 1672, their last conquest of them, since which last date their empire has declined). slay—not merely to "hurt" (v. 10), as in the fifth trumpet. third part—(Note, ch. 8. 7-12.) of men—viz., of earthy men, ch. 8. 13, "inhabiters of the earth," as distinguished from God's sealed people (of which the sealed of Israel, ch. 7., form the nucleus). 16. Cf. with these 200,000,000, Psalm 68. 17; Daniel 7. 10. The hosts here are evidently, from their numbers and their appearance (v. 17), not merely human hosts, but probably infernal, though constrained to work out God's will (cf. v. 1. 2). and I heard—A, B, N, Vulgate, Syriac, Coptic, and CYPRIAN, omit "and." 17. thus—as follows. of fire—the fiery colour of the breastplates answering to the fire which issued out of their mouths. of jacinth—lit., of hyacinth colour, the hyacinth of the ancients answering to our dark blue iris: thus, their dark, dull-coloured breastplates correspond to the smoke out of their mouths. brimstone—sulphur-coloured: answering to the brimstone or sulphur out of their mouths. 18. By these three—A, B, C, N, read (apo for hupo), "From:" implying the direction whence the slaughter came; not direct instrumentality as "by" implies. A, B, C, N, also add "plagues" after "three." English Version reading, which omits it, is not well supported. by the fire—Greek, "owing to the fire," lit., out of. 19. their—A,

B, C, N, read, "the power of the horses." In their mouth—whence issued the fire, smoke, and brimstone (v. 17). Many interpreters understand the horsemen to refer to the myriads of Turkish cavalry arrayed in scarlet, blue, and yellow (fire, hyacinth, and brimstone), the lion-headed horses denoting their invincible courage, and the fire and brimstone out of their mouths, the gunpowder and artillery introduced into Europe about this time, and employed by the Turks; the tails, like serpents, having a venomous sting, the false religion of Mohammed supplanting Christianity, or, as ELLIOTT thinks, the Turkish pachas' horse tails, worn as a symbol of authority. (1) All this is very doubtful. Considering the parallelism of this sixth trumpet to the sixth seal, the likelihood is that events are intended immediately preceding the Lord's coming. "The false prophet" (as Isaiah 9. 15 proves), or second beast, having the horns of a lamb, but speaking as the dragon, who supports by lying miracles the final Antichrist, seems to me to be intended. Mohammed, doubtless, is a forerunner of him, but not the exhaustive fulfiller of the prophecy here: Satan will, probably, towards the end, bring out all the powers of hell for the last conflict (Note, "devils," v. 20; cf. v. 1, 2, 17, 18). with them—with the serpent heads and their venomous fangs. 20. the rest of the men—i. e., the ungodly. yet—So A, Vulgate, Syriac, and Coptic. B, N, read, "did not even repent of," viz., so as to give up "the works," &c. Like Pharaoh hardening his heart against repentance, notwithstanding the plagues. of their hands—(Deuteronomy 31. 29.) Especially the idols made by their hands. Cf. ch. 13. 14, 15, "the image of the beast;" ch. 19. 20. that they should not—So B reads. But A, C, N, read, ". . . shall not:" implying a prophecy of certainty that it shall be so. devils—Greek, "demons" which lurk beneath the idols which idolaters worship. 21. sorceries—witchcrafts by means of drugs (so the Greek). One of the fruits of the unrenewed flesh: the sin of the heathen: about to be repeated by apostate Christians in the last days, ch. 22. 15, "sorcerers." The heathen who shall have rejected the proffered Gospel and clung to their fleshly lusts, and apostate Christians who shall have relapsed into the same, shall share the same terrible judgments. The worship of images was established in the East in 842 A. D. fornication—singular: whereas the other sins are in the plural. Other sins are perpetrated at intervals: those lacking purity of heart indulge in one perpetual fornication. [BENJEL.]

CHAPTER X.

Ver. 1-11. VISION OF THE LITTLE BOOK. As an episode was introduced between the sixth and seventh seals, so there is one here (ch. 10. 1-11, 14) after the sixth and introductory to the seventh trumpet (ch. 21. 15, which forms the grand consummation). The Church and her fortunes are the subject of this episode: as the judgments on the unbelieving inhabitants of the earth (ch. 8. 13) were the exclusive subject of the fifth and sixth woes/trumpets. Ch. 6. 11 is plainly referred to in v. 6 below; in ch. 6. 11 the martyrs crying to be avenged were told they must "rest yet for a little season" or time: in v. 6 here they are assured, "There shall be no longer (any interval of) time;" their prayer shall have no longer to wait, but (v. 7) at the trumpet-sounding of the seventh angel shall be consummated, and the mystery of God (His mighty plan heretofore hidden, but then to be revealed) shall be finished. The little open book (v. 2, 9, 10) is given to John by the angel, with a charge (v. 11) that he must prophesy again concerning (so the Greek) peoples, nations, tongues, and kings: which prophecy (as appears from ch. 11.) affects those peoples, nations, tongues, and kings only in relation to ISRAEL AND THE CHURCH, who form the main object of the prophecy. 1. Another mighty angel—as distinguished from the mighty angel who asked as to the former and more comprehensive book (ch. 5. 2), "Who is worthy to open the book?" clothed with a cloud—The emblem of God coming in judgment. a—A, B, C, N, read "The" referring to (ch. 4. 3) the rainbow already mentioned. rainbow upon his head—The emblem of covenant mercy to God's people, amidst judgments on God's foes. Resumed from ch. 4.3 (see Note there). face as . . . the sun—(Ch. 1. 16; 18. 1.) feet as pillars of fire—(Ch. 1. 15; Ezekiel 1. 7.) The angel, as representative of Christ, reflects His glory, and bears the insignia attributed in ch. 1. 15, 16; 4.3, to Christ Himself. The pillar of fire by night led Israel through the wilderness, and was the symbol of God's presence. 2. He had—Greek, "Having." in his hand—in his left hand: as in v.5 (Note), he lifts up his right hand to heaven. a little book—A roll little in comparison with the "book" (ch. 5. 1) which contained the whole vast scheme of God's purposes, not to be fully read till the final consummation. This other, a less book, contained only a portion which John was now to make his own (v. 9, 11), and then to use in prophesying to others. The New Testament begins with the word "book" (Greek biblus), of which "the little book" (Greek biblaridion) is the diminutive, "the little bible," the Bible in miniature. upon the sea . . . earth—Though the beast with seven heads is about to arise out of the sea (ch. 13. 1), and the beast with two horns like a lamb (ch. 13. 11) out of the earth, yet it is but for a time, and that time shall no longer be (v. 6, 7) when once the seventh trumpet is about to sound; the angel with his right foot on the sea, and his left on the earth, claims both as God's, and as about soon to be cleared of the usurper and his followers. 3. As . . . lion—Christ, whom the angel represents, is often so symbolized (ch. 5. 5, "the Lion of the tribe of Juda"). seven thunders—Greek, "the seven thunders." They form part of the Apocalyptic symbolism; and so are marked by the article as well known. Thus thunderings marked the opening of the seventh seal (ch. 8. 1, 5); so also at the seventh vial (ch. 16. 17, 18). WORDS-WORTH calls this the prophetic use of the article; "the thunders, of which more hereafter." Their full meaning shall be only known at the grand consummation marked by the seventh seal, the seventh trumpet (ch. 11. 19), and the seventh vial. uttered their—Greek, "spake their own voices;" i. e., voices peculiarly their own, and not now revealed to men. 4. When—N reads, "Whatsoever things." But most MSS. support English Version. uttered their voices—A, B, C, N omit "their voices." Then translate, "Had spoken." unto me—Omitted by A, B, C, N, Syriac. seal up—The opposite command to ch. 22. 20. Even though at the time of the end the things sealed in Daniel's time were to be revealed, yet not so the voices of these thunders. Though heard by John, they were not to be imparted by him to others in this book of Revelation; so terrible are they that God in mercy withholds them, since "sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." The godly are thus kept from morbid ponderings over the evil to come; and the ungodly are not driven by despair into utter recklessness of life. Alford adds another aim in concealing them, viz., "godly fear, seeing that the arrows of God's quiver are not exhausted." Besides the terrors foretold, there are others unutterable and more horrifying lying in the background. 5. lifted up his hand—So A and Vulgate read. But B, C, N, Syriac, Coptic, ". . . his right hand." It was customary to lift up the hand towards heaven, appealing to the God of truth, in taking a solemn oath. There is in this part of the vision an allusion to Daniel 12. Cf. v. 4, with Daniel 12. 4, 9; and this v. 5, 6, end, with Daniel 12. 7. But there the angel clothed in linen, and standing upon the waters, swore "a time, times, and a half," were to interpose before the consummation; here, on the contrary, the angel standing with his left foot on the earth, and his right upon the sea, swears there shall be time no longer. There he lifted up both hands to heaven; here he has the little book now open (whereas in Daniel the book is sealed) in his left hand (v. 2), and he lifts up only his right hand to heaven. 6. liveth for ever and ever—Greek, "liveth unto the ages of the ages" (cf. Daniel 12. 7). created heaven . . . earth . . . sea, &c.—This detailed designation of God as the Creator, is appropriate to the subject of the angel's oath, viz., the consummating of the mystery of God (v. 7), which can surely be brought to pass by the same Almighty power that created all things, and by none else, that there should be time no longer—Greek, "that time (i. e., an interval of time) no longer shall be." The martyrs shall have no longer a time to wait for the accomplishment of their prayers for the purgation of the earth by the judgments which shall remove their earth and God's foes from it (ch. 6. 11). The appointed season or time of delay is at an end (the same Greek is here as in ch. 6. 11, chronos). Not as English Version implies, Time shall end and eternity begin. 7. But—Connected with v. 6. "There shall be no longer time (i. e., delay), but in the days of the voice of the seventh angel, when he is about to (so the Greek) sound his trumpet (so the Greek), then (lit. also; which conjunction often introduces the consequent member of a sentence) the mystery of God is finished," lit., has been finished; the prophet regarding the future as certain as if it were past. A, C, N, and Coptic, read the past tense (Greek clesthee). B reads, as English Version, the future (Greek telesthee), "should be finished" (cf. ch. 11. 15-18). Sweet consolation to the waiting saints! The seventh trumpet shall be sounded without further delay. the mystery of God—the theme of the "little book," and so of the remainder of the Apocalypse. What a grand contrast to the "mystery of iniquity—Babylon!" The mystery of God's scheme of redemption, once hidden in God's secret counsel, and dimly shadowed forth in types and prophecies, but now more and more clearly revealed according as the Gospel-kingdom develops itself, up to its fullest consummation at the end. Then finally His servants shall praise Him most fully, for the glorious consummation of the mystery in having taken to Himself and His saints the kingdom so long usurped by Satan and the ungodly. Thus this verse is an anticipation of ch. 11. 15-18. declared to—Greek, "declared the glad tidings to." "The mystery of God" is the Gospel glad tidings. The office of the prophets is to receive the glad tidings from God, in order to declare them to others. The final consummation is the great theme of the Gospel announced to, and by, the prophets (cf. Galatians 3. 8). 8. spake . . . and said—So Syriac and Coptic read. But A, B, C, "(I heard) again speaking with me, and saying" (Greek talousan . . . legousan). little book—So N and B read. But A, C, "the book." 9. Greek, "I went away." John here leaves heaven, his standpoint of observation heretofore, to be near the angel standing on the earth and sea. Give—A, B, C, and Vulgate read the infinitive, "Telling him to give," eat it up—appropriate its contents so entirely as to be assimilated with (as food), and become part of thyself, so as to impart them the more vividly to others. His finding the roll sweet to the taste at first, is because it was the Lord's will he was doing, and because, divesting himself of carnal feeling, he regarded God's will as always agreeable, however bitter might be the message of judgment to be announced. Cf. Psalm 40. 8, Margin, as to Christ's inner complete appropriation of God's word. thy belly bitter—Parallel to Ezekiel 2. 10, "There was written therein lamentations, and mourning, and woe." as honey—(Psalm 19. 10; 119. 103.) Honey sweet to the mouth, sometimes turns into bile in the stomach. The thought that God would be glorified (ch. 11. 3-6, 11-18) gave him the sweetest pleasure. Yet, afterwards the belly, or carnal natural feeling, was embittered with grief at the prophecy of the coming bitter persecutions of the Church (ch. 11. 7-10), cf. John 16. 1, 2. The revelation of the secrets of futurity is sweet to one at first, but bitter and distasteful to our natural man, when we learn the cross which is to be borne before the crown shall be won. John was grieved at the coming apostasy and the sufferings of the Church at the hands of Antichrist. 10. the little book—So A, C. But B, N, and Vulgate, "the book." was bitter—Greek, "was embittered." 11. he said—A, B, and Vulgate read, "they say unto me;" an indefinite expression for "it was said unto me." Thou must—The obligation lies upon thee, as the servant of God, to prophesy at His command. again—as thou didst already in the previous part of this book of Revelation. before—rather as Greek (epilais), "concerning many peoples," &c., viz., in their relation to the Church. The eating of the book, as in Ezekiel's case, marks John's inauguration to his prophetic office—here to a fresh stage in it, viz., the revealing of the things which befall the holy city and the Church of God—the subject of the rest of the book.

CHAPTER XI.

Ver. 1-19. MEASUREMENT OF THE TEMPLE. THE TWO WITNESSES' TESTIMONY; THEIR DEATH, RESURRECTION, AND ASCENSION; THE EARTHQUAKE; THE THIRD WOE; THE SEVENTH TRUMPET USHERS IN CHRIST'S KINGDOM. THANKSGIVING OF THE TWENTY-FOUR ELDERS. This eleventh chapter is a compendious summary of, and introduction to, the more detailed prophecies of the same events to come in chs. 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20. Hence we find anticipatory allusions to the subsequent prophecies; cf. v. 7, "the beast that ascendeth out of the bottomless pit" (not mentioned before), with the detailed accounts, ch. 13. 1, 11; 17. 8; also v. 8, "the great city," with ch. 14. 8; 17. 1, 5; 18. 10. 1. and the angel stood—Omitted in A, Vulgate and Coptic. Supported by B and Syriac. If it be omitted, the reed will, in construction, agree with "saying." So WORDSWORTH takes it. The reed, the canon of Scripture, the measuring-rod of the Church, our rule of faith, speaks. So in ch. 16. 7 the altar is personified as speaking (cf. Note there). The Spirit speaks in the canon of Scripture (the word canon is derived from Hebrew kaneh, "a reed," the word here used; and John it was who completed the canon). So VICTORINUS, AQUINAS, and VITERINGA. "Like a rod," viz., straight: like a rod of iron (ch. 2. 27), unbending, destroying all error, and that "cannot be broken." Ch. 2. 27; Hebrews 1. 8, Greek, "a rod of straightness," English Version, "a sceptre of righteousness;" this is added to guard against it being thought that the reed was one "shaken by the wind." In the abrupt style of the Apocalypse, "saying" is possibly indefinite, put for "one said." Still WORDSWORTH'S view agrees best with Greek. So the ancient commentator, ANDREAS OF CÆSAREA, in the end of the fifth century (cf. Note, v. 3, 4). the temple—Greek naon (as distinguished from the Greek hieron, or temple in general), the Holy place, "the sanctuary," the altar—of incense; for it alone was in the sanctuary (Greek naos). The measurement of the Holy place seems to me to stand parallel to the sealing of the elect of Israel under the sixth seal. God's elect are symbolized by the sanctuary at Jerusalem (1 Corinthians 3. 16, 17, where the same Greek word naos occurs for "temple," as here). Literal Israel in Jerusalem, and with the temple restored (Ezekiel 40. 3, 5, where also the temple is measured with the measuring-rod, 41., 42., 43., 44.), shall stand at the head of the elect Church. The measuring implies at once the exactness of the proportions of the temple to be restored, and the definite completeness (not one being wanting) of the numbers of the Israelite and of the Gentile elections. The literal temple at Jerusalem shall be the typical forerunner of the heavenly Jerusalem, in which there shall be all temple, and no portion exclusively set apart as temple. John's accurately drawing the distinction in subsequent chapters between God's servants, and those who bear the mark of the beast, is the way whereby he fulfils the direction here given him to measure the temple. The fact that the temple is distinguished from them that worship therein, favours the view that the spiritual temple, the Jewish and Christian Church, is not exclusively meant, but that the literal temple must also be meant. It shall be rebuilt on the return of the Jews to their land. Antichrist shall there put forward his blasphemous claims. The sealed elect of Israel, the head of the elect Church, alone shall refuse his claims. These shall constitute the true sanctuary which is here measured, i. e., accurately marked and kept by God, whereas the rest shall yield to his pretensions. WORDSWORTH objects that, in the twenty-five passages of the Acts, wherein the Jewish temple is mentioned, it is called hieron, not naos, and so in the apostolic Epistles; but this is simply because no occasion for mentioning the literal Holy place (Greek naos) occurs in Acts and the Epistles; indeed, in Acts 7. 48, though not directly, there does occur the term naos, indirectly referring to the Jerusalem temple Holy place. In addressing Gentile Christians, to whom the literal Jerusalem temple was not familiar, it was to be expected the term naos should not be found in the literal, but in the spiritual sense. In v. 19 naos is used in a local sense; cf. also ch. 14. 15, 17; 15. 5, 8. 2. But—Greek, "And." the court . . . without—all outside the Holy place (v. 1). leave out—of thy measurement, lit., "cast out;" reckon as unhallowed. it—Emphatical. It is not to be measured; whereas the holy place is. given—by God's appointment. unto the Gentiles—In the wider sense, there are meant here "the times of the Gentiles," wherein Jerusalem is "trodden down of the Gentiles," as the parallel, Luke 21. 24, proves; for the same word is used here [Greek patein], "tread under foot." Cf. also Psalm 79. 1; Isaiah 63. 18. forty . . . two months—(Ch. 13. 5.) The same period as Daniel's "time, times, and a half" (ch. 12. 14); and v. 3, and ch. 12. 6, the woman a fugitive in the wilderness "a thousand two hundred and threescore days." In the wider sense, we may either adopt the year-day theory of 1260 years (on which, and the papal rule of 1260 years, see my Notes, Daniel 7. 25; 8. 14; 12. 11), or rather, regard the 2300 days (Daniel 8. 14), 1335 days (Daniel 12. 11, 12), 1290 days, and 1260 days, as symbolical of the long period of the Gentile times, whether dating from the subversion of the Jewish theocracy at the Babylonian captivity (the kingdom having been never since restored to Israel), or from the last destruction of Jerusalem under Titus, and extending to the restoration of the theocracy at the coming of Him "whose right it is;" the different epochs marked by the 2300, 1335, 1290, and 1260 days, will not be fully cleared up till the grand consummation; but, meanwhile, our duty and privilege urge us to investigate them. Some one of the epochs assigned by many may be right, but as yet it is uncertain. The times of the Gentile monarchies during Israel's seven times punishment, will probably, in the narrower sense (v. 2), be succeeded by the much more restricted times of the personal Antichrist's tyranny in the Holy Land. The long years of papal misrule may be followed by the short time of the man of sin, who shall concentrate in himself all the apostasy, persecution, and evil of the various forerunning Antichrists, Antiochus, Mohammed, Popery, just before Christ's advent. His time shall be the RECAPITULATION and open consummation of the "mystery of iniquity" so long leavening the world. Witnessing churches may be followed by witnessing individuals, the former occupying the longer, the latter, the shorter period. The three and a half (1260 days being three and a half years of 360 days each, during which the two witnesses prophesy in sackcloth) is the sacred number seven halved, implying the Antichristian world-power's time is broken at best; it answers to the three and a half years' period in which Christ witnessed for the truth, and the Jews, His own people, disowned Him, and the God-opposed world-power crucified Him (cf. Note, Daniel 9. 27). The three and a half, in a word, marks the time in which the earthly rules over the heavenly kingdom. It was the duration of Antiochus' treading down of the temple and persecution of faithful Israelites. The resurrection of the witnesses after three and a half days, answers to Christ's resurrection after three days. The world-power's times never reach the sacred fullness of seven times 360, i. e., 2520, though they approach to it in 2300 (Daniel 8. 14). The forty-two months answer to Israel's forty-two sojournings (Numbers 33. 1-50) in the wilderness, as contrasted with the sabbatic rest in Canaan: reminding the Church that here, in the world-wilderness, she cannot look for her sabbatic rest. Also, three and a half years was the period of the heaven being shut up, and of consequent famine, in Elias' time. Thus, three and a half represented to the Church the idea of toil, pilgrimage, and persecution. 3. I will give power—There is no "power" in the Greek, so that "give" must mean "give commission," or some such word. my two witnesses—Greek, "the two witnesses of me." The article implies that the two were well known at least to John. prophecy—preach under the inspiration of the Spirit, denouncing judgments against the apostate. They are described by symbol as "the two olive trees" and "the two candlesticks," or lamp-stands, "standing before the God of the earth." The reference is to Zechariah 4. 3, 12, where two individuals are meant, Joshua and Zerubbabel, who ministered to the Jewish Church, just as the two olive trees emptied the oil out of themselves into the bowl of the candlestick. So in the final apostasy God will raise up two inspired witnesses to minister encouragement to the afflicted, though sealed, remnant. As two candlesticks are mentioned v. 4, but only one in Zechariah 4., I think the twofold Church, Jewish and Gentile, may be meant by the two candlesticks represented by the two witnesses: just as in ch. 7. there are described first the sealed of Israel, then those of all nations. But see Note, v. 4. The actions of the two witnesses are just those of Moses when witnessing for God against Pharaoh (the type of Antichrist, the last and greatest foe of Israel), turning the waters into blood, and smiting with plagues; and of Elijah (the witness for God in an almost universal apostasy of Israel, a remnant of 7000, however, being left, as the 144,000 sealed, ch. 7.) causing fire by his word to devour the enemy, and shutting heaven, so that it rained not for three years and six months, the very time (1260 days) during which the two witnesses prophesy. Moreover, the words "witness" and "prophecy" are usually applied to individuals, not to abstractions (cf. Psalm 52. 8). DE BURGH thinks Elijah and Moses will again appear, as Malachi 4. 5, 6 seems to imply (cf. Matthew 17. 11; Acts 3. 21). Moses and Elijah appeared with Christ at the Transfiguration, which foreshadowed His coming millennial kingdom. As to Moses, cf. Deuteronomy 34. 5, 6; Jude 9. Elias' genius and mode of procedure bears the same relation to the second coming of Christ, that John the Baptist's did to the first coming. [BENGE.] Many of the early Church thought the two witnesses to be Enoch and Elijah. This would avoid the difficulty of the dying a second time, for these have never yet died; but, perhaps, shall be the witnesses slain. Still, the turning the water to blood, and the plagues (v. 6), apply best to Moses (cf. ch. 15. 3, "the song of Moses"). The transfiguration-glorification of Moses and Elias was not their permanent resurrection-state, which shall not be till Christ shall come to glorify His saints, for He has precedence before all in rising. An objection to this interpretation is, that those blessed departed servants of God would have to submit to death (v. 7, 8), and this in Moses' case a second time, which Hebrews 9. 27 denies. See my Note, Zechariah 4. 11, 12, on the two witnesses as answering to "the two olive trees." The two olive trees are channels of the oil feeding the Church, and symbols of peace. The Holy Spirit is the oil in them. Christ's witnesses, in remarkable times of the Church's history, have generally appeared in pairs: as Moses and Aaron, the inspired civil and religious authorities; Caleb and Joshua; Ezekiel the priest and Daniel the prophet; Zerubbabel and Joshua. in sackcloth—The garment of prophets, especially when calling people to mortification of their sins, and to repentance. Their very exterior aspect accorded with their teachings: so Elijah, and John who came in His spirit and power. The sackcloth of the witnesses is a catchword linking this episode under the sixth trumpet, with the sun black as sackcloth (in righteous retribution on the apostates who rejected God's witnesses) under the sixth seal (ch. 6. 12). 4. standing before the God of the earth—A, B, C, Vulgate, Syriac, Coptic, and ANDREAS read "Lord" for "God:" so Zechariah 4. 14. Ministering to (Luke 1. 19), and as in the sight of Him, who, though now so widely disowned on earth, is its rightful King, and shall at last be openly recognized as such (v. 15). The phrase alludes to Zechariah 4. 10, 14, "the two anointed ones that stand by the Lord of the whole earth." The article "the" marks this allusion. They are "the two candlesticks," not that they are the Church, the one candlestick, but as its representative light-bearers (Greek, Philippians 2. 15, phostores), and ministering for its encouragement in a time of apostasy. WORDSWORTH'S view is worth consideration, whether it may not constitute a secondary sense: the two witnesses, the olive trees, are THE TWO TESTAMENTS ministering their testimony to the Church of the old dispensation, as well as to that of the new, which explains the two witnesses being called also the two candlesticks (the Old and New Testament churches: the candlestick in Zechariah 4. is but one, as there was then but one Testament, and one Church, the Jewish). The Church in both dispensations has no light in herself, but derives it from the Spirit through the witness of the twofold word, the two olive trees: cf. (Note) v. 1, which is connected with this, the reed, the Scripture canon, being the measure of the Church: so PRIMASUS X., p. 314: the two witnesses preach in sackcloth, marking the ignominious treatment which the word, like Christ Himself, receives from the world. So the twenty-four elders represent the ministers of the two dispensations by the double twelve. But v. 7 proves that primarily the two Testaments cannot be meant; for these shall never be "killed," and never "shall have finished their testimony" till the world is finished. 5. will hurt—Greek, "wishes," or "desires to hurt them." fire . . . devourth—(Cf. Jeremiah 5. 14; 23. 29). out of their month—Not literally, but God makes their inspired denunciations of judgment to come to pass and devour their enemies. if any man will hurt them—Twice repeated, to mark the immediate certainty of the accomplishment. in this manner—so in like manner as he tries to hurt them (cf. ch. 13. 10). Retribution in kind. 6. These . . . power—Greek, "authorized power." it rain not—Greek (huetos brechee), "rain shower not," lit., "moisten not" (the earth). smite . . . with all plagues—Greek, "with (lit., in) every plague." 7. finished their testimony—The same verb is used of Paul's ending his ministry by a violent death. the beast that ascended out of the bottomless pit—Greek, "the wild beast . . . the abyss." This beast was not mentioned before, yet he is introduced as "the beast," because he had already been described by Daniel (7. 3, 11), and he is fully so in the subsequent part of the Apocalypse, viz., ch. 13. 1; 17. 8. Thus, John at once appropriates the Old Testament prophecies; and also, vewing his whole subject at a glance, mentions as familiar things (though not yet so to the reader) objects to be described hereafter by himself. It is a proof of the unity that pervades all Scripture. make war against them—alluding to Daniel 7. 21, where the same is said of the little horn that sprang up among the ten horns on the fourth beast. 8. dead bodies—So Vulgate, Syriac and ANDREAS. But A, B, C, the oldest MSS., and Coptic read the singular, "dead body." The two fallen in one cause are considered as one. the great city—Eight times in the Revelation elsewhere used of BABYLON (ch. 14. 8; 16. 19; 17. 18; 18. 10, 16, 18, 19, 21). In ch. 21. 10 (English Version as to the new Jerusalem), the oldest MSS. omit "the great" before city, so that it forms no exception. It must, therefore, have an anticipatory reference to the mystical Babylon. which—Greek, "the which," viz., the city which. spiritually—in a spiritual sense. Sodom—The very term applied by Isaiah 1. 10 to apostate Jerusalem (cf. Ezekiel 16. 48). Egypt—the nation which the Jews' besetting sin was to lean upon. where . . . Lord was crucified—This identifies the city as Jerusalem, though the Lord was crucified outside of the city. EUSEBIUS mentions that the scene of Christ's crucifixion was enclosed within the city by Constantine; so it will be probably at the time of the slaying of the witnesses. The Beast [e. g., Napoleon and France's efforts] has been long struggling for a footing in Palestine; and by his ascent from the bottomless pit he struggles much more. [BENGE.] Some one of the Napoleonic dynasty may obtain that footing, and even be regarded as Messiah by the Jews, in virtue of his restoring them to their own land; and so may prove to be the last Antichrist. The difficulty is, how can Jerusalem be called "the great city," i. e., Babylon? By her becoming the world's capital of idolatrous apostasy, such as Babylon originally was, and then Rome has been; just as she is here called also "Sodom and Egypt." also our—A, B, C, ORIGEN, ANDREAS, &c., read, "also their." Where their Lord, also, as well as they, was slain. Cf. ch. 18. 24, where the blood of ALL slain on earth is said to be found in BABYLON, just as in Matthew 23. 35, Jesus saith that, "upon the Jews and JERUSALEM" (cf. v. 37, 38) shall "come ALL the righteous blood shed upon earth;" whence it follows Jerusalem shall be the last capital of the world-apostasy, and so receive the last and worst visitation of all the judgments ever inflicted on the poststate world, the earnest of which was given in the Roman destruction of Jerusalem. In the wider sense, in the Church-historical period, the Church being the sanctuary, all outside of it is the world, the great city, wherein all the martyrdoms of saints have taken place. Babylon marks its idolatry, Egypt its tyranny, Sodom its desperate corruption, Jerusalem its pretensions to sanctity on the ground of spiritual privileges, whilst all the while it is the murderer of Christ in the person of His members. All which is true of Rome. So VIRGINIA. But in the more definite sense, Jerusalem is regarded, even in Hebrews (ch. 13. 12-14), as the world-city which believers were then to go forth from, in order to "seek one to come." 9. they—rather, "(some) of the peoples," people—Greek, "peoples." kindreds—Greek, "tribes;" all save the elect (whence it is not said, The peoples, &c., but [some] of the peoples, &c.; or, some of the peoples, &c., may refer to those of the nations, &c., who at the time shall hold possession of Palestine and Jerusalem). shall see—So Vulgate, Syriac, and Coptic. But A, B, C, ANDREAS, the present, "see," or rather (Greek blepousin), "look upon." The prophetic present. dead bodies—So Vulgate, Syriac, and ANDREAS. But A, B, C, and Coptic, singular, as in v. 8, "dead body." Three and a half days answer to the three and a half years (Notes, v. 2, 3), the half of seven, the full and perfect number. shall not suffer—So B, Syriac, Coptic, and ANDREAS. But A, C, and Vulgate read, "do not suffer." in graves—So Vulgate and PRIMASIVS. But B, C, Syriac, Coptic, and ANDREAS, singular; translate, "into a sepulchre," lit., a monument. Accordingly, in righteous retribution in kind, the flesh of the Antichristian hosts is not buried, but given to all the fowls in mid-heaven to eat (ch. 19. 17, 18, 21). 10. they that dwell upon . . . earth—those who belong to the earth, as its citizens, not to heaven (ch. 3. 10; 8. 13; 12. 12; 13. 8). shall—So Vulgate, Syriac, and Coptic. But A, B, C read the present; cf. Note, on "shall not suffer," v. 9. rejoice over them—The Antichristianity of the last days shall probably be under the name of philosophical enlightenment and civilization, but really man's defilement of himself. Fanaticism shall lead Antichrist's followers to exult in having at last seemingly silenced in death their Christian rebukers. Like her Lord, the Church will have her dark passion-week followed by the bright resurrection-morn. It is a curious historical coincidence that, at the fifth Lateran Council, May 5, 1514, no witness (not even the Moravians who were summoned) testified for the truth, as HUSS and JEROME did at Constance; an orator ascended the tribunal before the representatives of Papal Christendom, and said, There is no reclaimant, no opponent. LUTHER, on October 31, 1517, exactly three and a half years afterwards, posted up his famous thesis on the church at Wittenberg. The objection is, the years are years of 365, not 360, days, and so two and a half days are deficient; but still the coincidence is curious; and if this prophecy be allowed other fulfillments, besides the final and literal one under the last Antichrist, this may reasonably be regarded as one. send gifts one to another—as was usual at a joyous festival. tormented them—viz., with the plagues which they had power to inflict (v. 5, 6); also, by their testimony against the earthly. 11. Translate as Greek, "After the three days," &c. the Spirit of life—the same which breathed life into Israel's dry bones, Ezekiel 37. 10, 11 (where see my Notes), "Breath came into them." The passage here, as there, is closely connected with Israel's restoration as a nation to political and religious life. Cf. also concerning the same, Hosea 6. 2, where Ephraim says, "After two days will He revive us; in the third day He will raise us up, and we shall live in His sight." into—so B and Vulgate. But A reads (Greek en autois), " (so as to be) in them." stood upon their feet—the very words in Ezekiel 37. 10, which proves the allusion to be to Israel's resurrection, in contrast to "the times of the Gentiles" wherein these "tread under foot the holy city." great fear—such as fell on the soldiers guarding Christ's tomb at His resurrection

(Matthew 28. 4), when also there was a great earthquake (v. 2). saw—Greek, "beheld." 12. They—So A, C, Vulgate. But B, Coptic, Syriac, and ANDREAS read, "I heard." a cloud—Greek, "the cloud;" which may be merely the generic expression for what we are familiar with, as we say "the clouds." But I prefer taking the article as definitely alluding to the cloud which received Jesus at His ascension, Acts 1. 9 (where there is no article, as there is no allusion to a previous cloud, such as there is here). As they resembled Him in their three and a half years' witnessing, their three and a half days lying in death (though not for exactly the same time, nor put in a tomb as He was), so also in their ascension is the translation and transfiguration of the sealed of Israel (ch. 7.), and the elect of all nations, caught up out of the reach of the Antichristian foe. In ch. 14. 14, 15, 16, He is represented as sitting on a white cloud. their enemies beheld them—and were thus openly convicted by God for their unbelief and persecution of His servants; unlike Elijah's ascension formerly, in the sight of friends only. The Church caught up to meet the Lord in the air, and transfigured in body, is justified by her Lord before the world, even as the man-child (Jesus) was "caught up unto God and His throne" from before the dragon standing ready to devour the woman's child as soon as born. 13. "In that same (lit., the) hour," great earthquake—answering to the "great earthquake" under the sixth seal, just at the approach of the Lord (ch. 6. 12). Christ was delivered unto His enemies on the fifth day of the week, and on the sixth was crucified, and on the sabbath rested; so it is under the sixth seal and sixth trumpet that the last suffering of the Church, begun under the fifth seal and trumpet, is to be consummated, before she enters on her seventh day of eternal sabbath. Six is the number of the world-power's greatest triumph, but at the same time verges on seven, the Divine number, when its utter destruction takes place. Cf. 666 in ch. 13. 18, "the number of the beast." tenth part of the city fell—i. e., of "the great city" (ch. 16. 19; Zechariah 14. 2). Ten is the number of the world-kingdoms (ch. 17. 10-12), and the beast's horns (ch. 13. 1), and the dragon's (ch. 12. 3). Thus, in the Church-historical view, it is hereby implied, that one of the ten apostate world-kingdoms fall. But in the narrower view a tenth of Jerusalem under Antichrist falls. The nine-tenths remain, and become when purified the centre of Christ's earthly kingdom. of men—Greek, "names of men." The men are as accurately enumerated as if their names were given. seven thousand—ELLIOTT interprets seven chiliads or provinces, i. e., the seven Dutch United Provinces lost to the papacy; and "names of men," titles of dignity, duchies, lordships, &c. Rather, seven thousand combine the two mystical perfect and comprehensive numbers seven and thousand, implying the full and complete destruction of the impenitent. the remnant—consisting of the Israelite inhabitants not slain. Their conversion forms a blessed contrast to ch. 16. 9; and above, ch. 9. 20, 21. These repenting (Zechariah 12. 10-14; 13. 1), become in the flesh the loyal subjects of Christ reigning over the earth with His transfigured saints. gave glory to the God of heaven—which whilst apostates, and worshipping the beast's image, they had not done. God of heaven—The apostates of the last days, in pretended scientific enlightenment, recognize no heavenly power, but only the natural forces in the earth which come under their observation. His receiving up into heaven the two witnesses who had power during their time on earth to shut heaven from raining (v. 6), constrained His and their enemies who witnessed it, to acknowledge the God of heaven, to be God of the earth (v. 4). As in v. 4 He declared Himself to be God of the earth by His two witnesses, so now He proves Himself to be God of heaven also. 14. The second woe—That under the sixth trumpet (ch. 9. 12-21), including also the prophecy, ch. 11. 1-13: Woe to the world, joy to the faithful, as their redemption draweth nigh. the third woe cometh quickly—It is not mentioned in detail for the present, until first there is given a sketch of the history of the origination, suffering, and faithfulness of the Church in a time of apostasy and persecution. Instead of the third woe being detailed, the grand consummation is summarily noticed, the thanksgiving of the twenty-four elders in heaven for the establishment of Christ's kingdom on earth, attended with the destruction of the destroyers of the earth. 15. Sounded—with his trumpet. Evidently “the LAST trumpet.” Six is close to seven, but does not reach it. The world-judgments are complete in six, but by the fulfilment of seven the world-kingdoms become Christ's. Six is the number of the world given over to judgment. It is half of twelve, the Church's number, as three and a half is half of seven, the Divine number for completeness. BENGEL thinks the angel here to have been Gabriel, which name is compounded of El, God, and Geber, MIGHTY MAN (ch. 10. 1). Gabriel therefore appropriately announced to Mary the advent of the mighty God-man: cf. the account of the man-child's birth which follows (ch. 12. 1-6), to which this forms the transition, though the seventh trumpet in time is subsequent, being the consummation of the historical episode, chs. 12. and 13. The seventh trumpet, like the seventh seal and seventh vial, being the consummation, is accompanied differently from the preceding six: not the consequences which follow on earth, but those IN HEAVEN, are set before us, the great voices and thanksgiving of the twenty-four elders in heaven, as the half-hour's silence in heaven at the seventh seal, and the voice out of the temple in heaven, “It is done,” at the seventh vial. This is parallel to Daniel 2. 44, “The God of heaven shall set up a kingdom, which shall never be destroyed: and the kingdom shall not be left to other people, but it shall break to pieces all these kingdoms, and it shall stand for ever.” It is the setting up of Heaven's sovereignty over the earth visibly, which, when invisibly exercised, was rejected by the earthly rulers heretofore. The distinction of worldly and spiritual shall then cease. There will be no beast in opposition to the woman. Poetry, art, science, and social life will be at once worldly and Christian. kingdoms—A, B, C, Vulgate read the singular, “The kingdom (sovereignty) of (over) the world is our Lord's and His Christ's.” There is no good authority for English Version reading. The kingdoms of the world give way to the kingdom of (over) the world exercised by Christ. The earth-kingdoms are many: His shall be one. The appellation “Christ,” the Anointed, is here, where His kingdom is mentioned, appropriately for the first time used in Revelation. For it is equivalent to KING. Though priests and prophets also were anointed, yet this term is peculiarly applied to Him as King, inasmuch that “the Lord's anointed” is His title as KING, in places where He is distinguished from the priests. The glorified Son of man shall rule mankind by His transfigured Church in heaven, and by His people Israel on earth: Israel shall be the priestly mediator of blessings to the whole world, realizing them first. he—Not emphatical in the Greek. shall reign for ever and ever—Greek, “unto the ages of the ages.” Here begins the millennial reign, the consummation of “the mystery of God” (ch. 10. 7). 16. before God—B and Syriac read, “before the throne of God.” But A, C, Vulgate, and Coptic read as English Version. seats—Greek, “thrones.” 17. thanks—for the answer to our prayers (ch. 6. 10, 11) in destroying them which destroy the earth (v. 18), thereby preparing the way for setting up the kingdom of thyself and thy saints. and art to come—Omitted in A, B, C, Vulgate, Syriac, Cyprian, and Andreas. The consummation having actually come, they do not address Him as they did when it was still future, “Thou that art to come.” Cf. v. 18, “is come.” From the sounding of the seventh trumpet He is to His people JAI, the ever-present Lord, who is, more peculiarly than JEHOVAH “who is, was, and is to come.” taken to thee thy great power—“to thee” is not in the Greek. Christ takes to Him the kingdom as His own of right. 18. the nations were angry—Alluding to Psalm 99. 1, LXX., “The Lord is become King: let the peoples become angry.” Their anger is combined with alarm (Exodus 15. 14; 2 Kings 19. 26, 28, “thy rage against me is come up into mine ears, I will put my hook in thy nose,” &c.). Translate, as the Greek is the same, “The nations were angered, and thy anger is come.” How petty man's impotent anger, standing here side by side with that of the omnipotent God! dead . . . be judged—Proving that this seventh trumpet is at the end of all things, when the judgment on Christ's foes, and the reward of His saints, long prayed for by His saints, shall take place. the prophets—as, for instance, the two prophesying witnesses (v. 3), and those who have showed them kindness for Christ's sake. Jesus shall come to effect by His presence that which we have looked for long, but vainly, in His absence, and by other means. destroy them which destroy the earth—Retribution in kind (cf. ch. 16. 6; Luke 19. 27). Daniel 7. 14-18, my Notes. 19. A similar solemn conclusion to that of the seventh seal, ch. 8. 5, and to that of the seventh vial, ch. 16. 18. Thus, it appears, the seven seals, the seven trumpets, and the seven vials, are not consecutive, but parallel, and ending in the same consummation. They present the unfolding of God's plans for bringing about the grand end under three different aspects, mutually complementing each other. the temple—the sanctuary or Holy place (Greek naos), not the whole temple (Greek hieron). opened in heaven—A, C read the article, “the temple of God which is in heaven, was opened.” the ark of his testament—“ . . . His covenant.” As in the first verse the earthly sanctuary was measured, so here its heavenly antitype is laid open, and the antitype above to the ark of the covenant in the Holiest place below is seen, the pledge of God's faithfulness to His covenant in saving His people, and punishing their and His enemies. Thus this forms a fit close to the series of trumpet-judgments, and an introduction to the episode (ch. 12. and 13), as to His faithfulness to His Church. Here first His secret place, the heavenly sanctuary, is opened for the assurance of His people; and thence proceed His judgments in their behalf (ch. 14. 15, 17; 15. 5; 16. 17), which the great company in heaven laud as “true and righteous.” This then is parallel to the scene at the heavenly altar, at the close of the seals and opening of the trumpets (ch. 8. 3), and at the close of the episode (chs. 12.-15) and opening of the vials (ch. 15. 7, 8). See Note at the opening of next chapter.

CHAPTER XII.

Ver. 1-17. VISION OF THE WOMAN, HER CHILD, AND THE PERSECUTING DRAGON. 1. This episode (chs. 12., 13., 14., and 15.) describes in detail the persecution of Israel and the elect Church by the beast, which had been summarily noticed, ch. 11. 7-10, and the triumph of the faithful, and torment of the unfaithful. So also chs. 16.-20, are the description in detail of the judgment on the beast, &c., summarily noticed in ch. 11. 13, 18. The beast in v. 3, &c., is shown not to be alone, but to be the instrument in the hand of a greater power of darkness, Satan. That this is so, appears from the time of ch. 11. being the period also in which the events of chs. 12. and 13. take place, viz., 1260 days (v. 6, 14; ch. 13. 5; cf. ch. 11. 2, 3). great—in size and significance. wonder—Greek, “sign:” significant of momentous truths. in heaven—not merely the sky, but the heaven beyond just mentioned, ch. 11. 19; cf. v. 7-9. woman clothed with the sun . . . moon under her feet—The Church, Israel first, and then the Gentile Church; clothed with Christ, “the Sun of righteousness.” “Fair as the moon, clear as the sun.” Clothed with the Sun, the Church is the bearer of Divine supernatural light in the world. So the seven churches (i. e., the Church universal, the woman) are represented as light-bearing candlesticks (ch. 1). On the other hand, the moon, though standing above the sea and earth, is altogether connected with them, and is an earthly light: sea, earth, and moon represent the worldly element, in opposition to the kingdom of God—heaven, the sun. The moon cannot disperse the darkness and change it into day: thus she represents the world-religion (heathenism) in relation to the supernatural world. The Church has the moon, therefore, under her feet; but the stars, as heavenly lights, on her head. The devil directs his efforts against the stars, the angels of the churches, about hereafter to shine for ever. The twelve stars, the crown around her head, are the twelve tribes of Israel. [AUBERLEN.] The allusions to Israel before accord with this: cf. ch. 11. 19, "the temple of God;" "the ark of His testament." The ark lost at the Babylonian captivity, and never since found, is seen in the "temple of God opened in heaven," signifying that God now enters again into covenant with His ancient people. The woman cannot mean, literally, the virgin mother of Jesus, for she did not flee into the wilderness and stay there for 1260 days, whilst the dragon persecuted the remnant of her seed (v. 13-17). [DE BURGH.] The sun, moon, and twelve stars, are emblematical of Jacob, Leah, or else Rachel, and the twelve patriarchs, i. e., the Jewish Church: secondarily, the Church universal, having under her feet, in due subordination, the ever-changing moon, which shines with a borrowed light, emblem of the Jewish dispensation, which is now in a position of inferiority, though supporting the woman, and also of the changeful things of this world, and having on her head the crown of twelve stars, the twelve apostles, who, however, are related closely to Israel's twelve tribes. The Church, in passing over into the Gentile world, is (1.) persecuted, (2.) then seduced, as heathenism begins to react on her. This is the key to the meaning of the symbolic woman, beast, harlot, and false prophet. Woman and beast form the same contrast as the Son of man and the beasts in Daniel. As the Son of man comes from heaven, so the woman is seen in heaven (v. 1). The two beasts arise respectively out of the sea (cf. Daniel 7. 3) and the earth (ch. 13. 1, 11): their origin is not of heaven, but of earth earthy. Daniel beholds the heavenly Bridegroom coming visibly to reign. John sees the woman, the Bride, whose calling is heavenly, in the world, before the Lord's coming again. The characteristic of woman, in contradistinction to man, is her being subject, the surrendering of herself, her being receptive. This similarly is man's relation to God, to be subject to, and receive from, God. All autonomy of the human spirit reverses man's relation to God. Womanlike receptivity towards God constitutes faith. By it the individual becomes a child of God; the children collectively are viewed as "the woman." Humanity, in so far as it belongs to God, is the woman. Christ, the Son of the woman, is in v. 5 emphatically called "the MAN-child" (Greek, huioi archein, "male-child"). Though born of a woman, and under the law for man's sake, He is also the Son of God, and so the HUSBAND of the Church. As Son of the woman, He is "Son of man;" as male-child, He is Son of God, and Husband of the Church. All who imagine to have life in themselves are severed from Him, the Source of life, and, standing in their own strength, sink to the level of senseless beasts. Thus, the woman designates universally the kingdom of God; the beast, the kingdom of the world. The woman of whom Jesus was born, represents the Old Testament congregation of God. The woman's travail-pains (v. 2) represent the Old Testament believers' ardent longings for the promised Redeemer. Cf. the joy at His birth (Isaiah 9. 6). As new Jerusalem (called also "the woman," or "wife," ch. 21. 2, 9-12) with its twelve gates, is the exalted and transfigured Church, so the woman with the twelve stars is the Church militant. 2. pained—Greek, "tormented" (basanizomene). DE BURGH explains this of the bringing in of the first-begotten into the world AGAIN, when Israel shall at last welcome Him, and when "the man-child shall rule all nations with the rod of iron." But there is a plain contrast between the painful travail of the woman here, and Christ's second coming to the Jewish Church, the believing remnant of Israel, "Before she travailed she brought forth . . . A MAN-CHILD," i. e., almost without travail-pangs, she receives (at His second advent), as if born to her, Messiah and a numerous seed. 3. appeared—"was seen." wonder—Greek, "sign" [semeion]. red—So A and Vulgate read. But B, C, and Coptic read, "of fire." In either case, the colour of the dragon implies his fiery rage as a murderer from the beginning. His representative, the beast, corresponds, having seven heads and ten horns (the number of horns on the fourth beast of Daniel 7.), ch. 13. 1. But there, ten crowns are on the ten horns (for, before the end, the fourth empire is divided into ten kingdoms); here, seven crowns (rather, "diadems," Greek, diademata, not stephanoi, "wreaths") are upon his seven heads. In Daniel 7. the Antichristian powers up to Christ's second coming are represented by four beasts, which have among them seven heads, i. e., the first, second, and fourth beasts having one head each, the third, four heads. His universal dominion as prince of this fallen world is implied by the seven diadems (contrast the "many diadems on Christ's head," ch. 19. 12, when coming to destroy him and his), the caricature of the seven Spirits of God. His worldly instruments of power are marked by the ten horns, ten being the number of the world. It marks his self-contradictions that he and the beast bear both the number seven (the Divine number) and ten (the world number). 4. drew—Greek present, "draweth," "drags down." His dragging down the stars with his tail (lashed back and forward in his fury), implies his persuading to apostatize, like himself, and to become earthy, those angels and also once eminent human teachers who had formerly been heavenly (cf. v. 1; ch. 1. 20; Isaiah 14. 12). stood—"stands" [ALFORD]: perfect, Greek hesteken. ready to be delivered—"about to bring forth," for to devour, &c.—"that when she brought forth he might devour her child." So the dragon, represented by his agent Pharaoh (a name common to all the Egyptian kings, and meaning, according to some, crocodile, a reptile like the dragon, and made an Egyptian idol), was ready to devour Israel's mules at the birth of the nation. Antiquity, the true Israel, Jesus, when born, was sought for destruction by Herod, who slew all the males in and around Bethlehem. 5. man-child—Greek, "a son, a male." On the deep significance of this term, cf. Notes, v. 1, 2. rule—Greek (poimainein), "tend as a shepherd" (see Note, ch. 2. 27). rod of iron—A rod is for long-continued obstinacy, until they submit themselves to obedience [BENGEL]: ch. 2. 27; Psalm 2. 9, which passages prove the Lord Jesus to be meant. Any interpretation which ignores this must be wrong. The male son's birth cannot be the origin of the Christian state (Christianity triumphing over heathenism under Constantine), which was not a Divine child of the woman, but had many impure worldly elements. In a secondary sense, the ascending of the witnesses up to heaven answers to Christ's own ascension, "caught up unto God, and unto His throne:" as also His ruling the nations with a rod of iron is to be shared in by believers (ch. 2. 27). What took place primarily in the case of the Divine Son of the woman, shall take place also in the case of those who are one with Him, the sealed of Israel (ch. 7.), and the elect of all nations, about to be translated and to reign with Him over the earth at His appearing. 6. woman fled—Mary's flight with Jesus into Egypt is a type of this. where she hath—So C reads. But A, B add "there." a place—that portion of the heathen world which has received Christianity professedly, viz., mainly the fourth kingdom, having its seat in the modern Babylon, Rome, implying that all the heathen world would not be Christianized in the present order of things. prepared of God—lit., "from God." Not by human caprice or fear, but by the determined counsel and foreknowledge of God, the woman, the Church, fled into the wilderness. they should feed her—Greek, "nourish her." Indefinite for "she should be fed." The heathen world, the wilderness, could not nourish the Church, but only afford her an outward shelter. Here, as in Daniel 4. 26, and elsewhere, the third person plural refers to the heavenly powers who minister from God nourishment to the Church. As Israel had its time of first bridal love, on its first going out of Egypt into the wilderness, so the Christian Church's wilderness-time of first love was the apostolic age, when it was separate from the Egypt of this world, having no city here, but seeking one to come; having only a place in the wilderness prepared of God (v. 6. 14). The harlot takes the world-city as her own, even as Cain was the first builder of a city, whereas the believing patriarchs lived in tents. Then apostate Israel was the harlot, and the young Christian Church the woman; but soon spiritual fornication crept in, and the Church in ch. 17. is no longer the woman, but the harlot, the great Babylon, which, however, has in it hidden the true people of God (ch. 18. 4). The deeper the Church penetrated into heathendom, the more she herself became heathenish. Instead of overcoming, she was overcome by the world. [AUBERLEN.] Thus, the woman is "the one inseparable Church of the Old and New Testament" [HENGSTENBERG], the stock of the Christian Church being Israel (Christ and His apostles being Jews), on which the Gentile believers have been grafted, and into which Israel, on her conversion, shall be grafted, as into her own olive tree. During the whole Church-historic period, or "times of the Gentiles," wherein "Jerusalem is trodden down of the Gentiles," there is no believing Jewish Church, and therefore, only the Christian Church can be "the woman." At the same time there is meant, secondarily, the preservation of the Jews during this Church-historic period, in order that Israel, who was once "the woman," and of whom the man-child was born, may become so again at the close of the Gentile times, and stand at the head of the two elections, literal Israel, and spiritual Israel, the Church elected from Jews and Gentiles without distinction. Ezekiel 20. 35, 36, "I will bring you into the wilderness of the people (Hebrew, peoples), and there will I plead with you . . . like as I pleaded with your fathers in the wilderness of Egypt" (cf. my Note there): not a wilderness literally and locally, but spiritually a state of discipline and trial among the Gentile "peoples," during the long Gentile times, and one finally consummated in the last time of unparalleled trouble under Antichrist, in which the sealed remnant (ch. 7.) who constitute "the woman," are nevertheless preserved "from the face of the serpent" (v. 14). thousand two hundred and threescore days—Anticipatory of v. 14, where the persecution which caused her to flee is mentioned in its place: ch. 13. gives the details of the persecution. It is most unlikely that the transition should be made from the birth of Christ to the last Antichrist, without notice of the long intervening Church-historic period. Probably the 1260 days, or periods, representing this long interval, are RECAPITULATED on a shorter scale analogically during the last Antichrist's short reign. They are equivalent to three and a half years, which, as half of the Divine number seven, symbolize the seeming victory of the world over the Church. As they include the whole Gentile times of Jerusalem's being trodden of the Gentiles, they must be much longer than 1260 years; for, above five and a half centuries more than 1260 years have elapsed since Jerusalem fell. 7. In Job 1. and 2., Satan appears among the sons of God, presenting himself before God in heaven, as the accuser of the saints: again in Zechariah 3. 1, 2. But at Christ's coming as our Redeemer, he fell from heaven, especially when Christ suffered, rose again, and ascended to heaven. When Christ appeared before God as our Advocate, Satan, the accusing adversary, could no longer appear before God against us, but was cast out judicially (Romans 8. 33, 34). He and his angels henceforth range through the air and the earth, after a time (viz., the interval between the ascension and the second advent) about to be cast hence also, and bound in hell. That "heaven" here does not mean merely the air, but the abode of angels, appears from v. 9, 10, 12; 1 Kings 22. 19-22. there was—Greek, "there came to pass," or "arose," war in heaven—What a seeming contradiction in terms, yet true! Contrast the blessed result of Christ's triumph, Luke 19. 38, "peace in heaven," Colossians 1. 20, "made peace through the blood of His cross, by Him to reconcile all things unto Himself; whether . . . things in earth, or things in heaven." Michael and his angels . . . the dragon . . . and his angels—It was fittingly ordered that, as the rebellion arose from unfaithful angels and their leader, so they should be encountered and overcome by faithful angels and their archangel, in heaven. On earth they are fittingly encountered, and shall be overcome, as represented by the beast and false prophet, by the Son of man and His armies of human saints (ch. 19. 14-21). The conflict on earth, as in Daniel 40, has its correspondent conflict of angels in heaven. Michael is peculiarly the prince, or presiding angel, of the Jewish nation. The conflict in heaven, though judicially decided already against Satan from the time of Christ's resurrection and ascension, receives its actual completion in the execution of judgment by the angels who cast out Satan from heaven. From Christ's ascension he has no standing-ground judicially against the believing elect. Luke 10. 18, "I beheld (in the earnest of the future full fulfilment given in the subjection of the demons to the disciples) Satan as lightning fall from heaven." As Michael fought before with Satan about the body of the mediator of the old covenant (Jude 9), so now the mediator of the new covenant, by offering His sinless body in sacrifice, arms Michael with power to renew and finish the conflict by a complete victory. That Satan is not yet actually and finally cast out of heaven, though the judicial sentence to that effect received its ratification at Christ's ascension, appears from Ephesians 6. 12, "spiritual wickedness in high (Greek, heavenly) places." This is the primary Church-historical sense here. But, through Israel's unbelief, Satan has had ground against that, the elect nation, appearing before God as its accuser. At the eve of its restoration, in the ulterior sense, his standing-ground in heaven against Israel, too, shall be taken from him, "the Lord that hath chosen Jerusalem" rebuking him, and casting him out from heaven actually and for ever by Michael, the prince, or presiding angel of the Jews. Thus Zechariah 3. 1-9 is strictly parallel, Joshua, the high priest, being representative of his nation Israel, and Satan standing at God's right hand as adversary to resist Israel's justification. Then, and not till then, fully (v. 10, "NOW," &c.) shall ALL things be reconciled unto Christ IN HEAVEN (Colossians 1. 20), and there shall be peace in heaven (Luke 19. 38), against—A, B, C read, "with." 8. prevailed not—A and Coptic read, "He prevailed not." But B, C read as English Version. neither—A, B, C read, "not even" (Greek oude); a climax. Not only did they not prevail, but not even their place was found any more in heaven. There are four gradations in the ever deeper downfall of Satan: (1.) He is deprived of his heavenly excellency, though having still access to heaven as man's accuser, up to Christ's first coming. As heaven was not fully yet opened to man (John 3. 13), so it was not yet shut against Satan and his demons. The Old Testament dispensation could not overcome him. (2.) From Christ, down to the millennium, he is judicially cast out of heaven as the accuser of the elect, and shortly before the millennium loses his power against Israel, and has sentence of expulsion fully executed on him and his by Michael. His rage on earth is consequently the greater, his power being concentrated on it, especially towards the end, when "he knoweth that he hath but a short time" (v. 12). (3.) He is bound during the millennium (ch. 20. 1-3). (4.) After having been loosed for a while, he is cast for ever into the lake of fire. 9. that old serpent—Alluding to Genesis 3. 1, 4. Devil—the Greek for "accuser," or "slanderer." Satan—the Hebrew for adversary, especially in a court of justice. The twofold designation, Greek and Hebrew, marks the twofold objects of his accusations and temptations, the elect Gentiles and the elect Jews. world—Greek, "habitable world." 10. Now—Now that Satan has been cast out of heaven. Primarily fulfilled in part at Jesus' resurrection and ascension, when He said (Matthew 28. 18), "All power [Greek exousia, 'authority,' as here; see below] is given unto me in heaven and in earth;" connected with v. 5, "Her child was caught up unto God and to His throne." In the ulterior sense, it refers to the eve of Christ's second coming, when Israel is about to be restored as mother-Church of Christendom, Satan, who had resisted her restoration on the ground of her unworthiness, having been cast out by the instrumentality of Michael, Israel's angelic prince (Note, v. 7). Thus this is parallel, and the necessary preliminary to the glorious event similarly expressed, ch. 11. 15, "The kingdom of this world is become (the very word here, Greek egeneto, 'is come,' 'hath come to pass') our Lord's and His Christ's," the result of Israel's resuming her place. salvation, &c.—Greek, "the salvation (viz., fully, finally, and victoriously accomplished, Hebrews 9. 23; cf. Luke 3. 6, yet future; hence, not till now do the blessed raise the fullest hallelujah for salvation to the Lamb, ch. 7. 10; 19. 1), the power (Greek dunamis), and the authority (Greek exousia; legitimate power; see above) of His Christ." accused them before our God day and night—Hence the need that the oppressed Church, God's own elect (like the widow, continually coming, so as even to weary the unjust judge), should cry day and night unto Him. 11. they—Emphatic in the Greek. "They" in particular. They and they alone. They were the persons who overcame. overcame—(Romans 8. 33, 34, 37; 16. 20.) him—(1 John 2. 14, 15.) It is the same victory (a peculiarly Johannean phrase) over Satan and the world which the Gospel of John describes in the life of Jesus, his Epistle in the life of each believer, and his Apocalypse in the life of the Church. by—Greek (dia to haima; accusative, not genitive, as English Version would require, cf. Hebrews 9. 12), "on account of (on the ground of) the blood of the Lamb;" "because of," &c.; on account of and by virtue of its having been shed. Had that blood not been shed, Satan's accusations would have been unanswerable; as it is, that blood meets every charge. SCHÖTTGEN mentions the Rabbinical tradition that Satan accuses men all days of the year, except the day of atonement. TRIRMAN takes the Greek dia, as it often means, out of regard to the blood of the Lamb; this was the impelling cause which induced them to undertake the contest for the sake of it; but the view given above is good Greek, and more in accordance with the general sense of Scripture. by the word of their testimony—Greek, "on account of the word of their testimony." On the ground of their faithful testimony, even unto death, they are constituted victors. Their testimony evinced their victory over him by virtue of the blood of the Lamb. Hereby they confess themselves worshippers of the slain Lamb, and overcome the beast, Satan's representative; an anticipation of ch. 15. 2, "them that had gotten the victory over the beast" (cf. ch. 13. 15, 16). unto—Greek (achri), "even as far as." They carried their not-love of life as far as even unto death. 12. Therefore—because Satan is cast out of heaven (v. 9). dwell—lit., "tabernacle." Not only angels and the souls of the just with God, but also the faithful militant on earth, who already in spirit tabernacle in heaven, having their home and citizenship there, rejoice that Satan is cast out of their home. "Tabernacle" for dwell is used to mark that, though still on the earth, they in spirit are hidden "in the secret of God's tabernacle." They belong not to the world, and, therefore, exult in judgment having been passed on the prince of this world. the inhabitants of—So ANDREAS reads. But A, B, C omit. The words, probably, were inserted from ch. 8. 13. is come down—rather as Greek (atebece), "is gone down;" John regarding the heaven as his standing-point of view whence he looks down on the earth. unto you—earth and sea, with their inhabitants; those who lean upon, and essentially belong to, the earth (contrast John 3. 7, Margin, with John 3. 31; 8. 23; Philippians 3. 19, end; 1 John 4. 5) and its sea-like troubled politics. Furious at his expulsion from heaven, and knowing that his time on earth is short until he shall be cast down lower, when Christ shall come to set up His kingdom (ch. 20. 1, 2), Satan concentrates all his power to destroy as many souls as he can. Though no longer able to accuse the elect in heaven, he can tempt and persecute on earth. The more light becomes victorious, the greater will be the struggles of the powers of darkness; whence, at the last crisis, Antichrist will manifest himself with an intensity of iniquity greater than ever before. short time—Greek, "season" (kairos): opportunity for his assaults. 13. Resuming from v. 6 the thread of the discourse, which had been interrupted by the episode, v. 7-12 (giving in the invisible world the ground of the corresponding conflict between light and darkness in the visible world), this verse accounts for her flight into the wilderness (v. 6). 14. were given—by God's determinate appointment, not by human chances (Acts 9. 1-11). two—Greek, "the two wings of the great eagle." Alluding to Exodus 19. 4: proving that the Old Testament Church, as well as the New Testament Church, is included in "the woman." All believers are included (Isaiah 40. 30, 31). The great eagle is the world-

power; in Ezekiel 17. 3, 7, Babylon and Egypt: in early Church-history, Rome, whose standard was the eagle, turned by God's providence from being hostile into a protector of the Christian Church. As "wings" express remote parts of the earth, the two wings may here mean the east and west divisions of the Roman empire. wilderness—the land of the heathen, the Gentiles: in contrast to Canaan, the pleasant and glorious land. God dwells in the glorious land; demons (the rulers of the heathen world, ch. 9. 20; 1 Corinthians 10. 20), in the wilderness. Hence Babylon is called the desert of the sea, Isaiah 21. 1-10 (referred to also in ch. 14. 8; 18. 2). Heathendom, in its essential nature, being without God, is a desolate wilderness. Thus, the woman's flight into the wilderness is the passing of the kingdom of God from the Jews to be among the Gentiles (typified by Mary's flight with her child from Judea into Egypt). The eagle-flight is from Egypt into the wilderness. The Egypt meant is virtually stated (ch. 11. 8) to be Jerusalem, which has become spiritually so by crucifying our Lord. Out of her the New Testament Church flees, as the Old Testament Church out of the literal Egypt; and as the true Church subsequently is called to flee out of Babylon (the woman become an harlot, i. e., the Church become apostate). [AUBERLEN.] her place—the chief seat of the then world-empire, Rome. The Acts of the Apostles describe the passing of the Church from Jerusalem to Rome. The Roman protection was the eagle-wing which often shielded Paul, the great instrument of this transmigration, and Christianity, from Jewish opponents who stirred up the heathen mobs. By degrees the Church had "her place" more and more secure, until, under Constantine, the empire became Christian. Still, all this Church-historical period is regarded as a wilderness-time, wherein the Church is in part protected, in part oppressed, by the world-power, until just before the end the enmity of the world-power under Satan shall break out against the Church worse than ever. As Israel was in the wilderness forty years, and had forty-two stages in her journey, so the Church for forty-two months, three and a half years or times (lit., seasons, used for years in Hellenistic Greek (MÆRIS, the Atticist), Greek kairotis, Daniel 7. 25; 12. 7), or 1260 days (r. 6) between the overthrow of Jerusalem and the coming again of Christ, shall be a wilderness-sojourner before she reaches her millennial rest (answering to Canaan of old). It is possible that, besides this Church-historical fulfilment, there may be also an ulterior and narrower fulfilment in the restoration of Israel to Palestine, Antichrist for seven times (short periods analogical to the longer ones) having power there, for the former three and a half times keeping covenant with the Jews, then breaking it in the midst of the week, and the mass of the nation fleeing by a second Exodus into the wilderness, whilst a remnant remains in the land exposed to a fearful persecution (the "144,000 sealed of Israel," ch. 7, and 14. 1, standing with the Lamb, after the conflict is over, on Mount Zion: "the first-fruits" of a large company to be gathered to Him). [DE BURGH.] These details are very conjectural. In Daniel 7. 25; 12. 7, the subject, as perhaps here, is the time of Israel's calamity. That seven times do not necessarily mean seven years, in which each day is a year, i. e., 2520 years, appears from Nebuchadnezzar's seven times (Daniel 4. 23), answering to Antichrist, the beast's duration. 15, 16. flood—Greek, "river" (cf. Exodus 2. 3; Matthew 2. 20; and especially Exodus 14). The flood, or river, is the stream of Germanic tribes which, pouring on Rome, threatened to destroy Christianity. But the earth helped the woman, by swallowing up the flood. The earth, as contradistinguished from water, is the world consolidated and civilized. The German masses were brought under the influence of Roman civilization and Christianity. [AUBERLEN.] Perhaps it includes also, generally, the help given by earthly powers (those least likely, yet led by God's overruling providence to give help) to the Church against persecutions and also heresies, by which she has been at various times assailed. 17. wroth with—Greek, "at." went—Greek, "went away." the remnant of her seed—distinct in some sense from the woman herself. Satan's first effort was to root out the Christian Church, so that there should be no visible profession of Christianity. Foiled in this, he wars (ch. 11. 7; 13. 7) against the invisible Church, viz., "those who keep the commandments of God, and have the testimony of Jesus" (A, B, C omit "Christ"). These are "the remnant," or rest of her seed, as distinguished from her seed, "the man-child" (v. 5), on one hand, and from mere professors on the other. The Church, in her beauty and unity (Israel at the head of Christendom, the whole forming one perfect Church), is now not manifested, but awaiting the manifestations of the sons of God at Christ's coming. Unable to destroy Christianity and the Church as a whole, Satan directs his enmity against true Christians, the elect remnant: the others he leaves unmolested.

CHAPTER XIII.

Ver. 1-18. VISION OF THE BEAST THAT CAME OUT OF THE SEA: THE SECOND BEAST, OUT OF THE EARTH, EXERCISING THE POWER OF THE FIRST BEAST, AND CAUSING THE EARTH TO WORSHIP HIM. I. I stood—So B, N, and Coptic read. But A, C, Vulgate, and Syriac, "He stood." Standing on the sand of the sea, HE gave his power to the beast that rose out of the sea. upon the sand of the sea—where the four winds were to be seen striving upon the great sea (Daniel 7. 2). beast—Greek, "wild beast." Man becomes "brutish" when he severs himself from God, the archetype and true ideal, in whose image he was first made, which ideal is realized by the man Christ Jesus. Hence, the world-powers seeking their own glory, and not God's, are represented as beasts; and Nebuchadnezzar, when in self-deification he forgot that "the Most High ruleth in the kingdom of men," was driven among the beasts. In Daniel 7, there are four beasts: here the one beast expresses the sum-total of the God-opposed world-power viewed in its universal development, not restricted to one manifestation alone, as Rome. This first beast expresses the world-power attacking the Church more from without; the second, which is a revival of, and minister to, the first, is the world-power as the false prophet corrupting and destroying the Church from within. out of the sea—(Daniel 7. 3; cf. my note, ch. 3. 8)—out of the troubled waves of peoples, multitudes, nations and tongues. The earth (v. 11), on the other hand, means the consolidated, ordered world of nations, with its culture and learning. seven heads and ten horns—A, B, C transpose, "ten horns and seven heads." The ten horns are now put first (contrast the order, ch. 12. 3) because they are crowned. They shall not be so till the last stage of the fourth kingdom (the Roman), which shall continue until the fifth kingdom, Christ's, shall supplant it and destroy it utterly; this last stage is marked by the ten toes of the two feet of the image in Daniel 2. The seven implies the world-power setting up itself as God, and caricaturing the seven Spirits of God; yet its true character as God-opposed is detected by the number ten accompanying the seven. Dragon and beast both wear crowns, but the former on the heads, the latter on the horns (ch. 12. 3; 13. 1). Therefore, both heads and horns refer to kingdoms; cf. ch. 17. 7, 10, 12, "kings" representing the kingdoms whose heads they are. The seven kings, as peculiarly powerful—the great powers of the world—are distinguished from the ten, represented by the horns (simply called "kings," ch. 17. 12). In Daniel, the ten mean the last phase of the world-power, the fourth kingdom divided into ten parts. They are connected with the seventh head (ch. 17. 12), and are as yet future. [AUBERLEN.] The mistake of those who interpret the beast to be Rome exclusively, and the ten horns to mean kingdoms which have taken the place of Rome in Europe already, is, the fourth kingdom in the image has two legs, representing the eastern as well as the western empire; the ten toes are not upon the one foot (the west), as these interpretations require, but on the two (east and west) together, so that any theory which makes the ten kingdoms belong to the west alone must err. If the ten kingdoms meant were those which sprung up on the overthrow of

Rome, the ten would be accurately known, whereas twenty-eight different lists are given in so many interpreters, making in all sixty-five kingdoms! [Tyso in DE BURGH.] The seven heads are the seven world-monarchies, Egypt, Assyria, Babylon, Persia, Greece, Rome, the Germanic empire, under the last of which we live [AUBERLEN], and which devolved for a time on Napoleon, after Francis, emperor of Germany and king of Rome, had resigned the title in 1806. FABER explains the healing of the deadly wound to be the revival of the Napoleonic dynasty after its overthrow at Waterloo. That secular dynasty, in alliance with the ecclesiastical power, the Papacy (v. 11, &c.), being "the eighth head," and yet "of the seven" (ch. 17. 11), will temporarily triumph over the saints, until destroyed in Armageddon (ch. 19). A Napoleon, in this view, will be the Antichrist, restoring the Jews to Palestine, and accepted as their Messiah at first, and afterwards fearfully oppressing them. Antichrist, the summing up and concentration of all the world evil that preceded, is the eighth, but yet one of the seven (ch. 17. 11). crowns—Greek, "diadems." name of blasphemy—So C, Coptic, and ANDREAS. A, B, and Vulgate read, "names," &c., viz., a name on each of the heads; blasphemously arrogating attributes belonging to God alone (cf. Note, ch. 17. 3). A characteristic of the little horn in Daniel 7. 8, 20, 21; 2 Thessalonians 2. 4. 2. leopard . . . lion—This beast unites in itself the God-opposed characteristics of the three preceding kingdoms, resembling respectively the leopard, bear, and lion. It rises up out of the sea, as Daniel's four beasts, and has ten horns, as Daniel's fourth beast, and seven heads, as Daniel's four beasts had in all, viz., one on the first, one on the second, four on the third, and one on the fourth. Thus it represents comprehensively in one figure the world-power (which in Daniel is represented by four) of all times and places, not merely of one period and one locality, viewed as opposed to God; just as the woman is the Church of all ages. This view is favoured also by the fact, that the beast is the vicarious representative of Satan, who similarly has seven heads and ten horns: a general description of his universal power in all ages and places of the world. Satan appears as a serpent, as being the archetype of the beast nature (ch. 12. 9). "If the seven heads meant merely seven Roman emperors, one cannot understand why they alone should be mentioned in the original image of Satan, whereas it is perfectly intelligible if we suppose them to represent Satan's power on earth viewed collectively." [AUBERLEN.] 3. one of—lit., "from among." wounded . . . healed—Twice again repeated emphatically (v. 12, 14); cf. ch. 17. 8, 11, "the beast that was, and is not, and shall ascend out of the bottomless pit" (cf. v. 11 below); the Germanic empire, the seventh head (revived in the eighth), as yet future in John's time (ch. 17. 10). Contrast the change whereby Nebuchadnezzar, being humbled from his self-deifying pride, was converted from his beast-like form and character to MAN'S form and true position towards God; symbolized by his eagle wings being plucked, and himself made to stand upon his feet as a man (Daniel 7. 4). Here, on the contrary, the beast's head is not changed into a human head, but receives a deadly wound, i. e., the world-kingdom which this head represents does not truly turn to God, but for a time its God-opposed character remains paralyzed ("as it were slain;") the very words marking the beast's outward resemblance to the Lamb, "as it were slain," Notes, ch. 5. 6. Cf. also the second beast's resemblance to the Lamb, v. 11). Though seemingly slain (Greek for "wounded"), it remains the beast still, to rise again in another form (v. 11). The first six heads were heathenish, Egypt, Assyria, Babylon, Persia, Greece, Rome; the new seventh world-power (the Pagan German hordes pouring down on Christianized Rome), whereby Satan had hoped to stifle Christianity (ch. 11. 15, 16), became itself Christianized (answering to the beast's, as it were, deadly wound: it was slain, and it is not, ch. 17. 11). Its ascent out of the bottomless pit answers to the healing of its deadly wound (ch. 17. 8). No essential change is noticed in Daniel as effected by Christianity upon the fourth kingdom; it remains essentially God-opposed to the last. The beast, healed of its temporary and external wound, now returns, not only from the sea, but from the bottomless pit, whence it draws new Antichristian strength of hell (v. 3, 11, 12, 14; ch. 11, 7; 17, 8). Cf. the seven evil spirits taken into the temporarily dispossessed, and the last state worse than the first, Matthew 12, 43-45. A new and worse heathenism breaks in upon the Christianized world, more devilish than the old one of the first heads of the beast. The latter was an apostasy only from the general revelation of God in nature and conscience; but this new one is from God's revelation of love in His Son. It culminates in Antichrist, the man of sin, the son of perdition (cf. ch. 17, 11); 2 Thessalonians 2, 3; cf. 2 Timothy 3, 1-4, the very characteristics of old heathenism (Romans 1, 29-32). [AUBERLEN.] More than one wound seems to me to be meant, e. g., that under Constantine (when the Pagan worship of the emperor's image gave way to Christianity), followed by the healing, when image-worship and the other Papal errors were introduced into the Church; again, that at the Reformation, followed by the lethargic form of godliness without the power, and about to end in the last great apostasy, which I identify with the second beast (v. 11), Antichrist, the same seventh world-power in another form. wondered after—followed with wondering gaze. 4. which gave—A, B, C, Vulgate, Syriac, and ANDREAS read, "because he gave." power—Greek, "the authority" which it had; its authority. Who is like unto the beast?—The very language appropriated to God, Exodus 15, 11 (whence, in the Hebrew, the Maccabees took their name; the opponents of the Old Testament Antichrist, Antiochus); Psalm 35, 10; 71, 19; 113, 5; Micah 7, 18; blasphemously (v. 1, 5) assigned to the beast. It is a parody of the name "Michael" (cf. ch. 12, 7), meaning, "Who is like unto God?" 5. blasphemies—So ANDREAS reads. B reads "blasphemy." A, "blasphemous things" (cf. Daniel 7, 8; 11, 25). power—"authority;" legitimate power (Greek exousia). to continue—Greek, "to act," or "work" (poiesai). B reads, "to make war" (cf. v. 4). But A, C, Vulgate, Syriac, and ANDREAS omit "war." forty . . . two months—(Notes, ch. 11, 2, 3; 12, 6.) 6. opened . . . mouth—The usual formula in the case of a set speech, or series of speeches. Ver. 6, 7 expand v. 5. blasphemy—So B and ANDREAS. A, C read "blasphemies." and them—So Vulgate, Coptic, ANDREAS, and PRIMASIVS read. A, C omit "and;" "them that dwell (lit., tabernacle) in heaven," mean not only angels, and the departed souls of the righteous, but believers on earth who have their citizenship in heaven, and whose true life is hidden from the Antichristian persecutor in the secret of God's tabernacle. Note, ch. 12, 12; John 3, 7. 7. power—Greek, "authority." all kindreds . . . tongues . . . nations—Greek, "every tribe . . . tongue . . . nation." A, B, C, Vulgate, Syriac, ANDREAS, and PRIMASIVS add "and people," after "tribe" or "kindred." 8. all that dwell upon the earth—being of earth earthy; in contrast to "them that dwell in heaven." whose names are not written—A, B, C, Syriac, Coptic, and ANDREAS read singular, "(every one) whose (Greek hon;" but B, Greek hon, plural) name is not written." Lamb slain from the foundation of the world—The Greek order of words favours this translation. He was slain in the Father's eternal counsels; cf. 1 Peter 1, 19, 20, virtually parallel. The other way of connecting the words is, "Written from the foundation of the world in the book of life of the Lamb slain." So in ch. 17, 8. The elect. The former is in the Greek more obvious and simple. " whatsoever virtue was in the sacrifices, did operate through Messiah's death alone. As He was 'the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world,' so all atonements ever made were only effectual by His blood." [BISHOP PEARSON, Creed.] 9. A general exhortation, Christ's own words of monition calling solemn attention. 10. He that leaeth into captivity—A, B, C, and Vulgate read, "if any one (be) for captivity." shall go into captivity—Greek present, "goeth into captivity." Cf. Jeremiah 15, 2, which is alluded to here. N, B, C read simply, "he goeth away," and omit "into captivity." But A and Vulgate support the words. he that killeth with the sword, must be killed with the sword—So B, C read,

But A reads, "if any (is for) being (lit., to be) killed," &c. As of old, so now, those to be persecuted by the beast in various ways, have their trials severally appointed them by God's fixed counsel. English Version is quite a different sense, viz., a warning to the persecutors that they shall be punished with retribution in kind. Here—Herein: in bearing their appointed sufferings lies the patient endurance . . . of the saints. This is to be the motto and watchword of the elect during the period of the world-kingdom. As the first beast is to be met by patience and faith (v. 10), the second beast must be opposed by true wisdom (v. 18). 11. another beast—"the false prophet." out of the earth—out of society civilized, consolidated, and ordered, but still, with all its culture, of earth earthy: as distinguished from "the sea," the troubled agitations of various peoples out of which the world-power and its several kingdoms have emerged. "The sacerdotal persecuting power, Pagan and Christian; the pagan priesthood making an image of the emperors which they compelled Christians to worship, and working wonders by magic and omens; the Romish priesthood, the inheritors of pagan rites, images, and superstitions, lamb-like in Christian professions, dragon-like in word and act" [ALFORD, and so the Spanish Jesuit, LACUNZA, writing under the name Ben Ezra]. As the first beast was like the Lamb in being, as it were, wounded to death, so the second is like the Lamb in having two lamb-like horns (its essential difference from the Lamb is marked by its having two, but the Lamb SEVEN horns, ch. 5, 6). The former paganism of the world-power, seeming to be wounded to death by Christianity, revives. In its second beast-form it is Christianized heathendom ministering to the former, and having earthly culture and learning to recommend it. The second beast's, or false prophet's rise, coincides in time with the healing of the beast's deadly wound and its revival (ch. 13, 12-14). Its manifold character is marked by the Lord, Matthew 24, 11, 24, "Many false prophets shall rise," where He is speaking of the last days. As the former beast corresponds to the first four beasts of Daniel, so the second beast, or the false prophet, to the little horn starting up among the ten horns of the fourth beast. This Antichristian horn has not only the mouth of blasphemy (v. 5), but also "the eyes of man" (Daniel 7, 8): the former is also in the first beast (v. 1, 5), but the latter not so. "The eyes of man" symbolize cunning and intellectual culture, the very characteristic of "the false prophet" (v. 13-15; ch. 16, 14). The first beast is physical and political; the second a spiritual power, the power of knowledge, ideas [the favourite term in the French school of politics], and scientific cultivation. Both alike are beasts, from below, not from above; faithful allies, worldly Antichristian wisdom standing in the service of the worldly Antichristian power: the dragon is both lion and serpent; might and cunning are his armoury. The dragon gives his external power to the first beast (v. 2), his spirit to the second, so that it speaks as a dragon (v. 11). The second, arising out of the earth, is in ch. 11, 7, and 17, 8, said to ascend out of the bottomless pit: its very culture and world-wisdom only intensify its infernal character, the pretence to superior knowledge and rationalistic philosophy (as in the primeval temptation, Genesis 3, 5, 7, "their EYES [as here] were opened") veiling the deification of nature, self, and man. Hence spring Idealism, Materialism, Deism, Pantheism, Atheism. Antichrist shall be the culmination. The Papacy's claim to the double power, secular and spiritual, is a sample and type of the twofold beast, that out of the sea, and that out of the earth, or bottomless pit. Antichrist will be the climax, and final form. PRIMASIVS OF ADRUMETUM, in the sixth century, says, "He feigns to be a lamb that he may assail the Lamb—the body of Christ." 12. power—Greek, "authority." before him—"in his presence;" as ministering to, and upholding him. "The non-existence of the beast embraces the whole Germanic Christian period. The healing of the wound, and return of the beast, is represented [in regard to its final Antichristian manifestation, though including also, meanwhile, its healing and return under Popery, which is baptized heathenism] in that principle which, since 1789, has manifested itself in beast-like outbreaks." [AUBERLEN.] which dwell therein—the earthly-minded. The Church becomes the harlot: the world's political power, the Antichristian beast; the world's wisdom and civilization, the false prophet. Christ's three offices are thus perverted: the first beast is the false kingship; the harlot, the false priesthood; the second beast, the false prophet. The beast is the bodily, the false prophet the intellectual, the harlot the spiritual power of Antichristianity. [AUBERLEN.] The Old Testament Church stood under the power of the beast, the heathen world-power: the Middle-Ages Church under that of the harlot: in modern times the false prophet predominates. But in the last days all these God-opposed powers which have succeeded each other shall co-operate, and raise each other to the most terrible and intense power of their nature: the false prophet causes men to worship the beast, and the beast carries the harlot. These three forms of apostasy are reducible to two: the apostate Church and the apostate world, pseudo-Christianity and Antichristianity, the harlot and the beast; for the false prophet is also a beast; and the two beasts, as different manifestations of the same beast-like principle, stand in contradiction to the harlot, and are finally judged together, whereas separate judgment falls on the harlot. [AUBERLEN.] deadly wound—Greek, "wound of death." 13. wonders—Greek, "signs." so that—so great that. maketh fire—Greek, "maketh even fire." This is the very miracle which the two witnesses perform, and which Elijah long ago had performed; this the beast from the bottomless pit, or the false prophet, mimics. Not merely tricks, but miracles of a demoniacal kind, and by demon aid, like those of the Egyptian magicians, shall be wrought, most calculated to deceive; wrought "after the working (Greek, energy) of Satan." 14. deceiveth them that dwell on the earth—the earthly-minded, but not the elect. Even a miracle is not enough to warrant belief in a professed revelation, unless that revelation be in harmony with God's already revealed will, by the means of those miracles—rather as Greek, "on account of (because of; in consequence of) those miracles." which he had power to do—Greek, "which were given him to do." in the sight of the beast—"before him" (v. 12). which—A, B, C read, "who;" marking, perhaps, a personal Antichrist. had—So B and ANDREAS read. But A, C, and Vulgate read, "hath." 15. he had power—Greek, "it was given to him." to give life—Greek, "breath," or "spirit." image—Nebuchadnezzar set up in Dura a golden image to be worshipped, probably of himself; for his dream had been interpreted, "Thou art this head of gold;" the three Hebrews who refused to worship the image were cast into a burning furnace. All this typifies the last apostasy. PLINY, in his letter to Trajan, states that he consigned to punishment those Christians who would not worship the emperor's image with incense and wine. So Julian, the apostate, set up his own image with the idols of the heathen gods in the Forum, that the Christians in doing reverence to it, might seem to worship the idols. So Charlemagne's image was set up for homage; and the Pope adored the new emperor (DUPIN, vol. 6, p. 126). Napoleon, the successor of Charlemagne, designed after he had first lowered the Pope by removing him to Fontainebleau, then to "make an idol of him" [Memorial de Sainte Helene]; keeping the Pope near him, he would, through the Pope's influence, have directed the religious, as well as the political world. The revived Napoleonic dynasty may, in some one representative, realize the project, becoming the beast supported by the false prophet (perhaps some openly infidel supplanter of the Papacy, under a spiritual guise, after the harlot, or apostate Church, who is distinct from the second beast, has been stripped and judged by the beast, ch. 17. 16); he then might have an image set up in his honour as a test of secular and spiritual allegiance. speak—"False doctrine will give a spiritual, philosophical appearance to the foolish apotheosis of the creaturely personified by Antichrist." [AUBERLEN.] JEROME, on Daniel 7, says, Antichrist shall be "one of the human race in whom the whole of Satan shall dwell bodily." Rome's speaking images and winking pictures of the Virgin Mary and the saints are an earnest of the future demoniacal miracles of the false prophet in making the beast's or Antichrist's image to speak. 16. to receive a mark—lit., "that they should give them a mark;" such a brand as masters stamp on their slaves, and monarchs on their subjects. Soldiers voluntarily punctured their arms with marks of the general under whom they served. Notaries of idols branded themselves with the idol's cipher or symbol. Thus Antiochus Epiphanus branded the Jews with the ivy leaf, the symbol of Bacchus (2 Maccabees 6. 7; 3 Maccabees 2. 29). Contrast God's seal and name in the foreheads of His servants, ch. 7. 3; 14. 1; 22. 4; and Galatians 6. 17, "I bear in my body the marks of the Lord Jesus," i. e., I am His soldier and servant. The mark in the right hand and forehead implies the prostration of bodily and intellectual powers to the beast's domination. "In the forehead by way of profession; in the hand with respect to work and service." [AUGUSTINE.] 17. And—So A, B, and Vulgate read. C, IRENEUS, 316, Coptic, and Syriac omit it. might buy—Greek, "may be able to buy." the mark, or the name—Greek, "the mark (viz.), the name of the beast." The mark may be, as in the case of the sealing of the saints in the forehead, not a visible mark, but symbolical of allegiance. So the sign of the cross in Popery. The Pope's interdict has often shut out the excommunicate from social and commercial intercourse. Under the final Antichrist this shall come to pass in its most violent form. number of his name—Implying that the name has some numerical meaning. 18. wisdom—the armoury against the second beast, as patience and faith against the first. Spiritual wisdom is needed to solve the mystery of iniquity, so as not to be beguiled by it. count . . . for—The "for" implies the possibility of our calculating or counting the beast's number. the number of a man—i. e., counted as men generally count. So the phrase is used in ch. 21. 17. The number is the number of a man, not of God; he shall extol himself above the power of the Godhead, as the MAN of sin. [AQUINAS.] Though it is an imitation of the Divine name, it is only human. six hundred threescore and six—A and Vulgate write the numbers in full in the Greek. But B writes merely the three Greek letters standing for numbers, Ch, X, St. C reads 616, but IRENEUS, 323, opposes this and maintains 666. IRENEUS, in the second century, disciple of POLYCARP, John's disciple, explained this number as contained in the Greek letters of Lateinos (L being 30; A, 1; T, 300; E, 5; I, 10; N, 50; O, 70; S, 200). The Latin is peculiarly the language of the Church of Rome in all her official acts; the forced unity of language in ritual being the counterfeit of the true unity; the premature and spurious anticipation of the real unity, only to be realized at Christ's coming, when all the earth shall speak "one language" (Zephaniah 3. 9). The last Antichrist may have a close connection with Rome, and so the name Lateinos (666) may apply to him. The Hebrew letters of Balaam amount to 666 [BUNSEN]; a type of the false prophet, whose characteristic, like Balaam's, will be high spiritual knowledge perverted to Satanic ends. The number six is the world-number; in 666 it occurs in units, tens, and hundreds. It is next neighbour to the sacred seven, but is severed from it by an impassable gulf. It is the number of the world given over to judgment; hence there is a pause between the sixth and seventh seals, and the sixth and seventh trumpets. The judgments on the world are complete in six; by the fulfilment of seven, the kingdoms of the world become Christ's. As twelve is the number of the Church, so six, its half, symbolizes the world-kingdom broken. The raising of the six to tens and hundreds (higher powers) indicates that the beast, notwithstanding his progression to higher powers, can only rise to greater ripeness for judgment. Thus 666, the judged world-power, contrasts with the 14,000 sealed and transfigured ones (the Church number, twelve, squared and multiplied by 1000, the number symbolizing the world pervaded by God; ten, the world-number, raised to the power of three, the number of God). [AUBERLEN.] The mark (Greek charagma) and name are one and the same. The first two radical letters of Christ (Greek Christos), Ch and R, are the same as the first two of charagma, and were the imperial monogram of Christian Rome. Antichrist, personating Christ, adopts a symbol like, but not agreeing with, Christ's monogram, Ch, X, St; whereas the radicals in "Christ" are Ch, R, St. Papal Rome has similarly substituted the standard of the Keys, for the standard of the Cross. So on the Papal coimage (the image of power, Matthew 22. 20). The two first letters of "Christ," Ch, R, represent seven hundred, the perfect number. The Ch, X, St represent an imperfect number, a triple falling away (apostasy) from septenary perfection. [WORDSWORTH.]

CHAPTER XIV.

VER. 1-20. THE LAMB SEEN ON ZION WITH THE 144,000. THEIR SONG. THE GOSPEL PROCLAIMED BEFORE THE END BY ONE ANGEL; THE FALL OF BABYLON, BY ANOTHER; THE DOOM OF THE BEAST-WORSHIPPERS, BY A THIRD. THE BLESSEDNESS OF THE DEAD IN THE LORD. THE HARVEST. THE VINTAGE. In contrast to the beast, false prophet, and apostate Church (ch. 13.), and introductory to the announcement of judgments about to descend on them and the world (v. 8-11, anticipatory of ch. 18. 2-6), stand here the redeemed, "the Divine kernel of humanity, the positive fruits of the history of the world and the Church." [AUBERLEN.] Chs. 14.-16. describe the preparations for the Messianic judgment. As ch. 14. begins with the 144,000 of Israel (cf. ch. 7. 4-8, no longer exposed to trial as then, but now triumphant), so ch. 15. begins with those who have overcome from among the Gentiles (cf. ch. 15. 1-5 with ch. 7. 9-17); the two classes of elect forming together the whole company of transfigured saints who shall reign with Christ. 1. a—A, B, C, Coptic, and ORIGEN read, "the Lamb." Lamb . . . on . . . Sion—having left His position "in the midst of the throne," and now taking His stand on Sion. his Father's name—A, B, C read, "His name and His Father's name." in—Greek, "upon." God's and Christ's name here answers, to the seal "upon their foreheads" in ch. 7. 3. As the 144,000 of Israel are "the first-fruits" (v. 4), so "the harvest" (v. 15) is the general assembly of Gentile saints to be translated by Christ as His first act in assuming His kingdom, prior to His judgment (ch. 16., the last seven vials) on the Antichristian world, in executing which His saints shall share. As Noah and Lot were taken seasonably out of the judgment, but exposed to the trial to the last moment [DE BURGH], so those who shall reign with Christ shall first suffer with Him, being delivered out of the judgments, but not out of the trials. The Jews are meant by "the saints of the Most High;" against them Antichrist makes war, changing their times and laws; for true Israelites cannot join in the idolatry of the beast, any more than true Christians. The common affliction will draw closely together, in opposing the beast's worship, the Old Testament and New Testament people of God. Thus the way is paved for Israel's conversion. This last utter scattering of the holy people's power leads them, under the Spirit, to seek Messiah, and to cry at His approach, "Blessed is He that cometh in the name of the Lord." 2. from—Greek, "out of." voice of many waters—as is the voice of Himself, such also is the voice of His people. I heard the voice of harpers—A, B, C, and ORIGEN read, "the voice which I heard (was) as of harpers." 3. sung—Greek, "sing." as it were—So A, C, and Vulgate read. It is AS IT WERE a new song; for it is, in truth, as old as God's eternal purpose. But B, Syriac, Coptic, ORIGEN and ANDREAS omit these words. new song—(Ch. 5. 9, 10.) The song is that of victory after conflict with the dragon, beast, and false prophet: never sung before, for such a conflict had never been fought before; therefore new: till now the kingdom of Christ on earth had been usurped; they sing the new song in anticipation of His taking possession of His blood-bought kingdom with His saints. four beasts—rather as Greek, "four living creatures." The harpers and singers evidently include the 144,000: so the parallel proves (ch. 15. 2, 8), where the same act is attributed to the general company of the saints, the harvest (v. 15) from all nations. Not as ALFORD, "the harpers and song are in heaven, but the 144,000 are on earth." redeemed—lit., "purchased." Not even the angels can learn that song, for they know not experimentally what it is to have "come out of the great tribulation, and washed their robes white in the blood of the Lamb" (ch. 7. 14). 4. virgins—spiritually (Matthew 25. 1); in contrast to the apostate Church, Babylon (v. 8), spiritually "a harlot" (ch. 17. 1-5; Isaiah 1. 21; contrast 2 Corinthians 11. 2; Ephesians 5. 25-27). Their not being defiled with women, means they were not led astray from Christian faithfulness by the tempters who jointly constitute the spiritual "harlot." follow the Lamb whithersoever he goeth—in glory, being especially near His person; the fitting reward of their following Him so fully on earth. redeemed—"purchased." being the—rather, "as a first-fruit." Not merely a "first-fruit" in the sense in which all believers are so, but Israel's 144,000 elect are the first-fruit, the Jewish and Gentile elect Church is the harvest; in a further sense, the whole of the transfigured and translated Church which reigns with Christ at His coming, is the first-fruit, and the consequent general ingathering of Israel and the nations, ending in the last judgment, is the full and final harvest. 5. guile—So ANDREAS in one copy. But A, B, C, ORIGEN, and ANDREAS in other copies read, "falsehood." Cf. with English Version reading Psalm 32. 2; Isaiah 53. 9; John 1. 47. for—So B, Syriac, Coptic, ORIGEN, and ANDREAS read. But A, C omit. without fault—Greek, "blameless;" in respect to the sincerity of their fidelity to Him. Not absolutely, and in themselves blameless; but regarded as such on the ground of His righteousness in whom alone they trusted, and whom they faithfully served by His Spirit in them. The allusion seems to be to Psalm 15. 1, 2. Cf. v. 1, "stood on Mount Sion." before the throne of God—A, B, C, Syriac, Coptic, ORIGEN, and ANDREAS omit these words. The oldest Vulgate MS. supports them. 6. Here begins the portion relating to the Gentile world, as the former portion related to Israel. Before the end the Gospel is to be preached for a witness unto all nations: not that all nations shall be converted, but all nations shall have had the opportunity given them of deciding whether they will be for, or against, Christ. Those thus preached to are "they that dwell (so A, Coptic, and Syriac read. But B, C, ORIGEN, Vulgate, CYPRIAN, 312, read, 'sit,' cf. Matthew 4. 16; Luke 1. 79, having their settled home) on the earth," being of earth earthy: this last season of grace is given them, if yet they may repent, before "judgment" (v. 7) descends: if not, they will be left without excuse, as the world which resisted the preaching of Noah in the 120 years "whilst the long-suffering of God waited." "So also the prophets gave the people a last opportunity of repentance before the Babylonian destruction of Jerusalem, and our Lord and His apostles before the Roman destruction of the holy city." [AUBERLEN.] The Greek for "unto" (epi, in A, C) means lit., "upon," or "over," or "in respect to" (Mark 9. 12; Hebrews 7. 13). So also "to every nation" (Greek, epi, in A, B, C, Vulgate, Syriac, ORIGEN, ANDREAS, CYPRIAN, and PRIMASIVS). This, perhaps, implies that the Gospel, though diffused over the globe, shall not come savingly unto any save the elect. The world is not to be evangelized till Christ shall come: meanwhile, God's purpose is "to take out of the Gentiles a people for His name," to be witnesses of the effectual working of His Spirit during the counter-working of "the mystery of iniquity." everlasting Gospel—the Gospel which announces the glad tidings of the everlasting kingdom of Christ, about to ensue immediately after the "judgment" on Antichrist, announced as imminent in v. 7. As the former angel "flying through the midst of heaven" (ch. 8. 13) announced "woe," so this angel "flying in the midst of heaven" announced joy. The three angels making this last proclamation of the Gospel, the fall of Babylon (v. 8), the harlot, and the judgment on the beast-worshippers (v. 9-11), the voice from heaven respecting the blessed dead (v. 13), the vision of the Son of man on the cloud (v. 11), the harvest (v. 15), and the vintage (v. 18), form the compendi-ous summary, amplified in detail in the rest of the book.

7. Fear God—the forerunner to embracing the love of God manifested in the Gospel. Repentance accompanies faith. give glory to him—and not to the beast (cf. ch. 13. 4; Jeremiah 13. 16). the hour of his judgment—"The hour" implies the definite time. "Judgment," not the general judgment, but that upon Babylon, the beast, and his worshippers (v. 8-12). worship him that made heaven—not Antichrist—who "sitteth in the temple of God, showing Himself that He is God" (cf. Acts 14. 15). sea . . . fountains—Distinguished also in ch. 8. 8, 10. 8. another—So Vulgate. But A, B, Syriac, and ANDREAS add, "a second," "another, a second angel." Babylon—Here first mentioned; identical with the hartot, the apostate Church; distinct from the beast, and judged separately. is fallen—Anticipation of ch. 18. 2. A, Vulgate, Syriac, and ANDREAS support the second "is fallen." But B, C, and Coptic omit it. that great city—A, B, C, Vulgate, Syriac, and Coptic omit "city." Then translate, "Babylon the great." The ulterior and exhaustive fulfilment of Isaiah 21. 9. because—So ANDREAS. But A, C, Vulgate, and Syriac read, "which." B and Coptic omit it. Even reading "which," we must understand it as giving the reason of her fall. all nations—A, B, C read, "all the nations." the wine of the wrath of her fornication—the wine of the wrath of God, the consequence of her fornication. As she made the nations drunk with the wine of her fornication, so she herself shall be made drunk with the wine of God's wrath. 9. A, B, C, and ANDREAS read, "another, a third angel." Cf. with this verse ch. 13. 15, 16. 10. The same—Greek, "he also," as the just and inevitable retribution. wine of . . . wrath of God—(Psalm 75. 8.) without mixture—whereas wine was so commonly mixed with water that to mix wine is used in Greek for to pour out wine; this wine of God's wrath is undiluted; there is no drop of water to cool its heat. Naught of grace or hope is blended with it. This terrible threat may well raise us above the fear of man's threats. This unmixed cup is already mingled and prepared for Satan and the beast's followers. indignation—Greek (orges), "abiding wrath." But the Greek for "wrath" above (Greek thumos) is boiling indignation, from (Greek thuo) a root meaning to boil; this is temporary ebullition of anger; that is lasting [AMMONIUS], and accompanied with a purpose of vengeance [ORIGEN on Psalm 2. 5]. tormented . . . in the presence of the . . . angels—(Psalm 49. 14; 58. 10; 139. 21; Isaiah 66. 24.) God's enemies are regarded by the saints as their enemies, and when the day of probation is past, their mind shall be so entirely one with God's, that they shall rejoice in witnessing visibly the judicial vindication of God's righteousness in sinners' punishment. 11. for ever and ever—Greek, "unto ages of ages." no rest day nor night—Contrast the very different sense in which the same is said of the four living creatures in heaven, "They rest not day and night, saying, Holy, holy, holy," &c.; yet they do "rest" in another sense; they rest from sin and sorrow, weariness and weakness, trial and temptation (v. 13); the lost have no rest from sin and Satan, terror, torment, and remorse. 12. Here, &c.—Resumed from ch. 13. 10, where see the Note. In the fiery ordeal of persecution which awaits all who will not worship the beast, the faith and patience of the followers of God and Jesus shall be put to the test, and proved. patience—Greek (hypomene), patient, persevering endurance. The second "here" is omitted in A, B, C, Vulgate, Syriac, Coptic, and PRIMASIUS. Translate, "Here is the endurance of the saints, who keep," &c. the faith of Jesus—the faith which has Jesus for its object. 13. Encouragement to cheer those persecuted under the beast. Blessed—in resting from their toils, and, in the case of the saints just before alluded to as persecuted by the beast, in resting from persecutions. Their full blessedness is now "from henceforth," i. e., FROM THIS TIME, when the judgment on the beast, and the harvest-gatherings of the elect are imminent. The time so earnestly longed for by former martyrs is now all but come; the full number of their fellow-servants is on the verge of completion; they have no longer to "rest (the same Greek as here, anapausis) yet for a little season," their eternal rest, or cessation from toils (2 Thessalonians 1. 7, Greek anesis, relaxation after hardships. Hebrews 4. 9, 10, sabbatism of rest; and Greek catapausis, akin to the Greek here), is close at hand now. They are blessed in being about to sit down to the marriage-supper of the Lamb (ch. 19. 9), and in having part in THE first resurrection (ch. 20. 6), and in having right to the tree of life (ch. 22. 14). In v. 14-16 follows the explanation of why they are pronounced "blessed" now in particular, viz., the Son of man on the cloud is just coming together them in as the harvest ripe for His garner. Write—to put it on record for ever. Yea, saith the Spirit—The words of God the Father (the "voice from heaven") are echoed back and confirmed by the Spirit (speaking in the Word, ch. 2. 7; 22. 17; and in the saints, 2 Corinthians 5. 5; 1 Peter 4. 14). All "God's promises in Christ are yea" (2 Corinthians 1. 20). unto me—Omitted in A, B, C, Vulgate, Syriac, and Coptic. that they may—The Greek includes also the idea, They are blessed, in that they SHALL rest from their toils (so the Greek). and—So B and ANDREAS read. But A, C, Vulgate, and Syriac read "for." They rest from their toils, because their time for toil is past; they enter on the blessed rest, because of their faith evinced by their works, which, therefore, "follow WITH (so the Greek) them." Their works are specified because respect is had to the coming judgment, wherein every man shall be "judged according to his works." His works do not go before the believer, nor even go by his side, but follow him at the same time that they go with him as a proof that he is Christ's. 14. crown—Greek (stephanon), garland of victory; not His diadem as a king. The victory is described in detail, ch. 19. 11-21. one sat—"one sitting" (Greek cathemenon homoion) is the reading of A, B, C, Vulgate, and Coptic. 15. Thrust in—Greek, "Send." The angel does not command the "Son of man" (v. 14), but is the mere messenger announcing to the Son the will of God the Father, in whose hands are kept the times and the seasons. thy sickle—Alluding to Mark 4. 29, where also it is "sendeth the sickle." The Son sends His sickle-bearing angel to reap the righteous when fully ripe, harvest—the harvest crop. By the harvest-reaping the elect righteous are gathered out; by the vintage the Antichristian offenders are removed out of the earth, the scene of Christ's coming kingdom. The Son of man Himself, with a golden crown, is introduced in the harvest-gathering of the elect, a mere angel in the vintage (v. 18-20). is ripe—lit., "is dried." Ripe for glory. 16. thrust in—Greek, "cast." 17. out of the temple . . . in heaven—(Ch. 11. 19.) 18. from the altar—upon which were offered the incense-accompanied prayers of all saints, which bring down in answer God's fiery judgment on the Church's foes, the fire being taken from the altar and cast upon the earth. fully ripe—Greek, "come to their acme;" ripe for punishment. 19. "The vine" is what is the subject of judgment because its grapes are not what God looked for considering its careful culture, but "wild grapes" (Isaiah 5). The apostate world of Christendom, not the world of heathendom, who have not heard of Christ, is the object of judgment. Cf. the emblem, ch. 19. 15; Isaiah 63. 2, 3; Joel 3. 13. 20. without the city—Jerusalem. The scene of the blood-shedding of Christ and His people shall be also the scene of God's vengeance on the Antichristian foe. Cf. the "horsemen" ch. 9. 16, 17. blood—answering to the red wine. The slaughter of the apostates is what is here spoken of, not their eternal punishment. even unto the horse-bridles—of the avenging "armies of heaven." by the space of a thousand . . . six hundred furlongs—lit., "a thousand six hundred furlongs off." [W. KELLY.] Sixteen hundred is a square number; 4 by 4 by 100. The four quarters, north, south, east, and west, of the Holy Land, or else of the world (the completeness and universality of the world-wide destruction being hereby indicated). It does not exactly answer to the length of Palestine as given by JEROME, 160 Roman miles. BENGEI thinks the valley of Kedron, between Jerusalem and the Mount of Olives, is meant, the torrent in that valley being about to be discoloured with blood to the extent of 1600 furlongs. This view accords with Joel's prophecy that the valley of Jehoshaphat is to be the scene of the overthrow of the Antichristian foes.

CHAPTER XV.

VER. 1-8. THE LAST SEVEN VIALS OF PLAGUES: SONG OF THE VICTORS OVER THE BEAST. 1. the seven last plagues—Greek, "seven plagues which are the last," is filled up—lit., "was finished," or "consummated:" the prophetic past for the future, the future being to God as though it were past, so sure of accomplishment is His word. This verse is the summary of the vision that follows: the angels do not actually receive the vials till v. 7; but here, in v. 1, by anticipation they are spoken of as having them. There are no more plagues after these until the Lord's coming in judgment. The destruction of Babylon (ch. 18.) is the last: then in ch. 19. He appears. 2. sea of glass—Answering to the molten sea or great brazen laver before the mercy-seat of the earthly temple, for the purification of the priests; typifying the baptism of water and the Spirit of all who are made kings and priests unto God. mingled with fire—Answering to the baptism on earth with fire, i. e., fiery trial, as well as with the Holy Ghost, which Christ's people undergo to purify them, as gold is purified of its dross in the furnace. them that had gotten the victory over—Greek, "those (coming) off from (the conflict with) the beast-conquerors," over the number of his name—A, B, C, Vulgate, Syriac, and Coptic, omit the words in English Version, "over his mark." The mark, in fact, is the number of his name which the faithful refused to receive, and so were victorious over it. stand on the sea of glass—ALFORD and DE BURGH explain "on (the shore of) the sea?" at the sea. So the preposition (Greek) epi, with the accusative, is used for at, ch. 3. 20. It has a pregnant sense: "standing" implies rest, Greek epi with the accusative implies motion towards. Thus the meaning is, Having come to the sea, and now standing AT it. In Matthew 14. 26, where Christ walks on the sea, the Greek oldest MSS. have the genitive, not the accusative as here. Allusion is made to the Israelites standing on the shore at the Red Sea, after having passed victoriously through it, and after the Lord had destroyed the Egyptian foe (type of Antichrist) in it. Moses and the Israelites' song of triumph (Exodus 15. 1) has its antitype in the saints' "song of Moses and the Lamb" (v. 3). Still English Version is consistent with good Greek, and the sense will then be, As the sea typifies the troubled state out of which the beast arose, and which is to be no more in the blessed world to come (ch. 21. 1), so the victorious saints stand on it, having it under their feet (as the woman had the moon, ch. 12. 1, see Note); but it is now no longer treacherous wherein the feet sink, but solid like glass, as it was under the feet of Christ, whose triumph and power the saints now share. Firmness of footing amidst apparent instability is thus represented. They can stand, not merely as victorious Israel at the Red Sea, and as John upon the sand of the shore, but upon the sea itself, now firm, and reflecting their glory as glass, their past conflict shedding the brighter lustre on their present triumph. Their happiness is heightened by the retrospect of the dangers through which they have passed. Thus this corresponds to ch. 7. 14, 15. harps of God—in the hands of these heavenly virgins, infinitely surpassing the timbrels of Miriam and the Israelitesses. 3. song of Moses . . . and . . . the Lamb—The New Testament song of the Lamb (i. e., the song which the Lamb shall lead, as being "the Captain of our salvation," just as Moses was leader of the Israelites, the song in which those who conquer through Him [Romans 8. 37] shall join, ch. 12. 1) is the antitype to the triumphant Old Testament song of Moses and the Israelites at the Red Sea (Exodus 15). The churches of the Old and New Testament are essentially one in their conflicts and triumphs. The two appear joined in this phrase, as they are in the twenty-four elders. Similarly, Isaiah 12. foretells the song of the redeemed (Israel foremost) after the second antitypical exodus and deliverance at the Egyptian Sea. The passage through the Red Sea under the pillar of cloud was Israel's baptism, to which the believer's baptism in trials corresponds. The elect after their trials (especially those arising from the beast) shall be taken up before the vials of wrath be poured on the beast and his kingdom. So Noah and his family were taken out of the doomed world before the deluge; Lot was taken out of Sodom before its destruction; the Christians escaped by a special interposition of Providence to Pella before the destruction of Jerusalem. As the pillar of cloud and fire interposed between Israel and the Egyptian foe, so that Israel was safely landed on the opposite shore before the Egyptians were destroyed; so the Lord, coming with clouds and in flaming fire, shall first catch up his elect people "in the clouds to meet Him in the air," and then shall with fire destroy the enemy. The Lamb leads the song in honour of the Father amidst the great congregation. This is the "new song" mentioned ch. 14. 3. The singing victors are the 144,000 of Israel, "the first-fruits," and the general "harvest" of the Gentiles. servant of God—(Exodus 14. 31; Numbers 12. 7; Joshua 22. 5.) The Lamb is more: He is the SON. Great and marvellous are Thy works, &c.—Part of Moses' last song. The vindication of the justice of God that so He may be glorified, is the grand end of God's dealings. Hence his servants again and again dwell upon this in their praises (ch. 16. 7; 19. 2; Proverbs 16. 4; Jeremiah 10. 10; Daniel 4. 37). Especially at the judgment (Psalm 50. 1-6; 145. 17). saints—There is no MS. authority for this. A, B, Coptic and CYPRIAN read, "of the NATIONS." C reads "of the ages," and so Vulgate and Syriac. The point at issue in the Lord's controversy with the earth is, whether He, or Satan's minion, the beast, is "the King of the nations;" here at the eve of the judgments descending on the kingdom of the beast, the transfigured saints hail Him as "the King of the nations" (Ezekiel 21. 27). 4. Who shall not—Greek, "Who is there but must fear thee?" Cf. Moses' song, Exodus 15. 14-16, on the fear which God's judgments strike into the foe, thee—So Syriac. But A, B, C, Vulgate and CYPRIAN reject "thee," all nations shall come—Alluding to Psalm 22. 27-31; cf. Isaiah 66. 23; Jeremiah 16. 19. The conversion of all nations, therefore, shall be when Christ shall come, and not till then; and the first moving cause will be Christ's manifested judgments preparing all hearts for receiving Christ's mercy. He shall effect by His presence what we have in vain tried to effect in His absence. The present preaching of the Gospel is gathering out the elect remnant; meanwhile "the mystery of iniquity" is at work, and will at last come to its crisis, then shall judgment descend on the apostates at the harvest-end of this age (Greek, Matthew 13. 39, 40) when the tares shall be cleared out of the earth, which thenceforward becomes Messiah's kingdom. The confederacy of the apostates against Christ becomes, when overthrown with fearful judgments, the very means in God's overruling providence of preparing the nations not joined in the Antichristian league to submit themselves to Him. are—lit., "were:" the prophetic past for the immediate future. judgment—Greek, "righteousness." 5. So ch. 11. 19; cf. ch. 16. 17. "The tabernacle of the testimony" appropriately here comes to view, where God's faithfulness in avenging His people with judgments on their foes is about to be set forth. We need to get a glimpse within the Holy place to "understand" the secret spring and the end of God's righteous dealings. behold—Omitted by A, B, C, Syriac, and ANDREAS. It is supported only by Vulgate, Coptic, and PRIMASIUS, but no MS. 6. having—So B reads. But A, C, read "who have:" not that they had them yet (cf. v. 7), but they are by anticipation described according to their office. lions—So B reads. But A, C, and Vulgate, "a stone." On the principle that the harder reading is the one least likely to be an interpolation, we should read, "a stone pure (and is omitted in A, B, C, and ANDREAS), brilliant" (so the Greek); probably the diamond. With English Version, cf. Acts 1. 10; 10. 30. golden girdles—resembling the Lord in this respect (ch. 1. 13). 7. one of the four beasts—Greek, "living creatures." The presentation of the vials to the angels by one of the living creatures, implies the ministry of the Church as the medium for manifesting to angels the glories of redemption (Ephesians 3, 10). vials—"bowls;" a broad shallow cup or bowl. The breadth of the vials in their upper part would tend to cause their contents to pour out all at once, implying the overwhelming suddenness of the woes. full of . . . wrath—How sweetly do the vials full of odours, i. e., the incense-perfumed prayers of the saints, contrast with these! 8. temple . . . filled—Isaiah 6, 4; cf. Exodus 40, 34; 2 Chronicles 5, 14, as to the earthly temple, of which this is the antitype. the glory of God and . . . power—then fully manifested. no man was able to enter . . . the temple—because of God's presence in His manifested glory and power during the execution of these judgments.

CHAPTER XVI.

Ver. 1-21. THE SEVEN VIALS AND THE CONSEQUENT PLAGUES. The trumpets shook the world-kingsdoms in a longer process; the vials destroy with a swift and sudden overthrow the kingdom of the beast in particular who had invested himself with the world-kingsdom. The Hebrews thought the Egyptian plagues to have been inflicted with but an interval of a month between them severally. [BENGEL, referring to SEDER OLAM.] As Moses took ashes from an earthly common furnace, so angels, as priestly ministers in the heavenly temple, take holy fire in sacred vials or bowls, from the heavenly altar to pour down (cf. ch. 8, 5). The same heavenly altar which would have kindled the sweet incense of prayer bringing down blessing upon earth, by man's sin kindles the fiery descending curse. Just as the river Nile, which ordinarily is the source of Egypt's fertility, became blood and a curse through Egypt's sin. 1. a great voice—viz., God's. These seven vials (the detailed expansion of the vinegar, ch. 14, 18-20) being called "the last," must belong to the period just when the term of the beast's power has expired (whence reference is made in them all to the worshippers of the beast as the objects of the judgments), close to the end or coming of the Son of man. The first four are distinguished from the last three, just as in the case of the seven seals and the seven trumpets. The first four are more general, affecting the earth, the sea, springs, and the sun, not merely a portion of these natural bodies, as in the case of the trumpets, but the whole of them; the last three are more particular, affecting the throne of the beast, the Euphrates, and the grand consummation. Some of these particular judgments are set forth in detail in chs. 17-20. out of the temple—B and Syriac omit. But A, C, Vulgate and ANDREAS support the words, the vials—So Syriac and Coptic. But A, B, C, Vulgate and ANDREAS read, "the seven vials." upon—Greek, "into." 2. went—Greek, "wentaway." poured out—So the angel cast fire into the earth previous to the series of trumpets (ch. 8, 5). upon—So Coptic. But A, B, C, Vulgate and Syriac read, "into." sove upon the men—antitype to the sixth Egyptian plague. "Noisome," lit., evil (cf. Deuteronomy 28, 27, 35). The very same Greek word is used in the LXX. as here, Greek helkos. The reason why the sixth Egyptian plague is the first here, is because it was directed against the Egyptian magicians, Jannes and Jambres, so that they could not stand before Moses; and so here the plague is sent upon those who in the beast-worship had practised sorcery. As they submitted to the mark of the beast, so they must bear the mark of the avenging God. Contrast ch. 7, 3; Ezekiel 9, 4, 6. "Grievous," distressing to the sufferers. men which had the mark of the beast—Therefore this first vial is subsequent to the period of the beast's rule. 3. angel—So B and ANDREAS. But A, C, and Vulgate omit it. upon—Greek, "into." became as . . . blood—answering to another Egyptian plague, of a dead man—putrefying. living soul—So B and ANDREAS. But A, C, and Syriac, "soul of life" (cf. Genesis 1, 30; 7, 21, 22). in the sea—So B and ANDREAS. But A, C, and Syriac read, "(as respects) the things in the sea." 4. (Exodus 7, 20.) angel—So Syriac, Coptic and ANDREAS. But A, B, C, and Vulgate omit it. 5. angel of the waters—i. e., presiding over the waters. O Lord—Omitted by A, B, C, Vulgate, Syriac, Coptic and ANDREAS. and shalt be—A, B, C, Vulgate, and ANDREAS for this clause read, "(which art and wast) holy." The Lord is now no longer He that shall come, for He is come in vengeance; and therefore the third of the three clauses found in ch. 1, 4, 8; and 4, 8, is here and in ch. 11, 7 omitted. judged thus—lit., "these things." "Thou didst inflict this judgment." 6. (Ch. 11, 18, end; Genesis 9, 6; Isaiah 49, 26.) An anticipation of ch. 18, 20, 24; cf. ch. 13, 15. For—A, B, C, and ANDREAS omit. 7. another out of—Omitted in A, C, Syriac, and Coptic. Translate then, "I heard the altar [personified] saying." On it the prayers of saints are presented before God: beneath it are the souls of the martyrs crying for vengeance on the foes of God. 8. angel—So Coptic and ANDREAS. But A, B, C, Vulgate and Syriac omit it. upon—Not as in v. 2, 3, "into." sun—whereas by the fourth trumpet the sun is darkened (ch. 8, 12) in a third part, here by the fourth vial the sun's bright scorching power is intensified. power was given unto him—rather, "unto it," the sun. men—Greek, "the men," viz., those who had the mark of the beast (v. 2). 9. men—Greek, "the men." repented not to give him glory—(ch. 9, 20.) Affliction, if it does not melt, hardens the sinner. Cf. the better result on others, ch. 11, 13; 14, 7; 15, 4. 10. angel—Omitted by A, B, C, Vulgate, and Syriac. But Coptic and ANDREAS support it. seat—Greek, "throne of the beast:" set up in arrogant mimicry of God's throne; the dragon gave his throne to the beast (ch. 13, 2). darkness—parallel to the Egyptian plague of darkness, Pharaoh being the type of Antichrist (cf. ch. 15, 2, 3, notes; cf. the fifth trumpet, ch. 9, 2). gnawed their tongues for pain—Greek, "owing to the pain" occasioned by the previous plagues, rendered more appalling by the darkness. Or, as "gnashing of teeth" is one of the accompaniments of hell, so this "gnawing of their tongues" is through rage at the baffling of their hopes and the overthrow of their kingdom. They meditate revenge and are unable to effect it; hence their frenzy. [GROTIUS.] Those in anguish, mental and bodily, bite their lips and tongues. 11. sores—This shows that each fresh plague was accompanied with the continuance of the preceding plagues: there was an accumulation, not a mere succession, of plagues. repented not—(Cf. v. 9.) 12. angel—So Coptic and ANDREAS. A, B, C, Vulgate and Syriac omit. kings of the East—Greek, "the kings who are from the rising of the sun." Reference to the Euphrates similarly occurs in the sixth trumpet. The drying up of the Euphrates, I think, is to be taken figuratively, as Babylon itself, which is situated on it, is undoubtedly so, ch. 17, 5. The waters of the Euphrates (cf. Isaiah 8, 7, 8) are spiritual Babylon's, i. e., the apostate Church's (of which Rome is the chief, though not exclusive representative) spiritual and temporal powers. The drying up of the waters of Babylon expresses the same thing as the ten kings stripping, eating, and burning the whore. The phrase "way may be prepared for" is that applied to the Lord's coming (Isaiah 40, 3; Matthew 3, 3; Luke 1, 76). He shall come from the East (Matthew 24, 27; Ezekiel 43, 2, "the glory of the God of Israel came from the way of the East"): not alone, for His elect transfigured saints of Israel and the Gentiles shall accompany Him, who are "kings and priests unto God" (ch. 1, 6). As the Antichristian ten kings accompany the beast, so the saints accompany as kings the King of kings to the last decisive conflict. DE BURGE, &c., take it of the Jews, who also were designed to be a kingdom of priests to God on earth. They shall, doubtless, become priest-kings in the flesh to the nations in the flesh at His coming. Abraham from the East (if Isaiah 41, 2, 8, 9, refers to Him, and not Cyrus) conquering the Chaldean kings is a type of Israel's victorious restoration to the priest-kingsdom. Israel's exodus after the last Egyptian plagues typifies Israel's restoration after the spiritual Babylon, the apostate Church, has been smitten. Israel's promotion to the priest-kingsdom after Pharaoh's downfall, and at the Lord's descent at Sinai to establish the theocracy, typifies the restored kingdom of Israel at the Lord's more glorious descent, when Antichrist shall be destroyed utterly. Thus, besides the transfigured saints, Israel secondarily may be meant by "the kings from the East" who shall accompany the "King of kings" returning "from the way of the East" to reign over His ancient people. As to the drying up again of the waters opposing His people's assuming the Kingdom, cf. Isaiah 10, 26; 11, 11, 15; Zechariah 10, 9-11. The name Israel (Genesis 32, 28) implies a prince with God. Cf. Micah 4, 8 as to the return of the kingdom to Jerusalem. DURHAM, 200 years ago, interpreted the drying up of the Euphrates to mean the wasting away of the Turkish power, which has heretofore held Palestine, and so the way being prepared for Israel's restoration. But as Babylon refers to the apostate Church, not to Mohammedanism, the drying up of the Euphrates (answering to Cyrus' overthrow of literal Babylon by marching into it through the dry channel of the Euphrates) must answer to the draining off of the apostate Church's resources, the Roman and Greek corrupt Church having been heretofore one of the greatest barriers by its idolatries and persecutions in the way of Israel's restoration and conversion. The kings of the earth who are earthly (v. 14), stand in contrast to the kings from the East who are heavenly. 13. the dragon—Satan, who gives his power and throne (ch. 13, 2) to the beast. false prophet—distinct from the harlot, the apostate Church (of which Rome is the chief, though not sole, representative), ch. 17, 1-3, 16; and identical with the second beast, ch. 13, 11-15, as appears by comparing ch. 19, 20 with ch. 13, 13; ultimately consigned to the lake of fire with the first beast; as is also the dragon a little later (ch. 20, 10). The dragon, the beast, and the false prophet, "the mystery of iniquity," form a blasphemous Antitrinity, the counterfeit of "the mystery of godliness." God manifests in Christ, witnessed to by the Spirit. The dragon acts the part of God the Father, assigning his authority to his representative the beast, as the Father assigns His to the Son. They are accordingly jointly worshipped; cf. as to the Father and Son, John 5, 23; as the ten-horned beast has its ten horns crowned with diadems (Greek, ch. 13, 1), so Christ has on His head many diadems. Whilst the false prophet, like the Holy Ghost, speaks not of himself, but tells all men to worship the beast, and confirms his testimony to the beast by miracles, as the Holy Ghost attested similarly to Christ's Divine mission. unclean spirits like frogs—the antitype to the plague of frogs sent on Egypt. The presence of the "unclean spirit" in the land (Palestine) is foretold, Zechariah 13, 2, in connection with idolatrous prophets. Beginning with infidelity as to Jesus Christ's coming in the flesh, men shall end in the grossest idolatry of the beast, the incarnation of all that is self-deifying and God-opposed in the world-powers of all ages; having rejected Him that came in the Father's name, they shall worship one that comes in his own, though really the devil's representative; as frogs croak by night in marshes and quagmires, so these unclean spirits in the darkness of error teach lies amidst the mire of filthy lusts. They talk of liberty, but it is not Gospel liberty, but license for lust. There being three, as also seven, in the description of the last and worst state of the Jewish nation, implies a parody of the two Divine numbers, three of the Trinity, and seven of the Holy Spirit (ch. 1, 4). Some observe that three frogs were the original arms of France, a country which has been the centre of infidelity, socialism, and false spiritualism. A, B, read, "as it were frogs," instead of "like frogs," which is not supported by MSS. The unclean spirit out of the mouth of the dragon symbolizes the proud infidelity which opposes God and Christ. That out of the beast's mouth is the spirit of the world, which in the politics of men, whether lawless democracy or despotism, sets man above God. That out of the mouth of the false prophet is lying spiritualism and religious delusion, which shall take the place of the harlot when she shall have been destroyed. 14. devils—Greek, "demons." working miracles—Greek, "signs." go forth unto—or "for," i. e., to tempt them to the battle with Christ, the kings of the earth and—A, B, Syriac, and ANDREAS omit "of the earth and," which clause is not in any MS. Translate, "Kings of the whole habitable world," who are "of this world," in contrast to "the kings of (from) the East" (the sunrising), v. 12, viz., the saints to whom Christ has appointed a kingdom, and who are "children of light." God in permitting Satan's miracles, as in the case of the Egyptian magicians who were His instruments in hardening Pharaoh's heart, gives the reprobate up to judicial delusion preparatory to their destruction. As Aaron's rod was changed into a serpent, so were those of the Egyptian magicians. Aaron turned the water into blood; so did the magicians. Aaron brought up frogs; so did the magicians. With the frogs their power ceased. So this, or whatever is antitypical to it, will be the last effort of the dragon, beast, and false prophet. battle—Greek, "war;" the final conflict for the kingship of the world described ch. 19, 17-21. 15. The gathering of the world-kings with the beast against the Lamb is the signal for Christ's coming; therefore He here gives the charge to be watching for His coming and clothed in the garments of justification and sanctification, so as to be accepted. thief—(Matthew 24, 43; 2 Peter 3, 10.) they—saints and angels. shameless, "unseemliness" (Greek, aschomosune): Greek, 1 Corinthians 13, 5: a different word from the Greek, ch. 3, 18 (Greek, aischunce). 16. he—rather, "they (the three unclean spirits) gathered them together." If English Version be retained, "He" will refer to God who gives them over to the delusion of the three unclean spirits; or else the sixth angel (v. 12). Armageddon—Hebrew, Har, a mountain, and Megiddo in Manasseh in Galilee, the scene of the overthrow of the Canaanite kings by God's miraculous interposition under Deborah and Barak; the same as the great plain of Esdraelon. Josiah, too, as the ally of Babylon, was defeated and slain at Megiddo; and the mourning of the Jews at the time just before God shall interpose for them against all the nations confederate against Jerusalem, is compared to the mourning for Josiah at Megiddo. Megiddo comes from a root, gadad, "cut off," and means slaughter. Cf. Joel 3, 2, 12, 14, where "the valley of Jehoshaphat" (meaning in Hebrew, "judgment of God") is mentioned as the scene of God's final vengeance on the God-opposing foe. Probably some great plain, antitypical to the valleys of Megiddo and Jehoshaphat, will be the scene. 17. angel—So ANDREAS. But A, B, Vulgate and Syriac omit it. into—So ANDREAS (Greek eis). But A, B, "upon" (Greek epi). great—So B, Vulgate, Syriac, Coptic and ANDREAS. But A omits. of heaven—So B and ANDREAS. But A, Vulgate, Syriac, and Coptic omit. It is done—"It is come to pass." God's voice as to the final consummation, as Jesus' voice on the cross when the work of expiation was completed, "It is finished." 18. voices . . . thunders . . . lightnings—A has the order, "lightnings . . . voices . . . thunders." This is the same close as that of the seven seals and the seven thunders; but with the difference that they do not merely form the conclusion, but introduce the consequence, of the last vial, viz., the utter destruction of Babylon and then of the Antichristian armies. earthquake—which is often preceded by a lurid state of air, such as would result from the vial poured upon it. men were—So B, Vulgate, Syriac, and ANDREAS. But A and Coptic read, "A man was," so mighty—Greek, "such." 19. the great city—the capital and seat of the apostate Church, spiritual Babylon (of which Rome is the representative, if one literal city be meant). The city in ch. 11, 8 (see Note), is probably distinct, viz., Jerusalem under Antichrist (the beast, who is distinct from the harlot or apostate Church). In ch. 11, 13 only a tenth falls of Jerusalem, whereas here the city (Babylon) "became (Greek) into three parts" by the earthquake. cities of the nations—other great cities in league with spiritual Babylon. great . . . came in remembrance—Greek, "Babylon the great was remembered" (ch. 18, 5). It is now that the last call to escape from Babylon is given to God's people in her (ch. 18, 4). fierceness—the boiling over outburst of His wrath (Greek thumou orgees), cf. Note, ch. 14, 10. 20. Plainly parallel to ch. 6, 14-17, and by anticipation descriptive of the last judgment. the mountains—rather as Greek, "there were found no mountains." 21. fell—Greek, "descends," upon men—Greek, "the men" was—Greek, "is." men—not those struck who died, but the rest. Unlike the result in the case of Jerusalem (ch. 11. 13), where "the remnant . . . affrighted . . . gave glory to the God of heaven."

CHAPTER XVII.

Ver. 1-18. THE HARLOT BABYLON'S GAUD: THE BEAST ON WHICH SHE RIDES, HAVING SEVEN HEADS AND TEN HORNS, SHALL BE THE INSTRUMENT OF JUDGMENT ON HER. As ch. 16. 12 stated generally the vial judgment about to be poured on the harlot, Babylon's power, as chs. 17. and 18. give the same in detail, so ch. 19. gives in detail the judgment on the beast and the false prophet, summarily alluded to in ch. 16. 13-15, in connection with the Lord's coming. 1. unto me—A, B, Vulgate, Syriac, and Coptic omit. many—So A. But B, "the many waters" (Jeremiah 51. 13); v. 15, below, explains the sense. The whore is the apostate Church, just as the woman (ch. 12) is the Church whilst faithful. Satan having failed by violence, tries too successfully to seduce her by the allurements of the world; unlike her Lord, she was overcome by this temptation; hence she is seen sitting on the scarlet-coloured beast, no longer the wife, but the harlot; no longer Jerusalem, but spiritually Sodom (ch. 11. 8). 2. drunk with—Greek, 'owing to.' It cannot be Pagan Rome, but Papal Rome, if a particular seat of error be meant, but I incline to think that the judgment (ch. 18. 2) and the spiritual fornication (ch. 18. 3), though finding their culmination in Rome, are not restricted to it, but comprise the whole apostate Church, Roman, Greek, and even Protestant, so far as it has been seduced from its "first love" (ch. 2. 4) to Christ, the heavenly Bridegroom, and given its affections to worldly pomps and idols. The woman (ch. 12. 1) is the congregation of God in its purity under the Old and New Testament, and appears again as the Bride of the Lamb, the transfigured Church prepared for the marriage feast. The woman, the invisible Church, is latent in the apostate Church, and is the Church militant; the Bride is the Church triumphant. 3. the wilderness—Contrast her in ch. 12. 6, 14, having a place in the wilderness-world, but not a home; a sojourner here, looking for the city to come. Now, on the contrary, she is contented to have her portion in this moral wilderness. upon a scarlet . . . beast—The same as in ch. 13. 1, who there is described as here, "having seven heads and ten horns (therein betraying that he is representative of the dragon, ch. 12. 3), and upon his heads names (so the oldest MSS. read) of blasphemy;" cf. also v. 12-14, below, with ch. 19. 19, 20, and ch. 17. 13, 14, 16. Rome, resting on the world-power, and ruling it by the claim of supremacy, is the chief, though not the exclusive, representative of this symbol. As the dragon is fiery-red, so the beast is blood-red in colour; implying its blood-guiltiness, and also deep-dyed sin. The scarlet is also the symbol of kingly authority. full—all over; not merely "on his heads," as in ch. 13. 1, for its opposition to God is now about to develop itself in all its intensity. Under the harlot's superintendence, the world-power puts forth blasphemous pretensions worse than in Pagan days. So the Pope is placed by the cardinals in God's temple on the altar to sit there, and the cardinals kiss the feet of the Pope. This ceremony is called in Romish writers the adoration. *Historie de Clerge, Amsterd., 1716; and LERTENBURGH'S Notitia Curie Romanæ, 1683, p. 125; HEIDEGGER, Myst. Bab., 1, 511, 514, 537; a Papal coin (Numismata Pontificum, Paris, 1679, p. 5) has the blasphemous legend, "Quem creant, adorant." Kneeling and kissing are the worship meant by St. John's word nine times used in respect to the rival of God (Greek proskunein). Abomination, too, is the scriptural term for an idol, or any creature worshipped with the homage due to the Creator. Still, there is some check on the God-opposed world-power whilst ridden by the harlot; the consummated Antichrist will be when, having destroyed her, the beast shall be revealed as the concentration and incarnation of all the self-defying God-opposed principles which have appeared in various forms and degrees heretofore. "The Church has gained outward recognition by leaning on the world-power, which in its turn uses the Church for its own ob-* jects; such is the picture here of Christendom ripe for judgment." [AUBERLEN.] The seven heads in the view of many are the seven successive forms of government of Rome: kings, consuls, dictators, decemvirs, military tribunes, emperors, the German emperors [WORDSWORTH], of whom Napoleon is the successor (v. 11). But see the view given, Notes, v. 9, 10, which I prefer. The crowns formerly on the ten horns (ch. 13. 1) have now disappeared, perhaps an indication that the ten kingdoms into which the Germanic-Slavonic world [the old Roman empire, including the East as well as the West, the two legs of the image with five toes on each, i. e., ten in all] is to be divided, will lose their monarchical form in the end [AUBERLEN]; but see v. 12, which seems to imply crowned kings. 4. The colour scarlet, it is remarkable, is that reserved for popes and cardinals. Paul II. made it penal for any one but cardinals to wear hats of scarlet; cf. Cæremoniæ Rom., 3 sect. 5, c. 5. This book was compiled more than 340 years ago by Marcellus, a Romish archbishop, and dedicated to Leo X. In it are enumerated five different articles of dress of scarlet colour. A vest is mentioned studded with pearls. The Pope's mitre is of gold and precious stones. These are the very characteristics outwardly which Revelation thrice assigns to the harlot or Babylon. So Joachim, an abbot from Calabria, about A. D. 1200, when asked by Richard of England, who had summoned him to Palestine, concerning Antichrist, replied that "he was born long ago at Rome, and is now exalting himself above all that is called God," ROGER HOVEDEN, Angl. Chron., 1, 2, and elsewhere, wrote, "The harlot arrayed in gold is the Church of Rome." Whenever and wherever (not in Rome alone) the Church, instead of being "clothed (as at first, ch. 12. 1) with the sun" of heaven, is arrayed in earthly meretricious gauds, compromising the truth of God through fear, or flattery, of the world's power, science, or wealth, she becomes the harlot seated on the beast, and doomed in righteous retribution to be judged by the beast (v. 16). Soon, like Rome, and like the Jews of Christ's and the apostles' time leagued with the heathen Rome, she will then become the persecutor of the saints (v. 6). Instead of drinking her Lord's "cup" of suffering, she has "a cup full of abominations and filthinesses." Rome, in her medals, represents herself holding a cup with the self-condemning inscription, "Sedet super universum." Meanwhile the world-power gives up its hostility and accepts Christianity externally; the beast gives up its God-opposed character, the woman gives up her Divine one. They meet half-way by mutual concessions; Christianity becomes worldly, the world becomes Christianized. The gainer is the world, the loser is the Church. The beast for a time receives a deadly wound (ch. 13. 3), but is not really transfigured; he will return worse than ever (v. 11-14). The Lord alone by His coming can make the kingdoms of this world become the kingdoms of our Lord and His Christ. The "purple" is the badge of empire; even as in mockery it was put on our Lord. decked—lit., "gilded," stones—Greek, "stone." filthiness—A, B, and ANDREAS read, "the filthy (impure) things." 5. upon . . . forehead . . . name—as harlots usually had. What a contrast to "HOLINESS TO THE LORD," inscribed on the mitre on the high priest's forehead! mystery—Implying a spiritual fact heretofore hidden, and incapable of discovery by mere reason, but now revealed. As the union of Christ and the Church is a "great mystery" (a spiritual truth of momentous interest, once hidden, now revealed, Ephesians 5. 31, 32); so the Church conforming to the world and thereby becoming a harlot is a counter "mystery" (or spiritual truth, symbolically now revealed). As iniquity in the harlot is a leaven working in "mystery," and therefore called "the mystery of iniquity," so when she is destroyed, the iniquity heretofore working (comparatively) latently in her, shall be revealed in the man of iniquity, the open embodiment of all previous evil. Contrast the "mystery of God" and "godliness," ch. 10. 7; 1 Timothy 3. 16. It was Rome that crucified Christ; that destroyed Jerusalem and scattered the Jews; that persecuted the early Christians in Pagan times, and Protestant Christians in Papal times; and probably shall be again restored to its pristine grandeur, such as it had under the Cæsars, just before the burning of the harlot and of itself with her. So HIPPOLYTUS, De Antichristo (who lived in the second century), thought. Popery cannot be at one and the same time the "mystery of iniquity," and the manifested or revealed Antichrist. Probably it will compromise for political power (v. 3) the portion of Christianity still in its creed, and thus shall prepare the way for Antichrist's manifestation. The name Babylon, which in the image, Daniel 2, is given to the head, is here given to the harlot, which marks her as being connected with the fourth kingdom, Rome, the last part of the image. Benedict XIII., in his Indiction for a jubilee, A. D. 1725, called Rome "the mother of all believers, and the mistress of all churches" (harlots like herself). The correspondence of syllables and accents in Greek is striking; He porne kai to therion; He numphe kai to arnion. The whore and the beast; the Bride and the Lamb, of harlots—Greek, "of the harlots and of the abominations." Not merely Rome, but Christendom as a whole, even as formerly Israel as a whole, has become a harlot. The invisible Church of true believers is hidden and dispersed in the visible Church. The boundary lines which separate harlot and woman are not denominational nor drawn externally, but can only be spiritually discerned. If Rome were the only seat of Babylon, much of the spiritual profit of Revelation would be lost to us; but the harlot "sitteth upon many waters" (v. 1), and "ALL nations have drunk of the wine of her fornication" (v. 2; ch. 18. 3; "the earth," ch. 19. 2). External extensiveness over the whole world, and internal conformity to the world—worldliness in extent and contents—is symbolized by the name of the world-city, "Babylon." As the sun shines on all the earth, thus the woman clothed with the sun is to let her light penetrate to the uttermost parts of the earth. But she in externally Christianizing the world, permits herself to be seduced by the world; thus her universality or catholicity is not that of the Jerusalem which we look for ("the mother of us all," ch. 21. 2; Isaiah 2. 2-4; Galatians 4. 26), but that of Babylon, the world-wide but harlot city! [As Babylon was destroyed, and the Jews restored to Jerusalem by Cyrus, so our Cyrus—a Persian name meaning the sun—the Sun of righteousness, shall bring Israel, literal and spiritual, to the holy Jerusalem at his coming. Babylon and Jerusalem are the two opposite poles of the spiritual world.] Still, the Romish Church is not only accidentally, and as a matter of fact, but in virtue of its very principle, a harlot, the metropolis of whoredom, "the mother of harlots;" whereas the evangelical Protestant Church is, according to her principle and fundamental creed, a chaste woman; the Reformation was a protest of the woman against the harlot. The spirit of the heathen world-kingdom Rome had, before the Reformation, changed the Church in the West into a Church-State, Rome; and in the East, into a State-Church, fettered by the world-power, having its centre in Byzantium; the Roman and Greek churches have thus fallen from the invisible spiritual essence of the Gospel into the elements of the world. [AUBERLEN.] Cf. with the "woman" called "Babylon" here, the woman named "wickedness," or "lawlessness," "iniquity" (Zechariah 5. 7, 8, 11), carried to Babylon; cf. "the mystery of iniquity" and "the man of sin," "that wicked one," lit., "the lawless one" (2 Thessalonians 2. 7, 8; also Matthew 24. 12). 6. martyrs—witnesses. I wondered with great admiration—As the Greek is the same in the verb and the noun, translate the latter "wonder." John certainly did not admire her in the modern English sense. Elsewhere (v. 8; ch. 13. 3), all the earthly-minded ("they that dwell on the earth") wonder in admiration of the beast. Here only is John's wonder called forth; not the beast, but the woman sunken into the harlot, the Church become a world-loving apostate, moves his sorrowful astonishment at so awful a change. That the world should be bestly is natural, but that the faithful bride should become the whore is monstrous, and excites the same amazement in him as the same awful change in Israel excited in Isaiah and Jeremiah. "I horrible thing" in them answers to "abominations" here.

"Corruptio optimi pessima;" when the Church falls, she sinks lower than the godless world, in proportion as her right place is higher than the world. It is striking that in v. 3, "woman" has not the article, "the woman," as if she had been before mentioned: for though identical in one sense with the woman, ch. 12., in another sense she is not. The elect are never perverted into apostates, and still remain as the true woman invisibly contained in the harlot; yet Christendom regarded as the woman has apostatized from its first faith. 8. beast . . . was, and is not—(Cf. v. 11.) The time when the beast "is not" is the time during which it has "the deadly wound;" the time of the seventh head becoming Christian externally, when its beast-like character was put into suspension temporarily. The healing of its wound answers to its ascending out of the bottomless pit. The beast, or Antichristian world-power, returns worse than ever, with satanic powers from hell (ch. 11. 7), not merely from the sea of convulsed nations (ch. 13. 1). Christian civilization gives the beast only a temporary wound, whence the deadly wound is always mentioned in connection with its being healed up, the non-existence of the beast in connection with its reappearance; and Daniel does not even notice any change in the world-power effected by Christianity. We are endangered on one side by the spurious Christianity of the harlot, on the other by the open Antichristianity of the beast; the third class is Christ's "little flock." go—So B, Vulgate, and ANDREAS read the future tense. But A and IRENEUS, "goeth," into perdition—The continuance of this revived seventh (i. e., the eighth) head is short: it is therefore called "the son of perdition," who is essentially doomed to it almost immediately after his appearance. names were—So Vulgate and ANDREAS. But A, B, Syriac, and Coptic read the singular, "name is." written in—Greek, "upon," which—rather, "when they behold the beast that it was," &c. So Vulgate. was, and is not, and yet is—A, B, and ANDREAS read, ". . . and shall come" (lit., "be present," viz., again: Greek kai parastai). The Hebrew tetragrammaton, or sacred four letters in Jehovah "who is, who was, and who is to come," the believer's object of worship, has its contrasted counterpart in the beast "who was, and is not, and shall be present," the object of the earth's worship. [BENGEL.] They exult with wonder in seeing that the beast which had seemed to have received its death-blow from Christianity, is on the eve of reviving with greater power than ever on the ruins of that religion which tormented them (ch. 11. 10). 9. Cf. ch. 13. 13; Daniel 12. 10, where similarly spiritual discernment is put forward as needed in order to understand the symbolical prophecy. seven heads and seven mountains—The connection between mountains and kings must be deeper than the mere outward fact to which incidental allusion is made, that Rome (the then world-city) is on seven hills (whence heathen Rome had a national festival called Septimontium, the feast of the seven-hilled city [PLUTARCH]; and on the imperial coins, just as here, she is represented as a woman seated on seven hills. Coin of Vespasian, described by Captain SMYTH, Roman Coins, p. 310; ACKERMAN, I., p. 87). The seven heads can hardly be at once seven kings or kingdoms (v. 10), and seven geographical mountains. The true connection is, as the head is the prominent part of the body, so the mountain is prominent in the land. Like "sea" and "earth" and "waters . . . peoples" (v. 15), so "mountains" have a symbolical meaning, viz., prominent seats of power. Especially such as are prominent hindrances to the cause of God (Psalm 68. 16, 17; Isaiah 40. 4; 41. 15; 49. 11; Ezekiel 35. 2); especially Babylon (which geographically was in a plain, but spiritually is called a destroying mountain, Jeremiah 51. 25), in majestic contrast to which stands Mount Zion, "the mountain of the Lord's house" (Isalah 2. 2), and the heavenly mount; ch. 21. 10, "a great and high mountain . . . and that great city, the holy Jerusalem." So in Daniel 2. 35, the stone becomes a mountain—Messiah's universal kingdom supplanting the previous world-kingdoms. As nature shadows forth the great realities of the spiritual world, so seven-hilled

Rome is a representative of the seven-headed world-power of which the dragon has been, and is the prince. The "seven kings" are hereby distinguished from the "ten kings" (v. 12): the former are what the latter are not, "mountains," great seats of the world-power. The seven universal God-opposed monarchies are Egypt (the first world-power which came into collision with God's people), Assyria, Babylon, Greece, Medo-Persia, Rome, the Germanic-Slavonic empire (the clay of the fourth kingdom mixed with its iron in Nebuchadnezzar's image, a fifth material, Daniel 2. 33, 34, 42, 43, symbolizing this last head). These seven might seem not to accord with the seven heads in Daniel 7. 4-7, one head on the first beast (Babylon), one on the second (Medo-Persia), four on the third (Greece; viz., Egypt, Syria, Thrace with Bithynia, and Greece with Macedon); but Egypt and Greece are in both lists. Syria answers to Assyria (from which the name Syria is abbreviated), and Thrace with Bithynia answers to the Gothic-Germanic-Slavonic hordes which, pouring down on Rome from the North, founded the Germanic-Slavonic empire. The woman sitting on the seven hills implies the Old and New Testament Church conforming to, and resting on, the world-power, i. e., on all the seven world-kingdoms. Abraham and Isaac dissembling as to their wives through fear of the kings of Egypt foreshadowed this. Cf. Ezekiel 16. and 23., on Israel's whoredoms with Egypt, Assyria, Babylon; and Matthew 7. 21; 24. 10-12, 23-26, on the characteristics of the New Testament Church's harlotry, viz., distrust, suspicion, hatred, treachery, divisions into parties, false doctrine. 10. there are—translate, "they (the seven heads) are seven kings." five . . . one—Greek, "the five . . . the one:" the first five of the seven are fallen (a word applicable not to forms of government passing away, but to the fall of once powerful empires: Egypt, Ezekiel 29. and 30.; Assyria and Nineveh, Nahum 3. 1-19; Babylon, ch. 18. 2; Jeremiah 50. and 51.; Medo-Persia, Daniel 8. 3-7, 20-22; 10. 13; 11. 2; Greece, Daniel 11. 4). Rome was "the one" existing in St. John's days. "Kings" is the Scripture phrase for kingdoms, because these kingdoms are generally represented in character by some one prominent head, as Babylon by Nebuchadnezzar, Medo-Persia by Cyrus, Greece by Alexander, &c. the other is not yet come—Not as ALFORD, inaccurately representing AUBERLEN, the Christian empire beginning with Constantine; but, the Germanic-Slavonic empire beginning and continuing in its beast-like, i. e., HEATHEN Antichristian character for only "a short space." The time when it is said of it "it is not" (v. 11), is the time during which it is "wounded to death," and has the "deadly wound" (ch. 13. 3). The external Christianization of the migrating hordes from the North which descended on Rome, is the wound to the beast answering to the earth swallowing up the flood (heathen tribes) sent by the dragon, Satan, to drown the woman, the Church. The emphasis palpably is on "a short space," which therefore comes first in the Greek, not on "he must continue," as if his continuance for some [considerable] time were implied, as ALFORD wrongly thinks. The time of external Christianization (whilst the beast's wound continues) has lasted for upwards of fourteen centuries, ever since Constantine. Rome and the Greek Church have partially healed the wound by image-worship. 11. beast that . . . is not—his beastly character being kept down by outward Christianization of the state until he starts up to life again as "the eighth" king, his "wound being healed" (ch. 13. 3), Antichrist manifested in fullest and most intense opposition to God. The HE is emphatical in the Greek. He, peculiarly and pre-eminently: answering to "the little horn" with eyes like the eyes of a man, and a mouth speaking great things, before whom three of the ten horns were plucked up by the roots, and to whom the whole ten "give their power and strength" (v. 12, 13, 17). That a personal Antichrist will stand at the head of the Antichristian kingdom, is likely from the analogy of Antiochus Epiphanes, the Old Testament Antichrist, "the little horn" in Daniel 8. 9-12; also, "the man of sin, son of perdition" (2 Thessalonians 2. 3-8), answers here to

"goeth into perdition," and is applied to an individual, viz., Judas, in the only other passage where the phrase occurs (John 17. 12). He is essentially a child of destruction, and hence he has but a little time ascended out of the bottomless pit, when he "goes into perdition" (v. 8, 11). "Whilst the Church passes through death of the flesh to glory of the Spirit, the beast passes through the glory of the flesh to death." [AUBERLEN.] is of the seven—rather, "springs out of the seven." The eighth is not merely one of the seven restored, but a new power or person proceeding out of the seven, and at the same time embodying all the God-opposed features of the previous seven concentrated and consummated; for which reason there are said to be not eight, but only seven heads, for the eighth is the embodiment of all the seven. In the birth-pangs which prepare the "regeneration" there are Wars, earthquakes, and disturbances [AUBERLEN], wherein Antichrist takes his rise ("sea," ch. 13. 1; Mark 13. 8; Luke 21. 9-11). He does not fall like the other seven (v. 10), but is destroyed, going to his own perdition, by the Lord in person. 12. ten kings . . . received no kingdom as yet; but receive power as kings . . . with the beast—Hence and from v. 14, 16, it seems that these ten kings or kingdoms, are to be contemporaries with the beast in its last or eighth form, viz., Antichrist. Cf. Daniel 2. 34, 44, "the stone smote the image upon his feet," i. e., upon the ten toes, which are in v. 41-44, interpreted to be "kings." The ten kingdoms are not, therefore, ten which arose in the overthrow of Rome (heathen), but are to rise out of the last state of the fourth kingdom under the eighth head. I agree with ALFORD that the phrase "as kings," implies that they reserve their kingly rights in their alliance with the beast, wherein "they give their power and strength unto" him (v. 13). They have the name of kings, but not with undivided kingly power. [WORDSWORTH.] See AUBERLEN's not so probable view, Note, v. 3. one hour—a definite time of short duration, during which "the devil is come down to the inhabitants of the earth and of the sea, having great wrath, because he knoweth that he hath but a short time." Probably the three and a half years (ch. 11. 2, 3; 13. 5). Antichrist is in existence long before the fall of Babylon; but it is only at its fall he obtains the vassalage of the ten kings. He in the first instance imposes on the Jews as the Messiah, coming in his own name; then persecutes those of them who refuse his blasphemous pretensions. Not until the sixth vial, in the latter part of his reign, does he associate the ten kings with him in war with the Lamb, having gained them over by the aid of the spirits of devils working miracles. His connection with Israel appears from his sitting "in the temple of God" (2 Thessalonians 2. 4), and as the antitypical "abomination of desolation standing in the Holy place" (Daniel 9. 27; 12. 11; Matthew 24. 15), and "in the city where our Lord was crucified" (ch. 11. 8). It is remarkable that IRENÆUS, Hæc., 5. 25, and ST. CYRIL OF JERUSALEM (RUFFINUS, Hist., 10. 37), prophesied that Antichrist should have his seat at Jerusalem, and should restore the kingdom of the Jews. Julian the apostate, long after, took part with the Jews, and aided in building their temple, herein being Antichrist's forerunner. 13. one mind—one sentiment. shall give—So Coptic. But A, B, and Syriac, "give." strength—Greek, "authority." They become his dependent allies (v. 14). Thus Antichrist sets up to be King of kings, but scarcely has he put forth his claim when the true KING of KINGS appears and dashes him down in a moment to destruction. 14. These shall . . . war with the Lamb—in league with the beast. This is a summary anticipation of ch. 19. 19. This shall not be till after they have first executed judgment on the harlot (v. 15, 16). Lord of lords, &c.—anticipating ch. 19. 16. are—not in the Greek. Therefore translate, "And they that are with Him, called chosen, and faithful (shall overcome them, viz., the beast and his allied kings)." These have been with Christ in heaven unseen, but now appear with Him. 15. (Ver. 1; Isaiah 8. 7.) An impious parody of Jehovah who "sitteth upon the flood." [ALFORD.] Also, contrast the "many waters," ch. 19. 6, "Alleluia." The "peoples," &c., here mark the universality of the spiritual fornication of the Church. The "tongues" remind us of the original Babel, the confusion of tongues, the beginning of Babylon, and the first commencement of idolatrous apostasy after the flood, as the tower was doubtless dedicated to the deified heavens. Thus, Babylon is the appropriate name of the harlot. The Pope, as the chief representative of the harlot, claims a double supremacy over all peoples, typified by the "two swords" according to the interpretation of Boniface VIII. in the Bull, "Unam Sanctam," and represented by the two keys, viz., spiritual as the universal bishop, whence he is crowned with the mitre; and temporal, whence he is also crowned with the tiara in token of his imperial supremacy. Contrast with the Pope's diadems the "many diadems" of Him who alone has claim to, and shall exercise when He shall come, the twofold dominion (ch. 19, 12). 16. upon the beast—But A, B, Vulgate, and Syriac read, "And the beast." shall make her desolate—having first dismounted her from her seat on the beast (v. 3). naked—stripped of all her gaud (v. 4). As Jerusalem used the world-power to crucify her Saviour, and then was destroyed by that very power, Rome; so the Church, having apostatized to the world, shall have judgment executed on her first by the world-power, the beast and his allies; and these afterwards shall have judgment executed on them by Christ Himself in person. So Israel leaning on Egypt, a broken reed, is pierced by it, and then Egypt itself is punished. So Israel's whoredom with Assyria and Babylon was punished by the Assyrian and Babylonian captivities. So the Church when it goes a-whoring after the word as if it were the reality, instead of witnessing against its apostasy from God, is false to its profession; being no longer a reality itself, but a sham, the Church is rightly judged by that world which for a time had used the Church to further its own ends, whilst all the while "hating" Christ's unworldly religion, but which now no longer wants the Church's aid. eat her flesh—Greek plural, "masses of flesh," i. e., "carnal possessions;" implying the fulness of carnality into which the Church is sunk. The judgment on the harlot is again and again described (ch. 18, 1; 19, 5); first by an "angel having great power" (ch. 18, 1), then by "another voice from heaven" (ch. 18, 4-20), then by "a mighty angel" (ch. 18, 21-24). Cf. Ezekiel 16, 37-41, originally said of Israel, but further applicable to the New Testament Church when fallen into spiritual fornication. On the phrase, "eat . . . flesh" for prey upon one's property, and injure the character and person, cf. Psalm 14, 4; 27, 2; Jeremiah 10, 25; Micah 3, 3. The First Napoleon's edict published at Rome in 1809, confiscating the Papal dominions and joining them to France, and lately the severance of large portions of the Pope's territory from his sway, and the union of them to the dominions of the king of Italy, virtually through Louis Napoleon, are a first instalment of the full realization of this prophecy of the whore's destruction. "Her flesh" seems to point to her temporal dignities and resources, as distinguished from "herself" (Greek). How striking a retribution, that having obtained her first temporal dominions, the exarchate of Ravenna, the kingdom of the Lombards, and the state of Rome, by recognizing the usurper Pepin as lawful king of France, she should be stripped of her dominions by another usurper of France, the Napoleonic dynasty! burn . . . with fire—the legal punishment of an abominable fornication. 17. hath put—the prophetic past tense for the future. fulfil—Greek, "do," or "accomplish." The Greek poiesai, is distinct from that which is translated "fulfilled," Greek telesthesontai, below. his will—Greek, his mind, or purpose; whilst they think only of doing their own purpose. to agree—lit., "to do (or accomplish) one mind" or "purpose." A and Vulgate omit this clause, but B supports it. the words of God—foretelling the rise and downfall of the beast; Greek hoi logoi in A, B, and ANDREAS. English Version reading is Greek ta rhemata, which is not well supported. No mere articulate utterances, but the efficient words of Him who is the Word, Greek logos. fulfilled—(Ch. 10, 7.) 18. reigneth—lit., "hath kingship over the kings." The harlot cannot be a mere city literally, but is called so in a spiritual sense (ch. 11, 8). Also the beast cannot represent a spiritual power, but a world-power. In this verse the harlot is presented before us ripe for judgment. The 18th chapter details that judgment.

CHAPTER XVIII.

Ver. 1-24. BABYLON'S FALL: GOD'S PEOPLE CALLED OUT OF HER: THE KINGS AND MERCHANTS OF THE EARTH MOURN, WHILST THE SAINTS REJOICE AT HER FALL. 1. And—So Vulgate and ANDREAS. But A, B, Syriac, and Coptic omit "and." power—Greek, "authority." lightened—"illuminated." with—Greek, "owing to." 2. mightily . . . strong—Not supported by MSS. But A, B, Vulgate, Syriac, and Coptic read, "with (lit., IN) a mighty voice." is fallen, is fallen—So A, Vulgate, Syriac, and ANDREAS. But B and Coptic omit the second "is fallen" (Isaiah 21, 9; Jeremiah 51, 8). This phrase is here prophetic of her fall, still future, as v. 4 proves. devils—Greek, "demons." the hold—a keep or prison. 3. the wine—So B, Syriac and Coptic. But A, C, and Vulgate omit. drunk—Ch. 14, 8, from which perhaps "the wine" may have been interpolated. They have drunk of her fornication, the consequence of which will be wrath to themselves. But A, B, and C read, "(owing to the wrath of her fornication all nations) have fallen." Vulgate and most versions read as English Version, which may be the right reading, though not supported by the oldest MSS. Babylon, the whore, is destroyed, before the beast slays the two witnesses (ch. 11.), and then the beast is destroyed himself. abundance—lit., "power." delicacies—Greek, "luxury." See Note, 1 Timothy 5, 11, where the Greek verb "wax wanton" is akin to the noun here. Translate, "wanton luxury." The reference is not to earthly merchandise, but to spiritual wares, indulgences, idolatries, superstitions, worldly compromises, wherewith the harlot, i. e., the apostate Church, has made merchandise of men. This applies especially to Rome; but the Greek, and even in a less degree Protestant churches, are not guiltless. However, the principle of evangelical Protestantism is pure, but the principle of Rome and the Greek church is not so. 4. Come out of her, my people—Quoted from Jeremiah 50, 8; 51, 6, 45. Even in the Romish Church God has a people; but they are in great danger: their only safety is in coming out of her at once. So also in every apostate or world-conforming Church there are some of God's invisible and true Church, who, if they would be safe, must come out. Especially at the eve of God's judgment on apostate Christendom: as Lot was warned to come out of Sodom just before its destruction, and Israel to come from about the tents of Dathan and Abiram. So the first Christians came out of Jerusalem when the apostate Jewish Church was judged. "St to and Church are precious gifts of God. But the State being desecrated to a different end from what God designed it, viz., to govern for, and as under, God, becomes beast-like; the Church apostatizing becomes the harlot. The true woman is the kernel: beast and harlot are the shell; whenever the kernel is mature, the shell is thrown away." [AUBERLEN.] "The harlot is not Rome alone (though she is pre-eminently so), but every Church that has not Christ's mind and spirit. False Christendom, divided into very many sects, is truly Babylon, i. e., confusion. However, in all Christendom the true Jesus-congregation, the woman clothed with the sun, lives and is hidden. Corrupt, lifeless Christendom is the harlot, whose great aim is the pleasure of the flesh, and which is governed by the spirit of nature and the world." [HAIN in AUBERLEN.] The first justification of the woman is in her being called out of Babylon the harlot, as the culminating stage of the latter's sin, when judgment is about to fall: for apostate Christendom, Babylon, is not to be converted, but to be destroyed. Secondly, she has to pass through an ordeal of persecution from the beast, which purifies and prepares her for the transfiguration-glory at Christ's coming (ch. 20, 4; Luke 21, 28). be not partakers—Greek, "have no fellowship with her sins." that ye receive not of her plagues—as Lot's wife, by lingering too near the polluted and doomed city 5. her sins—as a great heap. reached—Greek, “reached so far as to come into close contact with, and to cleave unto.” 6. Addressed to the executioners of God’s wrath. reward—Greek, “repay.” she rewarded—English Version reading adds “you” with none of the oldest MSS. But A, B, C, Vulgate, Syriac, and Coptic omit it. She had not rewarded or repaid the world-power for some injury which the world-power had inflicted on her; but she had given the world-power that which was its due, viz., spiritual delusions, because it did not like to retain God in its knowledge; the unfaithful Church’s principle was, Populus vult decipi, et decipiatur, “The people like to be deceived, and let them be deceived.” double—of sorrow. Contrast with this the double of joy which Jerusalem shall receive for her past suffering (Isaiah 61. 7; Zechariah 9. 12); even as she has received double punishment for her sins (Isaiah 40. 2). unto her—So Syriac, Coptic, and ANDREAS. A, B, and C omit it. in the cup—(v. 3; ch. 14. 8; 17. 4). filled—lit., mixed. fill to her double—of the Lord’s cup of wrath. 7. How much—i. e., in proportion as. lived deliciously—luxuriously: Note, v. 3, where the Greek is akin. sorrow—Greek, “mourning,” as for a dead husband. I sit—So Vulgate. But A, B, and C, prefix “that.” I am no widow—for the world-power is my husband and my supporter. I shall see no sorrow—Greek, “mourning.” “I am seated (this long time) . . . I am no widow . . . I shall see no sorrow,” marks her complete unconcerned security as to the past, present, and future. [BENGE.] I shall never have to mourn as one bereft of her husband. As Babylon was queen of the East, so Rome has been queen of the West, and is called on Imperial coins “the eternal city.” So Papal Rome is called by AMMIAN MARCELLIN, 15. 7. “Babylon is a former Rome, and Rome a latter Babylon. Rome is a daughter of Babylon, and by her, as by her mother, God has been pleased to subdue the world under one sway.” [ST. AUGUSTINE.] As the Jews’ restoration did not take place till Babylon’s fall, so R. KIMCHI, on Obadiah, writes, “When Rome (Edom) shall be devastated, there shall be redemption to Israel.” Romish idolatries have been the great stumbling-blocks to the Jews’ acceptance of Christianity. 8. death—on herself, though she thought herself secure even from the death of her husband. mourning—instead of her feasting. famine—instead of her luxurious delicacies (v. 3, 7). fire—(Note, ch. 17. 16). Literal fire may burn the literal city of Rome, which is situated in the midst of volcanic agencies. As the ground was cursed for Adam’s sin, and the earth under Noah was sunk beneath the flood, and Sodom was burnt with fire, so may Rome be. But as the harlot is mystical (the whole faithless Church), the burning may be mainly mystical, symbolizing utter destruction and removal. BENGE is probably right in thinking Rome will once more rise to power. The carnal, faithless, and worldly elements in all churches, Roman, Greek, and Protestant, tend towards one common centre, and prepare the way for the last form of the beast, viz., Antichrist. The Pharisees were in the main sound in creed, yet judgment fell on them as on the unsound Sadducees and half-heathenish Samaritans. So faithless and adulterous, carnal, worldly Protestant churches, will not escape for their soundness of creed. the Lord—So B, C, Syriac, and ANDREAS. But A and Vulgate omit. “Strong” is the meaning of God’s Hebrew name, EL. judgeth—But A, B, and C read the past tense (Greek, krinas), “who hath judged her:” the prophetic past for the future: the charge in v. 4 to God’s people to come out of her, implies that the judgment was not yet actually executed. 9. Lived deliciously—Greek, luxuriated. The faithless Church, instead of reproving, connived at the self-indulgent luxury of the great men of this world, and sanctioned it by her own practice. Contrast the world’s rejoicing over the dead bodies of the two witnesses (ch. 11. 10) who had tormented it by their faithfulness, with its lamentations over the harlot who had made the way to heaven smooth, and had been found a useful tool in keeping subjects in abject tyranny. Men’s carnal mind relishes a religion like that of the apostate Church, which gives an opiate to conscience, whilst leaving the sinner license to indulge his lusts. bewail her—A, B, C, Syriac, Coptic, and CYPRIAN omit “her.” 10. God’s judgments inspire fear even in the worldly, but it is of short duration, for the kings and great men soon attach themselves to the beast in its last and worst shape, as open Antichrist, claiming all that the harlot had claimed in blasphemous pretensions and more, and so making up to them for the loss of the harlot. mighty—Rome in Greek means strength; though that derivation is doubtful. 11. shall—So B. But A and C read the present, “weep and mourn.” merchandise—Greek, “cargo:” wares carried in ships: ship-lading (cf. v. 17). Rome was not a commercial city, and is not likely from her position to be so. The merchandise must therefore be spiritual, even as the harlot is not literal, but spiritual. She did not witness against carnal luxury and pleasure-seeking, the source of the merchants’ gains, but conformed to them (v. 7). She cared not for the sheep, but for the wool. Professing Christian merchants in her lived as if this world were the reality, not heaven, and were unscrupulous as to the means of getting gain. Cf. Zechariah 5. 4-11 (Notes), on the same subject, the judgment on mystical Babylon’s merchants for unjust gain. All the merchandise here mentioned occurs repeatedly in the “Roman Ceremonial.” 12. (Note, ch. 17. 4.) stones . . . pearls—Greek, “stone . . . pearl.” fine linen—A, B, and C read (Greek) bussinou for bussou, i. e., “fine linen manufacture.” [ALFORD.] The manufacture for which Egypt (the type of the apostate Church, ch. 11. 8) was famed. Contrast “the fine linen” (Ezekiel 16. 10) put on Israel, and on the New Testament Church (ch. 19. 8), the Bride, by God (Psalm 132. 9). thyme wood—the citrus of the Romans: probably the cypressus thyoides, or the thua articulata. “Citron wood.” [ALFORD.] A sweet-smelling tree of Cyrene in Lybia, used for incense. all manner vessels—Greek, “every vessel,” or “furniture.” 13. cinnamon—designed by God for better purposes: being an ingredient in the holy anointing oil, and a plant in the garden of the Beloved (Song of Solomon 4. 14); but desecrated to vile uses by the adulteress (Proverbs 7. 17). odours—of incense. A, C, Vulgate, and Syriac prefix “and amomium” (a precious hair ointment made from an Asiatic shrub). English Version reading is supported by Coptic and ANDREAS, but not oldest MSS. ointments—Greek, “ointment.” frankincense—Contrast the true “incense” which God loves (Psalm 141. 2; Malachi 1. 11). fine flour—The similago of the Latins. [ALFORD.] beasts—of burden: cattle. slaves—Greek, “bodies,” souls of men—(Ezekiel 27. 13.) Said of slaves. Appropriate to the spiritual harlot, apostate Christendom, especially Rome, which has so often enslaved both bodies and souls of men. Though the New Testament does not directly forbid slavery, which would, in the then state of the world, have incited a slave revolt, it virtually condemns it, as here. Popery has derived its greatest gains from the sale of masses for the souls of men after death, and of indulgences purchased from the Papal chancery by rich merchants in various countries, to be retailed at a profit. [MOSHEIM, III., 95. 96.] 14. Direct address to Babylon. the fruits that thy soul lusted after—Greek, “thy autumn-ripe fruits of the lust (eager desire) of the soul.” dainty—Greek, “fat:” “sumptuous” in food. goodly—“splendid,” “bright,” in dress and equipage. departed—supported by none of our MSS. But A, B, C, Vulgate, Syriac, and Coptic read, “perished.” thou shalt—A, C, Vulgate, and Syriac read, “They (men) shall no more find them at all.” 15. of these things—of the things mentioned, v. 12, 13. which—“who.” made rich by—Greek, “derived riches from her.” stand afar off for the fear—(Cf. v. 10.) walling—Greek, “mourning.” 16. And—So Vulgate and ANDREAS. But A, B, and C omit. decked—lit., “gilded.” stones . . . pearls—Greek, “stone . . . pearl.” B and ANDREAS read “pearls.” But A and C, “pearl.” 17. is come to naught—Greek, “is desolated.” shipmaster—Greek, “steersman,” or “pilot.” all the company in ships—A, C, Vulgate, and Syriac read, “Every one who saileth to a place” (B has “. . . to the place”); every voyager. Vessels were freighted with pilgrims to various shrines, so that in one month

(A. D. 1300) 200,000 pilgrims were counted in Rome [D'AUBIGNE, Reformation]: a source of gain, not only to the Papal see, but to shipmasters, merchants, pilots, &c. These latter, however, are not restricted to those literally "shipmasters," &c., but mainly refer, in the mystical sense, to all who share in the spiritual traffic of apostate Christendom. 18. when they saw—Greek, horontes. But A, B, C, and ANDREAS read, Greek, blepontes, "looking at." Greek, blepo, is to use the eyes, to look: the act of seeing without thought of the object seen. Greek, horao, refers to the thing seen or presented to the eye. [TITTMANN.] smoke—So B, C. But A reads, "place." What city is like—cf. the similar boast as to the beast, ch. 13. 4: so closely do the harlot and beast approximate one another. Contrast the attribution of this praise to God, to whom alone it is due, by His servants (Exodus 15. 11). MARTIAL says of Rome, "Nothing is equal to her;" and ATHENÆUS, "She is the epitome of the world." 19. wailing—"mourning." costliness—her costly treasures: abstract for concrete. that had ships—A, B, and C read, "that had their ships:" lit., "the ships." 20. holy apostles—So C reads. But A, B, Vulgate, Syriac, Coptic, and ANDREAS read, "Ye saints and ye apostles." avenged you on her—Greek, "judged your judgment on (lit., exacting it from) her." "There is more joy in heaven at the harlot's downfall than at that of the two beasts. For the most heinous of all sin is the sin of those who know God's word of grace, and keep it not. The worldliness of the Church is the most worldly of all worldliness. Hence, Babylon, in Revelation, has not only Israel's sins, but also the sins of the heathen; and John dwells longer on the abominations and judgments of the harlot than on those of the beast. The term 'harlot' describes the false Church's essential character. She retains her human shape as the woman, does not become a beast: she has the form of godliness, but denies its power. Her rightful lord and husband, Jehovah-Christ, and the joys and goods of His house, are no longer her all in all, but she runs after the visible and vain things of the world, in its manifold forms. The fullest form of her whoredom is, where the Church wishes to be itself a worldly power, uses politics and diplomacy, makes flesh her arm, uses unholy means for holy ends, spreads her dominion by sword or money, fascinates men by sensual ritualism, becomes 'mistress of ceremonies' to the dignitaries of the world, flatters prince or people, and like Israel, seeks the help of one world-power against the danger threatening from another." [AUBERLEN.] Judgment, therefore, begins with the harlot, as in privileges the house of God. 21. a—Greek, "one." millstone—Cf. the judgment on the Egyptian hosts at the Red Sea, Exodus 15. 5, 10; Nehemiah 9. 11, and the foretold doom of Babylon, the world-power, Jeremiah 51. 63, 64. with violence—Greek, "with impetus." This verse shows that this prophecy is regarded as still to be fulfilled. 22. pipers—flute-players. "Musicians," painters and sculptors, have desecrated their art to lend fascination to the sensuous worship of corrupt Christendom. craftsman—artisan. 23. What a blessed contrast is ch. 22. 5, respecting the city of God: "They need no candle (just as Babylon shall no more have the light of a candle, but for a widely different reason), for the Lord God giveth them light." For "candle," translate as Greek, "lamp." bridegroom . . . bride . . . no more . . . in thee—Contrast the heavenly city, with its Bridegroom, Bride, and blessed marriage-supper (ch. 19. 7, 9; 21. 2, 9; Isaiah 62. 4, 5). thy merchants were—So most of the best authorities read. But A omits the Greek article before "merchants," and then translates, "The great men of, &c., were thy merchants." sorceries—Greek, "sorcery." 24. Applied by Christ (Matthew 23. 35) to apostate Jerusalem, which proves that not merely the literal city Rome, and the Church of Rome (though the chief representative of the apostasy), but the WHOLE of the faithless Church of both the Old and New Testament is meant by Babylon the harlot; just as the whole Church (Old and New Testament) is meant by "the woman" (ch. 12. 1). As to literal city, ARINGHUS in BENGEL says, Pagan Rome was the general shambles for slaying the sheep of Jesus. FRED. SEYLER in BENGEL calculates that Papal

Rome, between A. D. 1540 and 1580, slew more than 900,000 Protestants. Three reasons for the harlot's downfall are given: (1.) The worldly greatness of her merchants, which was due to unholy traffic in spiritual things. (2.) Her sorceries, or juggling tricks, in which the false prophet that ministers to the beast in its last form shall exceed her; cf. "sorcerers" (ch. 21. 8; 22. 15), specially mentioned among those doomed to the lake of fire. (3.) Her persecution of (Old Testament) "prophets" and (New Testament) "saints."

CHAPTER XIX.

Ver. 1-21. THE CHURCH'S THANKSGIVING IN HEAVEN FOR THE JUDGMENT ON THE HARLOT. THE MARRIAGE OF THE LAMB: THE SUPPER: THE BRIDE'S PREPARATION: JOHN IS FORBIDDEN TO WORSHIP THE ANGEL: THE LORD AND HIS HOSTS COME FORTH FOR WAR: THE BEAST AND THE FALSE PROPHET CAST INTO THE LAKE OF FIRE: THE KINGS AND THEIR FOLLOWERS SLAIN BY THE SWORD OUT OF CHRIST'S MOUTH. 1. As in the case of the opening of the prophecy, ch. 4. 8; 5. 9, &c.; so now, at one of the great closing events seen in vision, the judgment on the harlot (described in ch. 18.), there is a song of praise in heaven to God: cf. ch. 7. 10, &c., toward the close of the seals, and ch. 11. 15-18, at the close of the trumpets: ch. 15. 3, at the saints' victory over the beast. And—So ANDREAS. But A, B, C, Vulgate, Syriac, and Coptic omit, a great voice—A, B, C, Vulgate, Coptic, and ANDREAS read, "as it were a great voice." What a contrast to the lamentations ch. 18. 1! Cf. Jeremiah 51. 48. The great manifestation of God's power in destroying Babylon calls forth a great voice of praise in heaven. people—Greek, "multitude." Alleluia—Hebrew, "Praise ye JAH," or JEHOVAH: here first used in Revelation, whence ELLIOTT infers the Jews bear a prominent part in this thanksgiving. JAH is not a contraction of JEHOVAH, as it sometimes occurs jointly with the latter. It means "He who is:" whereas Jehovah is "He who will be, is, and was." It implies God experienced as a PRESENT help; so that "Hallelujah," says KIMCHI in BENGEL, is found first in the Psalms on the destruction of the ungodly. "Hallelu-Jah" occurs four times in this passage. Cf. Psalm 149. 4-9, which is plainly parallel, and indeed identical in many of the phrases, as well as the general idea. Israel, especially, will join in the Hallelujah, when "her warfare is accomplished" and her foe destroyed. salvation—Greek, "The salvation . . . the glory . . . the power." and honour—So Coptic. But A, B, C, and Syriac omit. unto the Lord our God—So ANDREAS. But A, B, C, and Coptic read, "(Is) of our God," i. e., belongs to Him. 2. which did corrupt the earth—Greek, "used to corrupt" continually. "Instead of opposing and lessening, she promoted the sinful life and decay of the world by her own earthliness, allowing the salt to lose its savour." [AUBERLEN.] avenged—Greek, "exacted in retribution." A particular application of the principle (Genesis 9. 5). blood of his servants—literally shed by the Old Testament adulterous Church, and by the New Testament apostate Church; also virtually, though not literally, by all who, though called Christians, hate their brother, or love not the brethren of Christ, but shrink from the reproach of the cross, and show unkindness towards those who bear it. 3. again—Greek, "a second time." rose up—Greek, "goeth up." for ever and ever—Greek, "to the ages of the ages." 4. beasts—rather, "living creatures." sat—Greek, "sitteth." 5. out of—Greek, "out from the throne" in A, B, C. Praise our God—Cf. the solemn act of praise performed by the Levites 1 Chronicles 16. 36; 23. 5, especially when the house of God was filled with the Divine glory (2 Chronicles 5. 13). both—Omitted in A, B, C, Vulgate, Coptic, and Syriac. Translate as Greek, "the small and the great." 6. many waters—Contrast the "many waters" on which the whore sitteth (ch. 17. 1). This verse is the hearty response to the stirring call "Alleluia! Praise our God," &c. (v. 4, 5). The Lord God omnipotent—Greek, "the Omnipotent," reigneth—lit., reigned: hence reigneth once for all. His reign is a fact already established. Babylon, the harlot, was one great hindrance to His reign being recognized.

Her overthrow now clears the way for His advent to reign; therefore, not merely Rome, but the whole of Christendom in so far as it is carnal and compromised Christ for the world, is comprehended in the term "harlot." The beast hardly arises when he at once "goeth into perdition:" so that Christ is prophetically considered as already reigning, so soon does His advent follow the judgment on the harlot. 7. glad . . . rejoice—Greek, "rejoice . . . exult," give—So B and ANDREAS. But A reads, "we will give." glory—Greek, "the glory." the marriage of the Lamb is come—The full and final consummation is at ch. 21, 2-9, &c. Previously there must be the overthrow of the beast, &c., at the Lord's coming, the binding of Satan, the millennial reign, the loosing of Satan, and his last overthrow, and the general judgment. The elect-Church, the heavenly Bride, soon after the destruction of the harlot, is transfigured at the Lord's coming, and joins with Him in His triumph over the beast. On the emblem of the heavenly Bridegroom and Bride, cf. Matthew 22, 2; 25, 6, 10; 2 Corinthians 11, 2. Perfect union with Him personally, and participation in His holiness, joy, glory, and kingdom, are included in this symbol of "marriage;" cf. Song of Solomon everywhere. Besides the heavenly Bride, the transfigured, translated, and risen Church, reigning over the earth with Christ, there is also the earthly bride, Israel, in the flesh, never yet divorced, though for a time separated, from her Divine husband, who shall then be reunited to the Lord, and be the mother Church of the millennial earth, Christianized through her. Note, we ought, as Scripture does, restrict the language drawn from marriage-love to the Bride, the Church as a whole, not use it as individuals in our relation to Christ, which Rome does in the case of her nuns. Individually, believers are effectually-called guests; collectively, they constitute the bride. The harlot divides her affections among many lovers: the bride gives hers exclusively to Christ. 8. granted—Though in one sense she "made herself ready," having by the Spirit's work in her put on "the wedding garment," yet in the fullest sense it is not she, but her Lord, who makes her ready by "granting to her that she be arrayed in fine linen." It is He who, by giving Himself for her, presents her to Himself a glorious Church, not having spot, but holy and without blemish. It is He also who sanctifies her, naturally vile and without beauty, with the washing of water by the word, and puts His own comeliness on her, which thus becomes hers. clean and white—So ANDREAS. But A, B transpose. Translate, "Bright and pure;" at once brilliantly splendid and spotless as is the bride herself. righteousness—Greek, "righteousnesses;" distributively used. Each saint must have this righteousness: not merely be justified, as if the righteousness belonged to the Church in the aggregate; the saints together have righteousnesses; viz., He is accounted as "the Lord our righteousness" to each saint on his believing, their robes being made white in the blood of the Lamb. The righteousness of the saint is not, as ALFORD erroneously states, inherent, but is imputed: if it were otherwise, Christ would be merely enabling the sinner to justify himself. Romans 5, 13 is decisive on this. Cf. Article XI, Church of England. The justification already given to the saints in title and unseen possession, is now GIVEN them in manifestation: they openly walk with Christ in white. To this, rather than to their primary justification on earth, the reference is here. Their justification before the apostate world, which had persecuted them, contrasts with the judgment and condemnation of the harlot. "Now that the harlot has fallen, the woman triumphs." [AUBERLEN.] Contrast with the pure fine linen (indicating the simplicity and purity) of the bride, the tawdry ornamentation of the harlot. Babylon, the apostate Church, is the antithesis to new Jerusalem, the transfigured Church of God. The woman (ch. 12), the harlot (ch. 17), the bride (ch. 19), are the three leading aspects of the Church. 9. He—God by His angel saith unto me, called—effectually, not merely externally. The "unto," or "into," seems to express this: not merely invited to (Greek epi), but called INTO, so as to be partakers of (Greek eis), cf. 1 Corinthians

1, 9. marriage-supper—Greek, "the supper of the marriage." Typified by the Lord's Supper. true—Greek, "genuine;" veritable sayings which shall surely be fulfilled, viz., all the previous revelations. 10. at—Greek, "before." John's intending to worship the angel here, as in ch. 22, 8, on having revealed to him the glory of the new Jerusalem, is the involuntary impulse of adoring joy at so blessed a prospect. It forms a marked contrast to the sorrowful wonder with which he had looked on the Church in her apostasy as the harlot (ch. 17, 6). It exemplifies the corrupt tendencies of our fallen nature that even John, an apostle, should have all but fallen into "voluntary humility and worshipping of angels," which Paul warns us against. and of thy brethren—i. e., a fellow-servant of thy brethren. have the testimony of Jesus—(Note, ch. 12, 17.) the testimony of—i. e., respecting Jesus, is the spirit of prophecy—is the result of the same spirit of prophecy in you as in myself. We angels, and you apostles, all alike have the testimony of (bear testimony concerning) Jesus by the operation of one and the same Spirit, who enables me to show you these revelations, and enables you to record them: wherefore we are fellow-servants, not I your lord to be worshipped by you. Cf. ch. 22, 9, "I am fellow-servant of thee and of thy brethren the prophets;" whence the "for the testimony," &c., here, may be explained as giving the reason for his adding "and (fellow-servant) of thy brethren that have the testimony of Jesus." I mean, of the prophets; "for it is of Jesus that thy brethren, the prophets, testify by the Spirit in them." A clear condemnation of Romish invocation of saints, as if they were our superiors to be adored. 11. behold a white horse; and he that sat upon him—Identical with ch. 6, 2. Here as there he comes forth "conquering and to conquer." Compare the ass-colt on which He rode into Jerusalem. The horse was used for war: and here He is going forth to war with the beast. The ass is for peace. His riding on it into Jerusalem is an earnest of His reign in Jerusalem over the earth, as the Prince of peace, after all hostile powers have been overthrown. When the security of the world-power, and the distress of the people of God, have reached the highest point, the Lord Jesus shall appear visibly from heaven to put an end to the whole course of the world, and establish His kingdom of glory. He comes to judge with vengeance the world-power, and to bring to the Church redemption, transfiguration, and power over the world. Distinguish between this coming (Matthew 24, 27, 29, 37, 39; Greek parousia) and the end, or final judgment (Matthew 25, 31; 1 Corinthians 15, 23). Powerful natural phenomena shall accompany His advent. [AUBERLEN.] 12. Identifying Him with the Son of man similarly described, ch. 1, 14. many crowns—Greek, "diadems:" not merely (Greek stephanoi) garlands of victory, but royal crowns, as KING OF KINGS. Christ's diadem comprises all the diadems of the earth and of heavenly powers too. Contrast the Papal tiara composed of three diadems. Cf. also the little horn (Antichrist) that overcomes the three horns or kingdoms, Daniel 7, 8, 24 (Quare, the Papacy? or some three kingdoms that succeed the Papacy, which itself, as a temporal kingdom, was made up at first of three kingdoms, the exarchate of Ravenna, the kingdom of the Lombards, and the state of Rome, obtained by Pope Zachary and Stephen II, from Pepin, the usurper of the French dominion). Also, the seven crowns (diadems) on the seven heads of the dragon (ch. 12, 3), and ten diadems on the ten heads of the beast. These usurpers claim the diadems which belong to Christ alone. he had a name written—B and SYRIAC insert, "He had names written, and a name written," &c., meaning that the names of the dominion which each diadem indicated were written on them severally. But A, VULGATE, ORIGEN, and CYPRIAN omits the words, as English Version. name . . . that no man knew but . . . himself—(Judges 13, 18; 1 Corinthians 2, 9, 11; 1 John 3, 2.) The same is said of the "new name" of believers. In this, as in all other respects, the disciple is made like his Lord. The Lord's own "new name" is to be theirs, and to be "in their foreheads;" whence we may infer that His as yet unknown name also is written on His forehead; as the high priest had "Holiness to the Lord" inscribed on the mitre on his brow. John saw it as "written," but knew not its meaning. It is, therefore, a name which in all its glorious significancy can be only understood when the union of His saints with Him, and His and their joint triumph and reign, shall be perfectly manifested at the final consummation. 13. vesture dipped in blood—Isaiah 63. 2 is alluded to here, and in v. 15, end. There the blood is not His own, but that of His foes. So here the blood on His "vesture," reminding us of His own blood shed for even the ungodly who trample on it, is a premonition of the shedding of their blood in righteous retribution. He sheds the blood, not of the godly, as the harlot and beast did, but of the blood-stained ungodly, including them both. The Word of God—who made the world, is He also who under the same character and attributes shall make it anew. His title, Son of God, is applicable, in a lower sense, also to His people; but "the Word of God" indicates His incommunicable Godhead, joined to His manhood, which He shall then manifest in glory. "The Bride does not fear the Bridegroom; her love casteth out fear. She welcomes Him; she cannot be happy but at His side. The Lamb [v. 9, the aspect of Christ to His people at His coming] is the symbol of Christ in His gentleness. Who would be afraid of a lamb? Even a little child, instead of being scared, desires to caress it. There is nothing to make us afraid of God but sin, and Jesus is the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world. What a fearful contrast is the aspect which He will wear towards His enemies! Not as the Bridegroom and the Lamb, but as the [avenging] judge and warrior stained in the blood of His enemies." 14. the armies . . . in heaven—Cf. "the horse-bridles," ch. 14. 20. The glorified saints whom God "will bring with" Christ at His advent; cf. ch. 17. 14, "they that are with Him, called, chosen, faithful;" as also "His mighty angels." white and clean—Greek, "pure." A, B, Vulgate, Syriac, and CYPRIAN omit "and," which ORIGEN and ANDREAS retain, as English Version. 15. out of his mouth . . . sword—(Ch. 1. 16; 2. 12, 16.) Here in its avenging power, 2 Thessalonians 2. 8, "consume with the Spirit of His mouth" (Isaiah 11. 4, to which there is allusion here); not in its convicting and converting efficacy (Ephesians 6. 17; Hebrews 4. 12, 13, where also the judicial keenness of the sword-like word is included). The Father commits the judgment to the Son. he shall rule—The HE is emphatical, He and none other, in contrast to the usurpers who have misruled on earth. "Rule," lit., "tend as a shepherd;" but here in a punitive sense. He who would have shepherded them with pastoral rod and with the golden sceptre of His love, shall dash them in pieces, as refractory rebels, with "a rod of iron." treadeth . . . wine-press—(Isaiah 63. 3.) of the fierceness and wrath—So ANDREAS reads. But A, B, Vulgate, Coptic, and ORIGEN read, "of the fierceness (or boiling indignation) of the wrath," omitting "and." Almighty—The fierceness of Christ's wrath against His foes will be executed with the resources of omnipotence. 16. "His name written on His vesture and on His thigh," was written partly on the vesture, partly on the thigh itself, at the part where in an equestrian figure the robe drops from the thigh. The thigh symbolizes Christ's humanity as having come, after the flesh, from the loins of David, and now appearing as the glorified "Son of man." On the other hand, His incommunicable Divine name, "which no man knew," is on His head (v. 12). [MENOCIUS.] KING OF KINGS; cf. ch. 17. 14, in contrast with v. 17, the beast being in attempted usurpation a king of kings, the ten kings delivering their kingdom to him. 17. an—Greek, "one." in the sun—so as to be conspicuous in sight of the whole world. to all the fowls—(Ezekiel 39. 17-20.) and gather yourselves—A, B, Vulgate, Syriac, Coptic, and ANDREAS read, "be gathered," omitting "and." of the great God—A, B, Vulgate, Syriac, Coptic, and ANDREAS read, "The great supper (i. e., banquet) of God." 18. Contrast with this "supper," v. 17, 18, the marriage-supper of the Lamb, v. 9. captains—Greek, "captains of thousands," i. e., chief captains. The "klugs" are "the ten" who "give their power unto the beast." free and bond—specified in ch. 13. 16, as "receiving the mark of the beast." The repetition of flesh (in the Greek it is plural: masses of flesh) five times in this verse, marks the gross carnality of the followers of the beast. Again, the giving of their flesh to the fowls to eat, is a righteous retribution for their not suffering the dead bodies of Christ's witnesses to be put in graves. 19. gathered together—at Armageddon, under the sixth vial. For "their armies" in B and ANDREAS, there is found "His armies" in A. war—So ANDREAS. But A, B, read, "the war," viz., that foretold, ch. 16. 14; 17. 4. and with him, &c.—A reads, "and those with him." B reads, "and he who was with him, the false prophet." miracles—Greek, "the miracles" (lit., "signs") recorded already (ch. 13. 14) as wrought by the second beast before (lit., in sight of) the first beast. Hence it follows the second beast is identical with the false prophet. Many expositors represent the first beast to be the secular, the second beast to be the ecclesiastical power of Rome; and account for the change of title for the latter from the "other beast" to the "false prophet," is because by the judgment on the harlot, the ecclesiastical power will then retain nothing of its former character save the power to deceive. I think it not unlikely that the false prophet will be the successor of the spiritual pretensions of the Papacy; whilst the beast in its last form as the fully-revealed Antichrist will be the secular representative and embodiment of the fourth world-kingdom, Rome, in its last form of intensified opposition to God. Cf. with this prophecy, Ezekiel 38. 39; Daniel 2. 34, 35, 44; 11. 44, 45; 12. 1; Joel 3. 9-17; Zechariah 12. 13; 14. Daniel (7. 8) makes no mention of the second beast, or false prophet, but mentions that "the little horn" has "the eyes of a man," i. e., cunning and intellectual culture; this is not a feature of the first beast in ch. 13, but is expressed by the Apocalyptic "false prophet," the embodiment of man's un sanctified knowledge, and the subtlety of the old serpent. The first beast is a political power; the second is a spiritual power—the power of ideas. But both are beasts, the worldly Antichristian wisdom serving the worldly Antichristian power. The dragon is both lion and serpent. As the first law in God's moral government is that "judgment should begin at the house of God," and be executed on the harlot, the faithless Church, by the world-power with which she had committed spiritual adultery, so it is a second law that the world-power, after having served as God's instrument of punishment, is itself punished. As the harlot is judged by the beast and the ten kings, so these are destroyed by the Lord Himself coming in person. So Zephaniah ch. 1. compared with ch. 2. And Jeremiah, after denouncing Jerusalem's judgment by Babylon, ends with denouncing Babylon's own doom. Between the judgment on the harlot, and the Lord's destruction of the beast, &c., will intervene that season in which earthly-mindedness will reach its culmination, and Antichristianity triumph for its short three and a half days during which the two witnesses lie dead. Then shall the Church be ripe for her glorification, the Antichristian world for destruction. The world at the highest development of its material and spiritual power, is but a decorated carcass round which the eagles gather. It is characteristic, that Antichrist and his kings, in their blindness, imagine that they can wage war against the King of heaven with earthly hosts; herein is shown the extreme folly of Babylonian confusion. The Lord's mere appearance, without any actual encounter, shows Antichrist his nothingness; cf. the effect of Jesus' appearance even in His humiliation, John 18. 6. [AUBERLEN.] had received—rather as Greek, "received," once for all. them that worshipped—lit., "them worshipping;" not an act once for all done, as the "received" implies, but those in the habit of "worshipping." These both were cast . . . into a lake—Greek, ". . . the lake of fire," Gehenna. Satan is subsequently cast into it, at the close of the outbreak which succeeds the millennium (ch. 20. 10). Then Death and Hell, as well those not found at the general judgment "written in the book of life;" this constitutes "the second death." alive—a living death; not mere annihilation.

"Their worm dieth not, their fire is not quenched." 21. the remnant—Greek, "the rest," i. e., "the kings and their armies" (v. 19) classed together in one indiscriminate mass. A solemn confirmation of the warning in Psalm 2. 10.

CHAPTER XX.

Ver. 1-15. SATAN BOUND, AND THE FIRST-RISEN SAINTS REIGN WITH CHRIST, A THOUSAND YEARS; SATAN LOOSE GATHERS THE NATIONS, GOG AND MAGOG, ROUND THE CAMP OF THE SAINTS, AND IS FINALLY CONSIGNED TO THE LAKE OF FIRE; THE GENERAL RESURRECTION AND LAST JUDGMENT. 1. The destruction of his representatives, the beast and the false prophet, to whom he had given his power, throne, and authority, is followed by the binding of Satan himself for a thousand years. the key of the bottomless pit—now transferred from Satan's hands, who had heretofore been permitted by God to use it in letting loose plagues on the earth; he is now to be made to feel himself the torment which he had inflicted on men, but his full torment is not until he is cast into "the lake of fire" (v. 10). 2. the old—ancient serpent (ch. 12. 9). thousand years—As seven mystically implies universality, so a thousand implies perfection, whether in good or evil. [AQUINAS on ch. 11.] Thousand symbolizes that the world is perfectly leavened and pervaded by the Divine; since thousand is ten, the number of the world, raised to the third power, three being the number of God. [AUBERLEN.] It may denote literally also a thousand years. 3. shut him—A, B, Vulgate, Syriac, and ANDREAS omit "him." set a seal upon him—Greek, "over him," i. e., sealed up the door of the abyss over his head. A surer seal to keep him from getting out than his seal over Jesus in the tomb of Joseph, which was burst on the resurrection morn. Satan's binding at this juncture is not arbitrary, but is the necessary consequence of the events (ch. 19. 20); just as Satan's being cast out of heaven, where he had previously been the accuser of the brethren, was the legitimate judgment which passed on him through the death, resurrection, and ascension of Christ (ch. 12. 7-10) Satan imagined that he had overcome Christ on Golgotha, and that his power was secure for ever, but the Lord in death overcame him, and by His ascension as our righteous Advocate cast out Satan the accuser from heaven. Time was given him on earth to make the beast and harlot powerful, and then to concentrate all his power in Antichrist. The Antichristian kingdom, his last effort, being utterly destroyed by Christ's mere appearing, his power on earth is at an end. He had thought to destroy God's people on earth by Antichristian persecutions (just as he had thought previously to destroy Christ); but the Church is not destroyed from the earth, but is raised to rule over it, and Satan himself is shut up for a thousand years in the "abyss" (Greek for "bottomless pit"), the preparatory prison to the "lake of fire," his final doom. As before he ceased by Christ's ascension to be an accuser in heaven, so during the millennium he ceases to be the seducer and the persecutor on earth. As long as the devil rules in the darkness of the world, we live in an atmosphere impregnated with deadly elements. A mighty purification of the air will be effected by Christ's coming. Though sin will not be absolutely abolished—for men will still be in the flesh [Isaiah 65. 20]—sin will no longer be a universal power, for the flesh is not any longer seduced by Satan. He will not be, as now, "the god and prince of the world"—nor will the world "lie in the wicked one"—the flesh will become ever more isolated and be overcome. Christ will reign with His transfigured saints over men in the flesh. [AUBERLEN.] This will be the manifestation of "the world to come," which has been already set up invisibly in the saints, amidst "this world" (2 Corinthians 4. 4; Hebrews 2. 5; 5. 5). The Jewish Rabbis thought, as the world was created in six days and on the seventh God rested, so there would be six millenary periods, followed by a sabbatical millennium. Out of seven years every seventh is the year of remission, so out of the seven thousand years of the world the seventh millenary shall be the millenary of remission. A tradition in the house of Elias, A. D. 200, states that the world is to endure 6000 years; 2000 before the law, 2000 under the law, and 2000 under Messiah. Cf. Note and Margin, Hebrews 4. 9; ch. 14. 13. PAPIAS, JUSTIN MARTYR, IRENEUS, and CYPRIAN, among the earliest Fathers, all held the doctrine of a millennial kingdom on earth; not till millennial views degenerated into gross carnalism was this doctrine abandoned. that he should deceive—So A. But B reads, "that he deceive" (Greek plana, for planeese). and—So Coptic and ANDREAS. But A, B, and Vulgate omit "and." 4, 5. they sat—the twelve apostles, and the saints in general. judgment was given unto them—(Note, Daniel 7. 22.) The office of judging was given to them. Though in one sense having to stand before the judgment-seat of Christ, yet in another sense they "do not come into judgment" (Greek), but have already passed from death unto life." souls—This term is made a plea for denying the literality of the first resurrection, as if the resurrection were the spiritual one of the souls of believers in this life; the life and reign being that of the soul raised in this life from the death of sin by vivifying faith. But "souls" expresses their disembodied state (cf. ch. 6. 9) as John saw them at first; "and they lived" implies their coming to life in the body again, so as to be visible, as the phrase, v. 5, "this is the first resurrection," proves; for as surely as "the rest of the dead lived not (again) until," &c., refers to the bodily general resurrection, so must the first resurrection refer to the body. This also accords with 1 Corinthians 15. 23, "They that are Christ's at His coming." Cf. Psalm 49. 11-15. From ch. 6. 9, I infer that "souls" is here used in the strict sense of spirits disembodied when first seen by John; though doubtless "souls" is often used in general for persons, and even for dead bodies. beheaded—lit., "smitten with an axe;" a Roman punishment, though crucifixion, casting to beasts, and burning, were the more common modes of execution. The guillotine in revolutionary France, still continued in imperial France, is a revival of the mode of capital punishment of Pagan imperial Rome. Paul was beheaded, and no doubt shall share the first resurrection, in accordance with his prayer that he "might attain unto the resurrection from out of the rest of the dead" (Greek exanastasis). The above facts may account for the specification of this particular kind of punishment, for . . . for—Greek, "for the sake of;" "on account of;" "because of;" and which—Greek, "and the which;" And prominent among this class (the beheaded), such as did not worship the beast, &c. So ch. 1. 7, Greek, "and the which," or "and such as," particularizes prominently among the general class those that follow in the description. [TREGELLES.] The extent of the first resurrection is not spoken of here. In 1 Corinthians 15. 23, 51; 1 Thessalonians 4. 14 we find that all "in Christ" shall share in it. John himself was not "beheaded," yet who doubts but that he shall share in the first resurrection? The martyrs are put first, because most like Jesus in their sufferings and death, therefore nearest Him in their life and reign; for Christ indirectly affirms there are relative degrees and places of honour in His kingdom, the highest being for those who drink his cup of suffering. Next shall be those who have not bowed to the world-power, but have looked to the things unseen and eternal. neither—"not yet;" reigned with Christ—over the earth. foreheads . . . hands—Greek, "forehead . . . hand." 5. But—B, Coptic, and ANDREAS read, "and." A and Vulgate omit it, again—A, B, Vulgate, Coptic, and ANDREAS omit it. Lived is used for lived again, as in ch. 2. 8. John saw them not only when restored to life, but when in the act of reviving. [BENGEL.] first resurrection—"the resurrection of the just." Earth is not yet transfigured, and cannot therefore be the meet locality for the transfigured Church; but from heaven the transfigured saints with Christ rule the earth, there being a much freer communion of the heavenly and earthly churches (a type of which state may be seen in the forty days of the risen Saviour during which He appeared to His disciples), and they know no higher joy than to lead their brethren on earth to the same salvation and glory as they share themselves. The millennial reign on earth does not rest on an isolated passage of the Apocalypse, but all Old Testament prophecy goes on the same view (cf. Isaiah 4. 3; 1. 9; 35. 8). Jesus, whilst opposing the carnal views of the kingdom of God prevalent among the Jews in His day, does not contradict, but confirms, the Old Testament view of a coming earthly, Jewish kingdom of glory: beginning from within, and spreading itself now spiritually, the kingdom of God shall manifest itself outwardly at Christ's coming again. The Papacy is a false anticipation of the kingdom during the Church-historical period. "When Christianity became a worldly power under Constantine, the hope of the future was weakened by the joy over present success." [BENGEL.] Becoming a harlot, the Church ceased to be a bride going to meet her Bridegroom; thus millennial hopes disappeared. The rights which Rome as a harlot usurped, shall be exercised in holiness by the Bride. They are "kings" because they are "priests" (v. 6; ch. 1. 6; 5. 10); their priesthood unto God and Christ (ch. 7. 15) is the ground of their kingship in relation to man. Men will be willing subjects of the transfigured priest-kings, in the day of the Lord's power. Their power is that of attraction, winning the heart, and not counteracted by devil or beast. Church and State shall then be coextensive. Man created "to have dominion over earth" is to rejoice over his world with unmixed, holy joy. St. John tells us that, instead of the devil, the transfigured Church of Christ; Daniel, that instead of the heathen beast, the holy Israel, shall rule the world. [AUBERLEN.]

6. Blessed—(Cf. ch. 14. 13; 19. 9.) on such the second death hath no power—even as it has none on Christ now that He is risen. priests of God—Apostate Christendom being destroyed, and the believing Church translated at Christ's coming, there will remain Israel and the heathen world, constituting the majority of men then alive, which, from not having come into close contact with the Gospel, have not incurred the guilt of rejecting it. These will be the subjects of a general conversion (ch. 11. 15). "The veil" shall be taken off Israel first, then from off "all people." The glorious events attending Christ's appearing, the destruction of Antichrist, the transfiguration of the Church, and the binding of Satan, will prepare the nations for embracing the Gospel. As individual regeneration goes on now, so there shall be a "regeneration" of nations then. Israel, as a nation, shall be "born at once—in one day." As the Church began at Christ's ascension, so the kingdom shall begin at his second advent. This is the humiliation of the modern civilized nations, that nations which they despise most, Jews and uncivilized barbarians, the negro descendants of Ham who from the curse of Noah have been so backward, Kush and Sheba, shall supplant and surpass them as centres of the world's history (cf. Deuteronomy 32. 21; Romans 10. 19; 11. 20, &c.). The Jews are our teachers even in New Testament times. Since their rejection revelation has been silent. The whole Bible, even the New Testament, is written by Jews. If revelation is to recommence in the millennial kingdom, converted Israel must stand at the head of humanity. In a religious point of view, Jews and Gentiles stand on an equal footing as both alike needing mercy; but as regards God's instrumentalities for bringing about His kingdom on earth, Israel is His chosen people for executing His plans. The Israelite priest-kings on earth are what the transfigured priest-kings are in heaven. There shall be a blessed chain of giving and receiving—God, Christ, the transfigured Bride the Church, Israel, the world of nations. A new time of revelation will begin by the outpouring of the fulness of the Spirit. Ezekiel (chs. 40.—48.), himself son of a priest, sets forth the priestly character of Israel; Daniel the statesman, its kingly character; Jeremlah (33. 17—21), both its priestly and kingly character. In the Old Testament the whole Jewish national life was religious only in an external legal manner. The New Testament Church insists on inward renewal, but leaves its outward manifestations free. But in the millennial kingdom, all spheres of life shall be truly Christianized from within outwardly. The Mosaic ceremonial law corresponds to Israel's priestly office; the civil law to its kingly office; the Gentile Church adopts the moral law, and exercises the prophetic office by the word working inwardly. But when the royal and the priestly office shall be revived, then—the principles of the Epistle to the Hebrews remaining the same—also the ceremonial and civil law of Moses will develop its spiritual depths in the Divine worship (cf. Matthew 5. 17—19). At present is the time of preaching; but then the time of the Liturgy of converted souls forming "the great congregation" shall come. Then shall our present defective governments give place to perfect governments in both Church and State. Whereas under the Old Testament the Jews exclusively, and in the New Testament the Gentiles exclusively, enjoy the revelation of salvation (in both cases humanity being divided and separated), in the millennium both Jews and Gentiles are united, and the whole organism of mankind under the first-born brother, Israel, walks in the light of God, and the full life of humanity is at last realized. Scripture does not view the human race as an aggregate of individuals and nationalities, but as an organic whole, laid down once for all in the first pages of revelation. [Genesis 9. 25—27; 10. 1, 5, 13, 25, 32; Deuteronomy 32. 8 recognizes the fact that from the first the division of the nations was made with a relation to Israel.] Hence arises the importance of the Old Testament to the Church now as ever. Three grand groups of nations, Hamites, Japhetites, and Semites, correspond respectively to the three fundamental elements in man—body, soul, and spirit. The flower of Shem, the representative of spiritual life, is Israel, even as the flower of Israel is He in whom all mankind is summed up, the second Adam (Genesis 12. 1—3). Thus Israel is the mediator of Divine revelations for all times. Even nature and the animal world will share in the millennial blessedness. As sin loses its power, decay and death will decrease. [AUBERLEN.] Earthly and heavenly glories shall be united in the two-fold election. Elect Israel in the flesh shall stand at the head of the earthly, the elect spiritual Church, the Bride, in the heavenly. These twofold elections are not merely for the good of the elect themselves, but for the good of those to whom they minister. The heavenly Church is elected not merely to salvation, but to rule in love, and minister blessings over the whole earth, as king-priests. The glory of the transfigured saints shall be felt by men in the flesh with the same consciousness of blessing as on the Mount of Transfiguration the three disciples experienced in witnessing the glory of Jesus, and of Moses and Elias, when Peter exclaimed, "It is good for us to be here;" in 2 Peter 1. 16—18, the Transfiguration is regarded as the earnest of Christ's coming in glory. The privilege of "our high calling in Christ" is limited to the present time of Satan's reign; when he is bound, there will be no scope for suffering for, and so afterwards reigning with, Him (ch. 3. 21; cf. Note, 1 Corinthians 6. 2). Moreover, none can be saved in the present age and in the pale of the Christian Church who does not also reign with Christ hereafter, the necessary preliminary to which is suffering with Christ now. If we fail to lay hold of the crown, we lose all, "the gift of grace as well as the reward of service." [DE BURGH.]

7. expired—Greek, "finished." 8. Gog and Magog—(Notes, Ezekiel 38. and 39.) Magog is a general name for northern nations of Japheth's posterity, whose ideal head is Gog (Genesis 10. 2). A has but one Greek article to "Gog and Magog," whereby the two, viz., the prince and the people, are marked as having the closest connection. B reads the second article before Magog wrongly. HILLER (Onomasticon) explains both words as signifying lofty, elevated. For "quarters" the Greek is "corners," to battle—Greek, "to the war," in A, B. But ANDREAS omits "the." 9. on the breadth of the earth—so as completely to overspread it. Perhaps we ought to translate, "... of the [holy] land." the camp of the saints . . . and the beloved city—the camp of the saints encircling the beloved city, Jerusalem (Ecclesiasticus 24. 11). Contrast "hateful" in Babylon (ch. 18. 2; Deuteronomy 32. 15, LXX.). Ezekiel's prophecy of Gog and Magog (38. and 39.) refers to the attack made by Antichrist on Israel before the millennium: but this attack is made after the millennium, so that "Gog and Ma-gog" are mystical names representing the final adversaries led by Satan in person. Ezekiel's Gog and Magog come from the north, but those here come "from the four corners of the earth." Gog is by some connected with a Hebrew root, "covered," from God—So B, Vulgate, Syriac, Coptic, and ANDREAS. But A omits the words. Even during the millennium there is a separation between heaven and earth, transfigured humanity and humanity in the flesh. Hence it is possible that an apostasy should take place at its close. In the judgment on this apostasy the world of nature is destroyed and renewed, as the world of history was before the millennial kingdom; it is only then that the new heaven and new earth are realized in final perfection. The millennial new heaven and earth are but a foretaste of this everlasting state when the upper and lower congregations shall be no longer separate, though connected as in the millennium, and when new Jerusalem shall descend from God out of heaven. The inherited sinfulness of our nature shall be the only influence during the millennium to prevent the power of the transfigured Church saving all souls. When this time of grace shall end, no other shall succeed. For what can move him in whom the visible glory of the Church, whilst the influence of evil is restrained, evokes no longing for communion with the Church's King? As the history of the world of nations ended with the manifestation of the Church in visible glory, so that of mankind in general shall end with the great separation of the just from the wicked (v. 12). [AUBERLEN.] 10. that deceived—Greek, "that deceiveth," &c. lake of fire—his final doom; as "the bottomless pit" (v. 1) was his temporary prison. where—So Coptic. But A, B, Vulgate, and Syriac read, "where also." the beast and the false prophet are—(Ch. 19. 20.) for ever and ever—Greek, "to the ages of the ages," day and night—figurative for without intermission (ch. 22. 5), such as now is caused by night interposing between day and day. The same phrase is used of the external state of the blessed (ch. 4. 8). As the bliss of these is eternal, so the woe of Satan and the lost must be. As the beast and the false prophet led the former conspiracy against Christ and His people, so Satan in person heads the last conspiracy. Satan shall be permitted to enter this Paradise regained, to show the perfect security of believers, unlike the first Adam whom Satan succeeded in robbing of Paradise; and shall, like Pharaoh at the Red Sea, receive in this last attempt his final doom. 11. great—in contrast to the "thrones," v. 4. white—the emblem of purity and justice. Him that sat on it—The Father. [ALFORD.] Rather, the Son, to whom "the Father hath committed all judgment." God in Christ, i. e., the Father represented by the Son, is He before whose judgment-seat we must all stand. The Son's mediatorial reign is with a view to prepare the kingdom for the Father's acceptance, which having done He shall give it up to the Father, "that God may be all in all," coming into direct communion with His creatures, without intervention of a Mediator, for the first time since the fall. Heretofore Christ's Prophetic mediation had been prominent in His earthly ministry, His Priestly mediation is prominent now in heaven between His first and second advents, and His Kingly shall be so during the millennium and at the general judgment. earth and heaven fled away—The final conflagration, therefore, precedes the general judgment. This is followed by the new heaven and earth (ch. 21). 12. the dead—"the rest of the dead" who did not share the first resurrection, and those who died during the millennium. small and great—B has "the small and the great." A, Vulgate, Syriac, and ANDREAS have "the great and the small." The wicked who had died from the time of Adam to Christ's second advent, and all the righteous and wicked who had died during and after the millennium, shall then have their eternal portion assigned to them. The godly who were transfigured and reigned with Christ during it, shall also be present, not indeed to have their portion assigned as if for the first time (for that shall have been fixed long before, John 5. 24), but to have it confirmed for ever, and that God's righteousness may be vindicated in the case of both the saved and the lost, in the presence of an assembled universe. Cf. "We must ALL appear," &c., Romans 14. 10; 2 Corinthians 5. 10. The saints having been first pronounced just themselves by Christ out of "the book of life," shall sit as assessors of the Judge. Cf. Matthew 25. 31, 32, 40, "these my brethren." God's omniscience will not allow the most insignificant to escape unobserved, and His omnipotence will cause the mightiest to obey the summons. The living are not specially mentioned: as these all shall probably first (before the destruction of the ungodly, v. 9) be transfigured, and caught up with the saints long previously transfigured; and though present for the confirmation of their justification by the Judge, shall not then first have their eternal state assigned to them, but shall sit as assessors with the Judge. the books . . . opened—(Daniel 7. 10.) The books of God's remembrance, alike of the evil and the good (Psalm 56. 8; 139. 4; Malachi 3. 16): Conscience (Romans 2. 15, 16), the word of Christ (John 12. 48), the Law (Galatians 3. 10), God's eternal counsel (Psalm 139. 16). book of life—(Ch. 3. 5; 13. 8; 21. 27; Exodus 32. 32, 33; Psalm 69. 28; Daniel 12. 1; Philippians 4. 3.) Besides the general book recording the works of all, there is a special book for believers in which their names are written, not for their works, but for the work of Christ for, and in them. Therefore it is called "the Lamb's book of life." Electing grace has singled them out from the general mass. according to their works—We are justified by faith, but judged according to (not by) our works. For the general judgment is primarily designed for the final vindication of God's righteousness before the whole world, which in this chequered dispensation of good and evil, though really ruling the world, has been for the time less manifest. Faith is appreciable by God and the believer alone (ch. 2. 17). But works are appreciable by all. These, then, are made the evidential test to decide men's eternal state, thus showing that God's administration of judgment is altogether righteous. 13. death and hell—Greek, Hades. The essential identity of the dying and risen body is hereby shown; for the sea and grave give up their dead. The body that sinned or served God shall, in righteous retribution, be the body also that shall suffer or be rewarded. The "sea" may have a symbolical [CLUYER from AUGUSTINE], besides the literal, meaning, as in ch. 8. 8; 12. 12; 13. 1; 18. 17, 19: so "death" and "hell" are personifications (cf. ch. 21. 1). But the literal sense need hardly be departed from: all the different regions wherein the bodies and souls of men had been, gave them up. 14. Death and Hades, as personified representatives of the enemies of Christ and His Church, are said to be cast into the lake of fire to express the truth that Christ and His people shall never more die, or be in the state of disembodied spirits. This is the second death—(viz.), "the lake of fire" is added in A, B, and ANDREAS. English Version, which omits the clause, rests on inferior MSS. In hell the ancient form of death, which was one of the enemies destroyed by Christ, shall not continue, but a death of a far different kind reigns there, "everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord:" an abiding testimony of the victory of Christ. 15. The blissful lot of the righteous is not here specially mentioned, as their bliss had commenced before the final judgment. Cf., however, Matthew 25. 34, 41, 46.

CHAPTER XXI.

Ver. 1-27. THE NEW HEAVEN AND EARTH: NEW JERUSALEM OUT OF HEAVEN. The remaining two chapters describe the eternal and consummated kingdom of God and the saints on the new earth. As the world of nations is to be pervaded by Divine influence in the millennium, so the world of nature shall be, not annihilated, but transfigured universally in the eternal state which follows it. The earth was cursed for man's sake; but is redeemed by the second Adam. Now is the Church; in the millennium shall be the kingdom; and after that shall be the new world wherein God shall be all in all. The "day of the Lord" and the conflagration of the earth are in 2 Peter 3. spoken of as if connected together, from which many argue against a millennial interval between His coming and the general conflagration of the old earth, preparatory to the new; but "day" is used often of a whole period comprising events intimately connected together, as are the Lord's second advent, the millennium, and the general conflagration and judgment. Cf. Genesis 2, 4 as to the wide use of "day." Man's soul is redeemed by regeneration through the Holy Spirit now; man's body shall be redeemed at the resurrection; man's dwelling-place, His inheritance, the earth, shall be redeemed perfectly at the creation of the new heaven and earth, which shall exceed in glory the first Paradise, as much as the second Adam exceeds in glory the first Adam before the fall, and as man regenerated in body and soul shall exceed man as he was at creation. 1. the first—i. e., the former, passed away—Greek in A, B is "were departed" (Greek, apelethon, not as in English Version, parelthe). was—Greek, "is," which graphically sets the thing before our eyes as present. no more sea—The sea is the type of perpetual unrest. Hence our Lord rebukes it as an unruly hostile troubler of His people. It symbolized the political tumults out of which "the beast" arose, ch. 13. 1. As the physical corresponds to the spiritual and moral world, so the absence of sea, after the metamorphosis of the earth by fire, answers to the unruffled state of solid peace which shall then prevail. The sea, though severing lands from one another, is now, by God's eliciting of good from evil, made the medium of communication between countries through navigation. Then man shall possess inherent powers which shall make the sea no longer necessary, but an element which would detract from a perfect state. A "river" and "water" are spoken of in ch. 22. 1, 2, probably literal (i. e., with such changes of the natural properties of water, as correspond analogically to man's own transfigured body), as well as symbolical. The sea was once the element of the world's destruction, and is still the source of death to thousands, whence after the millennium, at the general judgment, it is specially said, "The sea gave up the dead . . . in it." Then it shall cease to destroy, or disturb, being removed altogether on account of its past destructions. 2. And I John—"John" is omitted in A, B, Vulgate, Syriac, Coptic, and ANDREAS; also the "I" in the Greek of these authorities is not emphatical. The insertion of "I John" in the Greek would somewhat interfere with the close connection which subsists between "the new heaven and earth," v. 1, and the "new Jerusalem" in this verse. Jerusalem . . . out of heaven—(Ch. 3. 12; Galatians 4. 26, "Jerusalem which is above;" Hebrews 11. 10; 12. 22; 13. 14.) The descent of the new Jerusalem out of heaven is plainly distinct from the earthly Jerusalem in which Israel in the flesh shall dwell during the millennium, and follows on the creation of the new heaven and earth. John in his Gospel always writes [Greek] Hierosoloma of the old city; in the Apocalypse always Hierosaleem of the heavenly city (ch. 3. 12). Hierosaleem is a Hebrew name, the original and holy appellation. Hierosoloma is the common Greek term, used in a political sense. St. Paul observes the same distinction when refuting Judaism (Galatians 4. 26; cf. 1. 17, 18; 2. 1; Hebrews 12. 22), though not so in the Epistles to Romans and Corinthians. [BENJEL] bride—made up of the blessed citizens of "the holy city." There is no longer merely a Paradise as in Eden (though there is that also, ch. 2. 7), no longer a mere garden, but now the city of God on earth, costlier, statelier, and more glorious, but at the same time the result of labour and pains such as had not to be expended by man in dressing the primitive garden of Eden. "The lively stones" were severally in time laboriously chiselled into shape, after the pattern of "the Chief corner-stone," to prepare them for the place which they shall everlastingly fill in the heavenly Jerusalem. 3. out of heaven—So ANDREAS. But A and Vulgate read, "out of the throne," the tabernacle—Alluding to the tabernacle of God in the wilderness (wherein many signs of His presence were given): of which this is the antitype, having previously been in heaven: ch. 11. 19; 15. 5, "the temple of the tabernacle of the testimony in heaven;" also 13. 6. Cf. the contrast in Hebrews 9. 23, 14, between "the patterns" and "the heavenly things themselves," between "the figures" and "the true." The earnest of the true and heavenly tabernacle was afforded in the Jerusalem temple described by Ezekiel 40., &c., as about to be, viz., during the millennium. dwelt with them—lit., "tabernacle with them;" the same Greek word as is used of the Divine Son "tabernacled among us." Then He was in the weakness of the flesh: but at the new creation of heaven and earth He shall tabernacle among us in the glory of His manifested Godhead (ch. 22. 4). they—in Greek emphatical, "they" (in particular). his people—Greek, "His peoples;" "the nations of the saved" being all peculiarly His, as Israel was designed to be. So A reads. But B, Vulgate, Syriac, and Coptic read, "His people;" singular. God himself . . . with them—realizing fully His name Immanuel. 4. all tears—Greek, "every tear." no more death—Greek, "death shall be no more." Therefore it is not the millennium, for in the latter there is death (Isaiah 65. 20; 1 Corinthians 15. 26, 54, "the last enemy . . . destroyed is death," ch. 20. 14, after the millennium). sorrow—Greek, "mourning." passed away—Greek, "departed," as in v. 1. 5. sat—Greek, "sitteth." all things new—not recent, but changed from the old (Greek, kaina, not nea). An earnest of this regeneration and transfiguration of nature is given already in the regenerate soul. unto me—So Coptic and ANDREAS. But A, B, Vulgate, and Syriac omit. true and faithful—So ANDREAS. But A, B, Vulgate, Syriac, and Coptic transpose, "faithful and true" (lit., genuine). 6. It is done—The same Greek as in ch. 16. 17. "It is come to pass." So Vulgate reads with English Version. But A reads, "They (these words, v. 5) are come to pass." All is as sure as if it actually had been fulfilled, for it rests on the word of the unchanging God. When the consummation shall be, God shall rejoice over the work of His own hands, as at the completion of the first creation God saw everything that He had made, and beheld it was very good. Alpha . . . Omega—Greek in A, B, "the Alpha . . . the Omega" (ch. 1. 18). give unto . . . athirst . . . water of life—(Ch. 22. 17; Isaiah 12. 3; 55. 1; John 4. 13, 14; 7. 37, 38.) This is added lest any should despair of attaining to this exceeding weight of glory. In our present state we may drink of the stream, then we shall drink at the Fountain. freely—Greek, "gratuitously;" the same Greek as is translated, "(They hated me) without a cause," John 15. 25. As gratuitous as was man's hatred of God, so gratuitous is God's love to man: there was every cause in Christ why man should love Him, yet man hated Him; there was every cause in man why (humanly speaking) God should have hated man, yet God loved man: the very reverse of what might be expected took place in both cases. Even in heaven our drinking at the Fountain shall be God's gratuitous gift. 7. He that overcometh—Another aspect of the believer's life: a conflict with sin, Satan, and the world is needed. Thirsting for salvation is the first beginning of, and continues for ever (in the sense of an appetite and relish for Divine joys) a characteristic of the believer. In a different sense, the believer "shall never thirst." Inherit all things—A, B, Vulgate and CYRIL read, "these things," viz., the blessings described in this whole passage. With "all things," cf. 1 Corinthians 3. 21-23. I will be his God—Greek, ". . . to him a God," i. e., all that is implied of blessing in the name "God." he shall be my son—"He" is emphatical: He in particular and in a peculiar sense, above others; Greek, "shall be to me a son," in fullest realization of the promise made in type to Solomon, son of David, and antitypically to the Divine Son of David. 8. the fearful—Greek, "the cowardly," who do not quit themselves like men so as to "overcome" in the good fight; who have the spirit of slavish "fear," not love, towards God; and who through fear of man are not bold for God, or "draw back." Cf. v. 27; ch. 22. 15. unbelieving—Greek, "faithless." abominable—who have drank of the harlot's "cup of abominations." sorcereers—one of the characteristics of Antichrist's time. all liars—Greek, "all the liars;" or else "all who are liars;" cf. 1 Timothy 4. 1, 2, where similarly tying, and dealings with spirits and demons, are joined together as features of "the latter times." second death—Ch. 20. 14: "everlasting destruction," 2 Thessalonians 1. 9; Mark 9. 44, 46, 48, "Where their worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched." 9. The same angel who had shown John Babylon the harlot, is appropriately employed to show him in contrast new Jerusalem, the Bride (ch. 17. 1-5). The angel so employed is the one that had the last seven plagues, to show that the ultimate blessedness of the Church is one end of the Divine judgments on her foes. unto me—A, B, and Vulgate omit. the Lamb's wife—in contrast to her who sat on many waters (ch. 17. 1), i. e., intrigued with many peoples and nations of the world, instead of giving her undivided affections, as the Bride doth, to the Lamb. 10. The words correspond to ch. 17. 3, to heighten the contrast of the bride and harlot. mountain—Cf. Ezekiel 40. 2, where a similar vision is given from a high mountain. that great—Omitted in A, B, Vulgate, Syriac, Coptic, and CYPRIAN. Translate then, "the holy city Jerusalem." descending—Even in the millennium the earth will not be a suitable abode for transfigured saints, who therefore shall then reign in heaven over the earth. But after the renewal of the earth at the close of the millennium and judgment, they shall descend from heaven to dwell on an earth assimilated to heaven itself. "From God" implies that "we (the city) are God's workmanship." 11. Having the glory of God—not merely the Shekinah cloud, but God Himself as her glory dwelling in the midst of her. Cf. the type, the earthly Jerusalem in the millennium (Zechariah 2. 5; cf. v. 23, below). her light—Greek, "light-giver:" properly applied to the heavenly luminaries which diffuse light. Cf. note, Philippians 2. 15, the only other passage where it occurs. The "and" before "her light" is omitted in A, B, and Vulgate. even like—Greek, "as it were," jasper—representing watery crystalline brightness. 12. And—A, B omit. Ezekiel 48. 30-35, has a similar description, which implies that the millennial Jerusalem shall have its exact antitype in the heavenly Jerusalem which shall descend on the finally-regenerated earth. wall great and high—setting forth the security of the Church. Also, the exclusion of the ungodly. twelve angels—guards of the twelve gates: an additional emblem of perfect security, whilst the gates being never shut (v. 25) imply perfect liberty and peace. Also, angels shall be the brethren of the heavenly citizens. names of . . . twelve tribes—The inscription of the names on the gates implies that none but the spiritual Israel, God's elect, shall enter the heavenly city. As the millennium wherein literal Israel in the flesh shall be the mother Church, is the antitype to the Old Testament earthly theocracy in the Holy Land, so the heavenly new Jerusalem is the consummation antitypical to the spiritual Israel, the elect Church of Jews and Gentiles being now gathered out: as the spiritual Israel now is an advance upon the previous literal and carnal Israel, so the heavenly Jerusalem shall be much in advance of the millennial Jerusalem. 13. On the north . . . on the south—A, B, Vulgate, Syriac, and Coptic read, "And on the north and on the south." In Ezekiel 48. 32, Joseph, Benjamin, Dan (for which Manasseh is substituted in ch. 7. 6), are on the east. Reuben, Judah, Levi, are on the north. Simeon, Issachar, Zebulun, on the south. Gad, Asher, Naphtali, on the west. In Numbers 2, Judah, Issachar, Zebulun, are on the east. Reuben, Simeon, Gad, on the south. Ephraim, Manasseh, Benjamin, on the west. Dan, Asher, Naphtali, on the north. 14. twelve foundations—Joshua, the type of Jesus, chose twelve men out of the people, to carry twelve stones over the Jordan with them, as Jesus chose twelve apostles to be the twelve foundations of the heavenly city, of which He is Himself the Chief corner-stone. Peter is not the only apostolic rock on whose preaching Christ builds His Church. Christ Himself is the true foundation: the twelve are foundations only in regard to their apostolic testimony concerning Him. Though Paul was an apostle besides the twelve, yet the mystical number is retained, 12 representing the Church, viz., 3, the Divine number, multiplied by 4, the world-number. In them the names, &c.—As architects often have their names inscribed on their great works, so the names of the apostles shall be held in everlasting remembrance. Vulgate reads, "in them." But A, B, Syriac, Coptic, and ANDREAS read, "upon them." These authorities also insert "twelve" before "names." 15. had a golden reed—So Coptic. But A, B, Vulgate, and Syriac read, "Had (as) a measure, a golden reed." In ch. 11. 2 the non-measuring of the outer courts of the temple implied its being given up to secular and heathen desecration. So here, on the contrary, the city being measured implies the entire consecration of every part, all things being brought up to the most exact standard of God's holy requirements, and also God's accurate guardianship henceforth of even the most minute parts of His holy city from all evil. twelve thousand furlongs—lit., "to 12,000 stadii." one thousand furlongs being the space between the several twelve gates. BENGEL makes the length of each side of the city to be 12,000 stadii. The stupendous height, length, and breadth being exactly alike, imply its faultless symmetry, transcending in glory all our most glowing conceptions. 17. hundred . . . forty . . . four cubits—Twelve times twelve: the Church-number squared. The wall is far beneath the height of the city. measure of a man, that is, of the angel—The ordinary measure used by men is the measure here used by the angel, distinct from "the measure of the sanctuary." Men shall then be equal to the angels. 18. the building—"the structure" [TREGELLES], Greek endomeesis. gold, like . . . clear glass—Ideal gold, transparent as no gold here is. [ALFORD.] Excellencies will be combined in the heavenly city which now seem incompatible. 19. And—So Syriac, Coptic, and ANDREAS. But A, B, and Vulgate omit. Cf. v. 14 with this verse; also Isaiah 54. 11. all manner of precious stones—Contrast ch. 18. 12 as to the harlot, Babylon. These precious stones constituted the "foundations." chalcidony—Agate from Chalcedon: semi-opaque, sky-blue, with stripes of other colours. [ALFORD.] 20. sardonyx—A gem having the redness of the cornelian, and the whiteness of the onyx. sardius—(Note, ch. 4. 3.) chrysolite—Described by PLINY as transparent and of a golden brightness, like our topaz: different from our pale green crystallized chrysolite. beryl—of a sea-green colour. topaz—PLINY, 37. 32, makes it green and transparent, like our chrysolite. chrysoprasus—somewhat pale, and having the purple colour of the amethyst. [PLINY, 37. 20, 21.] jacinth—The flashing violet brightness in the amethyst is diluted in the jacinth. [PLINY, 37. 41.] 21. every several—Greek, "each one severally." 22. no temple . . . God . . . the temple—As God now dwells in the spiritual Church, His "temple" (Greek naos, shrine; 1 Corinthians 3. 17; 6. 19), so the Church when perfected shall dwell in Him as her "temple" (naos: the same Greek). As the Church was "His sanctuary," so He is to be their sanctuary. Means of grace shall cease when the end of grace is come. Church ordinances shall give place to the God of ordinances. Uninterrupted, immediate, direct, communion with Him and the Lamb (cf. John 4. 23), shall supersede intervening ordinances. 23. In it—So Vulgate. But A, B, and ANDREAS read, "(shine) on it," or lit., "for her." the light—Greek, "the lamp" (Isaiah 60. 19, 20). The direct light of God and the Lamb shall make the saints independent of God's creatures, the sun and moon, for light. 24. of them which are saved . . . in—A, B, Vulgate, Coptic, and ANDREAS read, (the nations shall walk) "by means of her light:" omitting "of them which are saved." Her brightness shall supply them with light. the kings of the earth—who once had regard only to their glory, having been converted, now in the new Jerusalem do bring their glory into it, to lay it down at the feet of their God and Lord. and honour—So B, Vulgate, and Syriac. But A omits the clause. 25. not be shut . . . by day—therefore shall never be shut; for it shall always be day. Gates are usually shut by night: but in it shall be no night. There shall be continual free ingress into it, so as that all which is blessed and glorious may continually be brought into it. So in the millennial type. 26. All that was truly glorious and excellent in the earth and its converted nations shall be gathered into it; and whilst all shall form one Bride, there shall be various orders among the redeemed, analogous to the divisions of nations on earth constituting the one great human family, and to the various orders of angels. 27. anything that defileth—Greek koinoun. A, B read [koinoun], “anything unclean.” In the Lamb’s book of life—(Note, ch. 20, 12, 15.) As all the filth of the old Jerusalem was carried outside the walls and burnt there, so nothing defiled shall enter the heavenly city, but be burnt outside (cf. ch. 22, 15). It is striking that the apostle of love, who shows us the glories of the heavenly city, is he also who speaks most plainly of the terrors of hell. On v. 26, 27, ALFORD writes a Note, rash in speculation, about the heathen nations, above what is written, and not at all required by the sacred text: cf. my Note, v. 26.

CHAPTER XXII.

Ver. 1-21. THE RIVER OF LIFE: THE TREE OF LIFE: THE OTHER BLESSEDNESSES OF THE REDEEMED. JOHN FORBIDDEN TO WORSHIP THE ANGEL. NEARNESS OF CHRIST’S COMING TO FIX MAN’S ETERNAL STATE. TESTIMONY OF JESUS, HIS SPIRIT, AND THE BRIDE, ANY ADDITION TO WHICH, OR SUBTRACTION FROM WHICH, SHALL BE ETERNALLY PUNISHED. CLOSING BENEDICTION. 1. pure—A, B, Vulgate, and HILARY, 22, omit. water of life—infinitely superior to the typical waters in the first Paradise (Genesis 2, 10-14); and even superior to those figurative ones in the millennial Jerusalem (Ezekiel 47, 1, &c., 12; Zechariah 14, 8), as the matured fruit is superior to the flower. The millennial waters represent full Gospel-grace; these waters of new Jerusalem represent Gospel-glory perfected. Their continuous flow from God, the Fountain of life, symbolizes the uninterrupted continuance of life derived by the saints, ever fresh, from Him: life in fulness of joy, as well as perpetual vitality. Like pure crystal, it is free from every taint: cf. ch. 4, 6, “before the throne a sea of glass, like crystal.” clear—Greek, “bright.” 2. The harmonious unity of Scripture is herein exhibited. The Fathers compared it to a ring, an unbroken circle, returning into itself. Between the events of Genesis and those at the close of the Apocalypse, at least 6000 or 7000 years intervene; and between Moses the first writer, and John the last, about 1500 years. How striking it is that, as in the beginning we found Adam and Eve, his bride, in innocence in Paradise, then tempted by the serpent, and driven from the tree of life, and from the pleasant waters of Eden, yet not without a promise of a Redeemer who should crush the serpent; so at the close, the old serpent cast out for ever by the second Adam, the Lord from heaven, who appears with His Bride, the Church, in a better Paradise, and amidst better waters (v. 1): the tree of life also is there with all its healing properties, not guarded with a flaming sword, but open to all who overcome (ch. 2, 7), and there is no more curse. street of it—i. e., of the city. on either side of the river—ALFORD translates, “In the midst of the street of it (the city) and of the river, on one side and on the other” (for the second Greek enteuthen, A, B, and Syriac read, ekeithen: the sense is the same; cf. Greek, John 19, 18); thus the trees were on each side in the middle of the space between the street and the river. But from Ezekiel 47, 7, I prefer English Version. The antitype exceeds the type: in the first Paradise was only one tree of life; now there are “very many trees at the bank of the river, on the one side and on the other.” To make good sense, supposing there to be but one tree, we should either, as MEDE, suppose that the Greek for street is a plain washed on both sides by the river (as the first Paradise was washed on one side by the Tigris, on the other by the Euphrates), and that in the midst of the plain, which itself is in the midst of the river’s branches, stood the tree: in which case we may translate, “In the midst of the street (plain) itself, and of the river (having two branches flowing) on this and on that side, was there the tree of life.” Or else with DURHAM suppose, the tree was in the midst of the river, and extending its branches to both banks. But cf. Ezekiel 47, 12, the millennial type of the final

Paradise; which shows that there are several trees of the one kind, all termed “the tree of life.” Death reigns now because of sin; even in the millennial earth sin, and therefore death, though much limited, shall not altogether cease. But in the final and heavenly city on earth, sin and death shall utterly cease. yielded her fruit every month—Greek, “according to each month;” each month had its own proper fruit, just as different seasons are now marked by their own productions; only that then, unlike now, there shall be no season without its fruit, and there shall be an endless variety, answering to twelve, the number symbolical of the world-wide Church (cf. Notes, ch. 12, 1; 21, 14). ARCHBISHOP WHATELY thinks that the tree of life was among the trees of which Adam freely ate (Genesis 2, 9, 16, 17), and that his continuance in immortality was dependent on his continuing to eat of this tree; having forfeited it, he became liable to death; but still the effects of having eaten of it for a time showed themselves in the longevity of the patriarchs. God could undoubtedly endue a tree with special medicinal powers. But Genesis 3, 22 seems to imply, man had not yet taken of the tree, and that if he had, he would have lived for ever, which in his then fallen state would have been the greatest curse. leaves . . . for . . . healing—(Ezekiel 47, 9, 12.) The leaves shall be the health-giving preventive securing the redeemed against, not healing them of, sicknesses. Whilst “the fruit shall be for meat.” In the millennium described by Ezekiel 47., and ch. 20., the Church shall give the Gospel-tree to the nations outside Israel and the Church, and so shall heal their spiritual malady; but in the final and perfect new Jerusalem here described, the state of all is eternally fixed, and no saving process goes on any longer (cf. v. 11). ALFORD utterly mistakes in speaking of “nations outside,” and “dwelling on the renewed earth, organized under kings, and saved by the influences of the heavenly city.”(1) Cf. v. 2, 10-27; the “nations” mentioned (ch. 21, 24) are those which have long before, viz., in the millennium (ch. 11, 15), become the Lord’s and His Christ’s. 3. no more curse—of which the earnest shall begin in the millennium (Zechariah 14, 11). God can only dwell where the curse and its cause, the cursed thing sin (Joshua 7, 12), are removed. So there follows rightly, “But the throne of God and of the Lamb (who redeemed us from the curse, Galatians 3, 10, 13) shall be in it.” Cf. in the millennium, Ezekiel 48, 35. serve him—with worship (ch. 7, 15). 4. see his face—revealed in Divine glory, in Christ Jesus. They shall see and know Him with intuitive knowledge of Him, even as they are known by Him (1 Corinthians 13, 9-12), and face to face. Cf. 1 Timothy 6, 16, with John 14, 9. God the Father can only be seen in Christ. In—Greek, “on their foreheads.” Not only shall they personally and in secret (ch. 3, 17) know their sonship, but they shall be known as sons of God to all the citizens of the new Jerusalem, so that the free flow of mutual love among the members of Christ’s family will not be checked by suspicion as here. 5. there—So ANDREAS. But A, B, Vulgate, and Syriac read, “(there shall be no night) any longer;” Greek eti for ekei. they need—A, Vulgate, and Coptic read the future, “They shall not have need.” B reads “(And there shall be) no need.” candle—Greek, “lamp.” A, Vulgate, Syriac, and Coptic insert “light (of a candle, or lamp).” B omits it, of the sun—So A. But B omits it. giveth . . . light—“illuminates.” So Vulgate and Syriac. But A reads, “shall give light.” them—So B and ANDREAS. But A reads, “upon them.” reign—with a glory probably transcending that of their reign in heaven with Christ over the millennial nations in the flesh described in ch. 20, 4, 6; that reign was but for a limited time, “a thousand years;” this final reign is “unto the ages of the ages.” 6. these sayings are true—Thrice repeated (ch. 19, 9; 21, 5). For we are slow to believe that God is as good as He is. The news seems to us, habituated as we are to the misery of this fallen world, too good to be true. [NANGLE.] They are no dreams of a visionary, but the realities of God’s sure word. holy—So ANDREAS. But A, B, Vulgate, Syriac, and Coptic read, “(the Lord God of the) spirits (of the prophets).” The Lord God who with His Spirit inspired their spirits so as to be able to prophesy. There is but one Spirit, but individual prophets, according to the measure given them [1 Corinthians 12. 4-11], had their own spirits [BENGE] (1 Peter 1. 11; 2 Peter 1. 21). be done—Greek, "come to pass." 7. "And" is omitted in Coptic and ANDREAS with English Version, but is inserted by A, B, Vulgate and Syriac. blesed—(Ch. 1. 3.) 8. Both here and in ch. 19. 9, 10, the apostle's falling at the feet of the angel is preceded by a glorious promise to the Church, accompanied with the assurance, that "These are the true sayings of God," and that those are "blesed" who keep them. Rapturous emotion, gratitude, and adoration, at the prospect of the Church's future glory transport him out of himself, so as all but to fall into an unjustifiable act; contrast his opposite feeling at the prospect of the Church's deep fall [AUBERLEN], ch. 17. 6, where, cf. the Note, and on ch. 19. 9, 10. saw and heard—A, B, Vulgate, and Syriac transpose these verbs. Translate lit., "I John (was he) who heard and saw these things." It is observable that in ch. 19. 10, the language is, "I fell before his feet to worship him," but here, "I fell down to worship (God?) before the feet of the angel." It seems unlikely that John, when once reproved, would fall into the very same error again. BENGEL'S view, therefore, is probable; John had first intended to worship the angel (ch. 19. 10), but now only at his feet intends to worship (God). The angel does not even permit this. 9. Lit., "See not;" the abruptness of the phrase marking the angel's abhorrence of the thought of his being worshipped however indirectly. Contrast the fallen angel's temptation to Jesus, "Fall down and worship me" (Matthew 4. 9). for—A, B, Vulgate, Syriac, Coptic, ANDREAS, and CYPRIAN omit "for;" which accords with the abrupt earnestness of the angel's prohibition of an act derogatory to God. and of—"and (the fellow-servant) of thy brethren." 10. Seal not—But in Daniel 12. 4, 9 (cf. 8, 26), the command is, "Seal the book," for the vision shall be "for many days." The fulfilment of Daniel's prophecy was distant, that of John's prophecy is near. The New Testament is the time of the end and fulfilment. The Gentile Church, for which John wrote his Revelation, needs more to be impressed with the shortness of the period, as it is inclined, owing to its Gentile origin, to conform to the world and forget the coming of the Lord. The Revelation points, on the one hand, to Christ's coming as distant, for it shows the succession of the seven seals, trumpets, and vials; on the other hand, it proclaims, 'Behold I come quickly.' So Christ marked many events as about to intervene before His coming, and yet also saith, Behold I come quickly, because our right attitude is that of continual prayerful watching for His coming (Matthew 25. 6, 13, 19; Mark 13. 32-37 [AUBERLEN]; cf. ch. 1. 3). 11. unjust—"unrighteous;" in relation to one's fellow-men; opposed to "righteous," or "just" (as the Greek may be translated) below. More literally, "he that doeth unjustly, let him do unjustly still." filthy—in relation to one's own soul as unclean before God; opposed to "holy," consecrated to God as pure. A omits the clause "He which is filthy let him be filthy still." But B supports it. In the letter of the Vienne and Lyons Martyrs (in EUSEBIUS) in the second century, the reading is, "He that is lawless (Greek anomos) let him be lawless; and he that is righteous let him be righteous (lit., 'be justified') still." No MS. is so old. A, B, Vulgate, Syriac, Coptic, ANDREAS, and CYPRIAN read, "let him do righteousness" (1 John 2. 29; 3. 7). The punishment of sin is sin, the reward of holiness is holiness. Eternal punishment is not so much an arbitrary law, as a result necessarily following in the very nature of things, as the fruit results from the bud. No worse punishment can God lay on ungodly men than to give them up to themselves. The solemn lesson derivable from this verse is, Be converted now in the short time left (v. 10, end) before "I come" (v. 7, 12), or else you must remain unconverted for ever; sin in the eternal world will be left to its own natural consequences; holiness in germ will there develop itself into perfect holiness, which is happiness. 12. And—In none of our MSS. But A, B, Vulgate, Syriac, Coptic, and CYPRIAN omit it. behold, I come quickly—

(Cf. v. 7.) my reward is with me—(Isaiah 40. 10; 62. 11.) to give—Greek, "to render." every man—Greek, "to each." shall be—So B in MAI. But B in TISCHENDORF, and A, Syriac, read "is." 13. I am Alpha—Greek, "... the Alpha and the Omega." A, B, Vulgate, Syriac, ORIGEN, and CYPRIAN transpose thus, "the First and the Last, the Beginning and the End." ANDREAS supports English Version. Cf. with these Divine titles assumed here by the Lord Jesus, ch. 1. 8, 17; 21. 6. At the winding up of the whole scheme of revelation He announces Himself as the One before whom and after whom there is no God. 14. do his commandments—So B, Syriac, Coptic, and CYPRIAN. But A, N and Vulgate read, (Blessed are they that) "wash their robes," viz., in the blood of the Lamb (cf. ch. 7. 14). This reading takes away the pretext for the notion of salvation by works. But even English Version reading is quite compatible with salvation by grace; for God's first and grand Gospel "commandment" is to believe on Jesus. Thus our "right" to (Greek, privilege or lawful authority over) the tree of life is due not to our doings, but to what He has done for us. The right, or privilege, is founded, not on our merits, but on God's grace. through—Greek, "by the gates." 15. But—So Coptic. But A, B, HIPPOLYTUS, ANDREAS, and CYPRIAN omit. dogs—Greek, "the dogs;" the impure, filthy (v. 11; cf. Philippians 3. 2). maketh—including also "whosoever practiseth a lie." [W. KELLY.] 16. mine angel—for Jesus is Lord of the angels. unto you—ministers and people in the seven representative churches, and, through you, to testify to Christians of all times and places. root . . . offspring of David—Appropriate title here where assuring His Church of "the sure mercies of David," secured to Israel first, and through Israel to the Gentiles. Root of David, as being Jehovah; the offspring of David as man. David's Lord, yet David's son (Matthew 22. 42-45). the morning star—that ushered in the day of grace in the beginning of this dispensation, and that shall usher in the everlasting day of glory at its close. 17. Reply of the spiritual Church and St. John to Christ's words (v. 7, 12, 16). the Spirit—in the churches and in the prophets. the bride—Not here called "wife," as that title applies to her only when the full number constituting the Church shall have been completed. The invitation "Come" only holds good whilst the Church is still but an affianced Bride, and not the actually-wedded wife. However, "Come" may rather be the prayer of the Spirit in the Church and in believers in reply to Christ's "I come quickly," crying, Even so, "Come" (v. 7, 12); v. 20 confirms this view. The whole question of your salvation hinges on this, that you be able to hear with joy Christ's announcement, "I come," and to reply, "Come." [BENGE.] Come to fully glorify thy Bride. let him that heareth—i. e., let him that heareth the Spirit and Bride saying to the Lord Jesus, "Come," join the Bride as a true believer, become part of her, and so say with her to Jesus, "Come." Or "heareth" means "obeyeth;" for until one has obeyed the Gospel call, he cannot pray to Jesus "Come;" so "hear" is used, ch. 1. 3; John 10. 16. Let him that hears and obeys Jesus' voice (v. 16; ch. 1. 3) join in praying "Come." Cf. ch. 6. 1, Note, 10. In the other view, which makes "Come" an invitation to sinners, this clause urges those who hear savingly the invitation themselves, to address the same to others, as did Andrew and Philip after they had heard and obeyed Jesus' invitation, "Come," themselves. let him that is athirst come—as the Bride, the Church, prays to Jesus "Come," so she urges all whosoever thirst for participation in the full manifestation of redemption-glory at His coming to us, to come to Him in the mean time and drink of the living waters, which are the earnest of "the water of life pure as crystal . . . out of the throne of God and of the Lamb" (v. 1) in the regenerated heaven and earth. And—So Syriac. But A, B, Vulgate, and Coptic omit "and." whosoever will—i. e., is willing and desirous. There is a descending climax; Let him that heareth effectually and savingly Christ's voice, pray individually, as the Bride, the Church, does collectively, "Come, Lord Jesus" (v. 20). Let him who, though not yet having actually heard unto salvation, and so not yet able to join in the prayer, "Lord Jesus, come," still thirsts for it, come to Christ. Whosoever is even willing, though his desires do not yet amount to positive thirsting, let him take the water of life freely, i. e., gratuitously. 18. For—None of our MSS. has this. A, B, Vulgate, and ANDREAS read, "I," emphatical in the Greek. "I testify." unto these things—A, B, and ANDREAS read, "unto them." add . . . add—Just retribution in kind. 19. book—None of our MSS. read this. A, B, N, Vulgate, Syriac, and Coptic read, "(take away his part, i. e., portion) from the tree of life," i. e., shall deprive him of participation in the tree of life. and from the things—So Vulgate. But A, B, N, Syriac, Coptic, and ANDREAS omit "and;" then "which are written in this book" will refer to "the holy city and the tree of life." As in the beginning of this book (ch. I. 3) a blessing was promised to the devout, obedient student of it, so now at its close a curse is denounced against those who add to, or take from, it. 20. Amen. Even so, come—The Song of Solomon (8. 14) closes with the same yearning prayer for Christ's coming. A, B, and N omit "Even so," Greek nai: then translate for Amen, "So be it, come, Lord Jesus;" joining the "Amen," or "So be it," not with Christ's saying (for He calls Himself the

"Amen" at the beginning of sentences, rather than puts it as a confirmation at the end), but with St. John's reply. Christ's "I come," and St. John's "Come," are almost coincident in time; so truly does the believer reflect the mind of his Lord. 21. our—So Vulgate, Syriac and Coptic. But A, B, and N omit. Christ—So B, Vulgate, Syriac, Coptic, and ANDREAS. But A, N omit. with you all—So none of our MSS. B has "with all the saints." A and Vulgate has "with all." N has "with the saints." This closing benediction, Paul's mark in his Epistles, was after Paul's death taken up by St. John. The Old Testament ended with a "curse" in connection with the law; the New Testament ends with a blessing in union with the Lord Jesus. Amen—So B, N, and ANDREAS. A and Vulgate Fuldenis omit it.

May the Blessed Lord who has caused all holy Scriptures to be written for our learning, bless this humble effort to make Scripture expound itself, and make it an instrument towards the conversion of sinners and the edification of saints, to the glory of His great name and the hastening of His kingdom! Amen.
